The material allegations of the bill are as follows: The Missouri corporation was in existence from before August 1, 1873, to January 1, 1880, when it was dissolved. At the latter date the three trustees constituted its board of directors, and Hapgood was president. By virtue of the laws of Missouri, Hapgood and the other two persons became trustees of the corporation, with power to settle its affairs and recover the debts and property belonging to it. Hapgood was the president of the corporation during its entire existence, and had the control and management of its business. All the officers and employés were under his direction. He had power to hire and discharge all agents and employés of every grade, to determine the classes and kinds of goods that should be manufactured, and the general way in which the business should be conducted. The corporation employed a large number of manual laborers, and various employés of higher grades, among them a superintendent, a secretary, a foreman, and a traveling salesman, all of whom had charge of different departments, but were under the control and direction of the president as chief executive officer. The duties of the superintendent were to have general charge of the manufacturing department, subject to the discretion of the president, and to devise and get up such new devices, arrangements and improvements in the plows manufactured as should adapt them to the market, and as should be needed from time to time to suit the wants of customers. Shortly before August 1, 1873, Hewitt represented to the corporation that he was a man of large experience in mechanical pursuits; that he had been for several years immediately preceding engaged with Avery & Sons, plow manufacturers in Louisville, and had been since 1868 familiar with the manufacturing of plows and agricultural implements; that he had been instrumental in devising and getting up the best plows manufactured by Avery & Sons; that the most valuable improvements in the plows manufactured by them had been devised by him and adopted at [2 his suggestion and instigation; that since 1869 he had given his undivided attention to the manufacture of plows, and understood thoroughly the different kinds of plows in the market, and the classes of plows needed for the trade; and that he could and would give to any manufacturer who should secure his services the benefit of his experience in devising and making improvements in the plows manufactured. In consequence of these representations and relying upon them, the corporation employed Hewitt to devote his time and services to getting up, improving and perfecting plows and other goods, and to introducing the same; and, that he might be more fully identified with the corporation, he purchased one share of its stock, and was elected vice president. At some time in 1874, Hewitt increased his interest in the company by purchasing one half of the shares owned by the president. As a part of the same transaction, it was agreed between Hewitt and the corporation that from that date Hewitt should fill the position of superintendent of the manufacturing department, and as such, not only exercise a general supervision over that department, subject to the president, but also devote his time and services to devising improvements in, and getting up and perfecting, plows adapted to the general trade of the corporation. He accepted the position and held it until the fall of 1877, when his connection with the corporation ceased. He agreed, in such new position, to use his best efforts, and devote his knowledge and skill, in devising and making improvements in the plows manufactured by the corporation, and in getting up and perfecting plows and other agricultural implements adapted to its trade. In view of the expected value of his services in this latter direction, the corporation was induced to pay him, and did pay him, a salary of $3,000 a year. It was manufacturing a plow known as a sulky or riding plow, so arranged that the plow was carried on a frame supported by wheels, and that the driver of the horses rode on the frame. Down to the year 1876 this sulky plow had a wooden frame. During that year it was thought desirable by the officers of [230] the corporation that a change should be made by the substitution of an iron frame for the wooden one. The officers, including Hewitt, had frequent conversations during the winter of 1875-6 with reference to such change. In those conversations, and in personal conversations with Hewitt, the president stated that he was anxious to retain in the iron sulky all the essential features of the wooden sulky, so far as was consistent with the use of an iron frame, and suggested other features which he thought it important to adopt in the new plow; and Black, a salesman, urged the importance of having an iron axle of an arched form. As the result of these conversations and deliberations, Hewitt was early in the summer of 1876 directed by the president to proceed at once to devise and build an iron sulky plow according to the suggestions so made; that is, that he should retain in the new plow all the valuable features of the wooden sulky which the corporation had been manufacturing, should construct the plow of wrought and malleable iron, should adopt the other features suggested by the president and the arch suggested by Black, and should add such additional features as might seem advantageous to him, Hewitt. He was directed to proceed with the work without delay, so that the corporation might be ready to manufacture the new plow for the season of 1877. In accordance with those directions, Hewitt devised and constructed a sulky plow of wrought and malleable iron, and, after some delays, about the first of April, 1877, produced a plow satisfactory to the president. During all the time that he was engaged in devising and constructing the new plow, he was in the employ of the corporation, and drawing a salary of $3,000 a year. The time during which he was so engaged was the regular working hours in the factory. The men who did the manual labor on the new plow were all employés of, and paid by, the corporation; and all the materials used in its construction were bought and paid for by the corporation. The work, as it progressed, was under the general superintendence of Hewitt, but the work in the respective departments was also under the special superintendence of the respective foremen of those departments, who were also paid [231] by the corporation. During the whole time of the construction of the plow, it was understood by all the parties engaged therein, and by those at whose instance its construction was commenced, that it was being devised and constructed for the use and benefit of the corporation, and as a model for the future construction of sulky plows by it. After the plow was completed, and had been accepted by the president as satisfactory, the latter directed Hewitt to go to Chicago and have the necessary malleable castings made for the construction of plows after the model. Hewitt did so, obtaining at Chicago castings, molds, and other things necessary for the future building of plows after the model. During the time so spent, he was drawing his regular salary; and all his expenses, as well as the price of the models, castings and other things obtained by him, were paid by the corporation. During the time Hewitt remained in its employ, he never made any claim of property in any of the devices and improvements made or suggested by him in the new plow, and never stated or claimed that he was entitled to a patent on any of said improvements, or that he had any rights adverse to the corporation in any of said improvements or devices, and never, during the term of his employment, asserted any right to a patent in his own name for such improvements or devices, or any of them. After his connection with the corporation had ceased, and after he had made an arrangement with the president, whereby the latter bought back all his (Hewitt's) stock in the corporation, and after the corporation had been for many months, with the knowledge of Hewitt, engaged in the manufacture of such plows, Hewitt, on January 14, 1878, applied for a patent on the improvements in the plow, and on the 26th of March, 1878, a patent was granted to him, covering certain parts of the plow, being devices which had been theretofore used by the corporation with his knowledge and consent. After this patent was issued he for the first time claimed, as he has since claimed, that he had and has an exclusive right to manufacture such parts of the plow as are covered by the patent, and has threatened to enforce his rights under the patent as against the corporation, its representatives, successors and assigns, and to hold them liable in damages for any infringement of the same.

The bill also alleges that, in devising and [232] constructing the plow, Hewitt was only performing his duty as an employé of the corporation, and carrying out his contract with it; that he was doing only what he was hired and paid to do; that the result of his labors belonged to the corporation; that it became, in equity and good conscience, the true and rightful owner of the right to manufacture the plow; that, if there is any part thereof which is patentable, the patent belonged to the corporation as equitable assignee of Hewitt; and that he was and is bound, in equity and good conscience, to make an assignment of the patent to the corporation or to its trustees.

The bill also alleges that upon the dissolution of the corporation of Hapgood & Company, the stockholders thereof organized another corporation, under the laws of Illinois, under the name of the Hapgood Plow Company, one of the plaintiffs; that the Hapgood Plow Company succeeded to the business of the prior corporation and became, by assignment from it, the owner of all the latter's assets, whether legal or equitable, including the rights in the patent issued to Hewitt, which such prior corporation had or was entitled to, whether legal or equitable, and its right to manufacture a sulky plow in accordance with the model plow made by Hewitt, including all the devices covered or claimed to be covered by the patent; and that all the rights in the premises which the prior corporation had have been fully transferred to and vested in the new corporation. The bill then alleges a refusal by Hewitt to assign the patent to the plaintiffs, and that he claims to hold it adversely to them.

The prayer of the bill is for a decree directing the defendant to make an assignment of the patent, or of such interest as he may have therein, and of all his rights thereunder, to the Hapgood Plow Company, assignee of Hapgood & Company, or to the trustees of Hapgood & Company, in trust for the Hapgood Plow Company, vesting the title to the patent, or to the defendant's rights thereunder, in the Hapgood Plow Company, or in said trustees in trust for that corporation; and that he be enjoined and restrained from maintaining any action at law or in equity for any infringement of the patent [233] by Hapgood & Company, or for the use by that corporation of any of the devices or improvements covered by the patent.

The decision of the circuit court (11 Biss. 184) was placed on the grounds (1) that Hewitt was not expressly required, by his contract, to exercise his inventive faculties for the benefit of his employer, and there was nothing in the bill from which it could be fairly inferred that he was required or expected to do so; (2) that whatever right the employer had to the invention by the terms of Hewitt's contract of employment was a naked license to make and sell the patented improvement as a part of its business, which right, if it existed was a mere personal one, and not transferable, and was extinguished with the dissolution of the corporation.

We are of opinion that the views taken of the case by the circuit court were correct. There is nothing set forth in the bill, as to any agreement between the corporation and Hewitt, that the former was to have the title to his inventions or to any patent that he might obtain for them. The utmost that can be made out of the allegations is that the corporation was to have a license or right to use the inventions in making plows. It is not averred that anything passed between the parties as to a patent. We are not referred to any case which sustains the view, that, on such facts as are alleged in the bill, the title to the invention or to a patent for it passed. In McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. 202 [42 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 102], the facts were in some respects like those in the present case, but the decision only went to the point that the facts justified the presumption of a license to the employer to use the invention, as a defense by him to a suit for the infringement of the patent taken out by the employé.

The circuit court cases referred to do not support the plaintiff's suit. In Continental Windmill Co. v. Empire Windmill Co. 8 Blatchf. 295, there was an agreement that the employé should receive $500 for any patentable improvement he might make. In Whiting v. Graves, 3 Bann. & Ard. 222, it was held that an employment to invent machinery for use in a particular factory would operate as a license to the employer to use the machinery invented, but would not confer on the employer [234] any legal title to the invention or to a patent for it. In Wilkins v. Spafford, 3 Bann. & Ard. 274, the contract was that the employer should have the exclusive benefit of the inventive faculties of the employé and of such inventions as he should make during the term of service.

Whatever license resulted to the Missouri corporation, from the facts of the case, to use the invention, was one confined to that corporation, and not assignable by it. Troy I. & N. Factory v. Corning, 14 How. 193, 216 [55 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 383, 393]; Oliver v. Rumford Chem. Works, 109 U. S. 75, 82 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 862, 864]. The Missouri corporation was dissolved. Its stockholders organized a new corporation under the laws of Illinois, which may naturally have succeeded to the business of the prior corporation, but the express averment of the bill is that it took by assignment the rights it claims in this suit. Those rights, so far as any title to the invention or patent is concerned, never existed in the assignor. As to any implied license to the assignor, it could not pass to the assignee.

As to so much of the prayer of the bill as asks that Hewitt be enjoined from maintaining any action at law or in equity for any alleged infringement of the patent by the prior corporation, or for its use of any of the devices or improvements covered by the patent, which is all there is left of the prayer of the bill, any suit to be brought would not be a suit against the corporation, for it is dissolved; and could not be a suit in equity against its trustees, for they are not alleged to be using the invention. It could only be a suit at law against the trustees or the stockholders of the old corporation, for infringement by it while it existed. The theory of the bill is that there is a perfect defense to such a suit. In such a case a court of equity, certainly a Circuit Court of the United States, will not interfere to enjoin even a pending suit at law, much less the bringing of one in the future. Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 174]; 1 High, Injunctions, §§ 89–93, and cases there cited.

Decree affirmed.

Jurisdiction of state courts in actions against nonresidents, limited—action to recover undivided interest in land, and for a partition, personal—distinction between actions in rem and in personam—costs.

1. A state court cannot determine the validity of any demand against a nonresident, in the absence of personal service, or his personal appearance, beyond such as may be satisfied by property of the defendant within its jurisdiction.

2. While the costs of an action against a nonresident may be satisfied out of the property within the jurisdiction of the court, no personal liability for them can be created against him.

3. An action to recover an undivided interest in real property and to obtain a partition thereof is personal; and a judgment against a nonresident defendant for costs does not warrant a sale of his property.

Argued and submitted Nov. 2, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field:

This was an action of trespass to try the title to certain land in Texas. It is the form in use to recover possession of real property in that State.

The plaintiffs claimed the land under a deed to their grantor, executed by the sheriff of McLennan County, in that State, upon a sale under an execution issued on a judgment in a state court for costs, rendered against one Henry Alderson, then owner of the property, but now deceased.

The defendants asserted title to the land as heirs of Alderson, contending that the judgment under which the alleged sale was made was void, because it was rendered against him without personal service of citation, or his appearance in the action.

The material facts of the case as disclosed by the record are briefly these: On the 16th of July, 1855, a tract of land comprising one third of a league was patented by Texas to Alderson, who had been a soldier in its army. One undivided half of this tract was claimed by D. C. Freeman and G. R. Freeman, and they brought an action against him for their interest. The pleadings in that action are not set forth in the transcript, but, from the record of the judgment therein which was produced, we are informed that the defendant was a nonresident of the State, and that the citation to him was made by publication. There was no personal service upon him, nor did he appear in the action. [186] The judgment, which was rendered on the first of October, 1858, was of a threefold character. It first adjudged that the plaintiffs recover one undivided half of the described tract. It then appointed commissioners to partition and divide the tract, and set apart, by metes and bounds, one half thereof, according to quantity and quality, to the plaintiffs; and to make their report at the following term of the court. And, finally, it ordered that the plaintiffs have judgment against the defendant for all costs in the case, but stayed execution until the report of the commissioners should be returned and adopted and a final decree entered.

At the following term the commissioners made a report showing that they had divided the tract into two equal parcels. The report was confirmed, and on the 31st of March, 1859, the court adjudged that the title to one of these parcels was devested from Alderson and vested in the plaintiffs, the two Freemans, and that they recover all costs in that behalf against him, which were $61.45, and that execution issue therefor. Execution therefor was issued to the sheriff of McLennan County on the 30th of May directing him to make the amount out of "the goods, chattels, lands and tenements" of the defendant. It was levied on the other half of the divided tract, which remained the defendant's property. On the 5th of July, 1859, this half was sold by the sheriff to one James E. Head for $66.79, being the costs mentioned and his fees for the levy and for his deed, which was executed to the purchaser. In September following, Head conveyed the premises to D. C. Freeman for the alleged consideration of $178. Two of the defendants disclaimed having any interest. The other defendants, including Freeman, so far as their title is disclosed by the transcript, claimed under the sheriff's deed.

On the trial, the defendants, to show title out of the plaintiffs, offered in evidence the judgment for the costs, the execution issued thereon, and the sheriff's deed; to the introduction of which the plaintiffs objected, on the ground that the judgment for costs was a judgment in personam and not in rem, and was rendered against the defendant, who was a nonresident of the State, without his appearance in the action or personal service of citation upon him, but upon a citation by publication only, and therefore constituted no basis of title in the purchaser under the execution. [187]

The court sustained the objection and excluded the documents from the jury; and the defendants excepted to the ruling. No other evidence of title being produced by the defendants, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, and judgment in their favor was entered thereon; to review which the case is brought to this court on a writ of error.

Mr. M. F. Morris, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. L. W. Goodrich and E. H. Graham, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

Actions in rem, strictly considered, are proceedings against property alone, treated as responsible for the claims asserted by the libelants or plaintiffs. The property itself is in such actions the defendant, and—except in cases arising during war, for its hostile character—its forfeiture or sale is sought for the wrong, in the commission of which it has been the instrument, or for debts or obligations for which by operation of law it is liable. The court acquires jurisdiction over the property in such cases by its seizure, and of the subsequent proceedings by public citation to the world, of which the owner is at liberty to avail himself by appearing as a claimant in the case.

There is, however, a large class of cases which are not strictly actions in rem, but are frequently spoken of as actions quasi in rem, because, though brought against persons, they only seek to subject certain property of those persons to the discharge of the claims asserted. Such are actions in which property of nonresidents is attached and held for the discharge of debts due by them to citizens of the State, and actions for the enforcement of mortgages and other liens. Indeed, all proceedings having for their sole object the sale or other disposition of the property of the defendant, to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff, are in a general [188] way thus designated. But they differ, among other things, from actions which are strictly in rem, in that the interest of the defendant is alone sought to be affected, that citation to him is required, and that judgment therein is only conclusive between the parties.

The State has jurisdiction over property within its limits owned by nonresidents, and may, therefore, subject it to the payment of demands against them of its own citizens. It is only in virtue of its jurisdiction over the property, as we said on a former occasion, that its tribunals can inquire into the nonresident's obligations to its own citizens; and the inquiry can then proceed only so far as may be necessary for the disposition of the property. If the nonresident possesses no property in the State, there is nothing upon which its tribunals can act. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 723 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 569]. They cannot determine the validity of any demand beyond that which is satisfied by the property. For any further adjudication the defendant must be personally served with citation or voluntarily appear in the action. The laws of the State have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as may be allowed by comity; its tribunals cannot send their citation beyond its limits and require parties there domiciled to respond to proceedings against them; and publication of citation within the State cannot create any greater obligation upon them to appear. Id. p. 727 [570]. So, necessarily, such tribunals can have no jurisdiction to pass upon the obligations of nonresidents, except to the extent and for the purpose mentioned.

This doctrine is clearly stated in Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 931], where it became necessary to declare the effect of a personal action against an absent party without the jurisdiction of the court, and not served with process or voluntarily appearing in the action, and whose property was attached, and sought to be subjected to the payment of the demand of the resident plaintiff. After stating the general purpose of the action and the inability to serve process upon the defendant, and the provision of law for attaching his property in such cases, the court, speaking [189] by Mr. Justice Miller, said: "If the defendant appears, the cause becomes mainly a suit in personam, with the added incident that the property attached remains liable, under the control of the court, to answer to any demand which may be established against the defendant by the final judgment of the court. But if there is no appearance of the defendant, and no service of process on him, the case becomes in its essential nature a proceeding in rem, the only effect of which is to subject the property attached to the payment of the demand which the court may find to be due to the plaintiff. That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases is clearly evinced by two well established propositions: First, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in that suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted. No suit can be maintained on such a judgment in the same court, or in any other; nor can it be used as evidence in any other proceeding not affecting the attached property; nor could the costs in that proceeding be collected of defendant out of any other property than that attached in the suit. Second, the court, in such a suit, cannot proceed unless the officer finds some property of defendant on which to levy the writ of attachment. A return that none can be found is the end of the case, and deprives the court of further jurisdiction, though the publication may have been duly made and proven in court." Id. p. 318 [982].

To this statement of the law may be added what, indeed, is a conclusion from the doctrine that whilst the costs of an action may properly be satisfied out of the property attached, or otherwise brought under the control of the court, no personal liability for them can be created against the absent or nonresident defendant; the power of the court being limited, as we have already said, to the disposition of the property, which is alone within its jurisdiction.

The pleadings in the case in which judgment was rendered for costs against Alderson are not before us. We have only the formal judgment, from which it should seem that the action was to recover an undivided interest in the property, and then to obtain a partition of it, and have [190] that interest set apart in severalty to the plaintiffs—a sort of mixed action to try the title of the plaintiffs to the undivided half of the property, and to obtain a partition of that half. Such action, though dealing entirely with the realty, is not an action in rem in the strict sense of the term; it is an action against the parties named, and, though the recovery and partition of real estate are sought, that does not change its character as a personal action; the judgment therein binds only the parties in their relation to the property. The service of citation by publication may suffice for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court over the property so far as to try the right to its possession, and to decree its partition; but it could not authorize the creation of any personal demand against the defendant, even for costs which could be satisfied out of his other property.

The judgment is for all the costs in the case, and no order is made that they be satisfied out of the property partitioned. Had satisfaction been thus ordered, no execution would have been necessary. The execution, also, is general in its direction, commanding the sheriff to make the costs out of any property of the defendant.

The judgment, as far as the costs are concerned, must therefore be treated as a judgment in personam, and, for the reason stated, it was without any binding obligation upon the defendant; and the execution issued upon it did not authorize the sale made, and, of course, not the deed of the sheriff. Were the conclusion otherwise, it would follow, as indeed it is claimed here, that a joint owner of real property might sue a nonresident cotenant for partition, and, having had his own interest set apart to himself, proceed to sell out on execution the interest of his cotenant for all the costs.

The judgment of the court below must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

ASSYRIA HALL.

See S. C. Reporter's ed. 152-155.)

Attorney may testify for client—discretion as to admission of testimony—practice.

1. The attorney of a party prosecuting or defending in a civil action may testify on behalf of his client.

2. It is error to reject testimony on an illegal ground, when such refusal deprives the party offering it of the exercise of the discretion of the court as to its reception when offered.

3. It seems that testimony of an admission by the defendant may be competent on rebuttal, especially to discredit him as a witness by proof of a contradictory statement made at another time and place.

Submitted Nov. 8, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reversed.

Messrs. Amos Stock and M. B. Carpenter, for plaintiff in error:

A witness cannot be excluded merely because his testimony is to be given in behalf of his client.

Potter v. Inhab. of Ware, 1 Cush. 519; Chaffee v. Thomas, 7 Cow. 358; Newman v. Bradley, 1 Dall. 240 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 118); Miles v. O'Hara, 1 Serg. & R. 32; Geisse v. Dobson, 8 Whart. 34; Slocum v. Newby, 1 Murph. 423; Reid v. Colcock, 1 Nott & McC. 592; Chadwick v. Upton, 3 Pick. 449; Jones v. Savage, 6 Wend. 658; Commonwealth v. Moore, 5 J. J. Marsh. 655; Brandigee v. Hale, 13 Johns. 125; Robinson v. Douchy, 3 Barb. 20; Little v. McKeon, 1 Sandf. 607.

The attorney was offered as a witness to contradict the defendant. The evidence was offered to impeach the defendant. He could not be impeached until he had testified. The plaintiff could not tell beforehand that Hall would deny having told the attorney. The testimony was proper in rebuttal. It was not cumulative to the testimony of the plaintiff.

Fain v. Cornett, 25 Ga. 184; Yeaton v. Chapman, 65 Me. 126.

Mr. Edward O. Wolcott, for defendant in error:

The reason for the refusal to listen to the testimony of the counsel as witness is not material. The plaintiff was not entitled to introduce this evidence at this stage of the trial. It was a part of his evidence in chief. This is apparent from the nature of the issue tried. The action was based upon a parol promise to pay. Evidence of the admission of the defendant that he had made such promises was as much a part of plaintiff's affirmative case as any other evidence which might properly be given upon that subject. The court so held in deciding the motion for a new trial. The question is fairly presented whether the discretion which is vested in the trial court, as to the order of proof and the conduct of the trial, may be reviewed by this court, in the absence of any fact or circumstances tending to show either that this discretion was abused or its exercise refused.

The plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, a citizen of Massachusetts, brought his action at law in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado, against the defendant in error, to recover for the value of services alleged to have been performed by him for the defendant, as a broker, in reference to the sale of certain mining property in which the defendant was interested. There was a general denial by the answer of the defendant, and the cause was submitted to a jury upon the issue joined. The record shows that on the first trial there was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000, which, on a motion for a new trial, was set aside on payment of costs. Thereupon, at a subsequent term, the cause came on again for trial by jury, and there was a verdict for the defendant, and judgment rendered thereon, to reverse which is the object of the present writ of error.

It appears from the bill of exceptions taken on the second trial that the plaintiff, to maintain the issue on his part, gave evidence tending to prove that the defendant, Hall, promised to pay him $5,000 for his services in assisting the defendant to make sale of certain mining property in which he was interested. The defendant, to maintain the issue on his part, gave evidence tending to prove that he never promised to pay the plaintiff any sum whatever. The defendant, while on the stand as a witness, on cross examination, testified that he never told anyone that he promised to pay the plaintiff the sum of $5,000, and further testified that he never told the attorney of the plaintiff, Mason B. Carpenter, that he promised to pay the plaintiff the sum of $5,000. The plaintiff in [154] rebuttal offered as a witness the said attorney, Mason B. Carpenter, who was the sole attorney of plaintiff in conducting the trial of said cause, and who offered to testify that the defendant, Hall, had told him, the said Carpenter, that at a certain time and place he, the defendant, promised to pay the plaintiff, French, the sum of $5,000.

The court refused to allow the said Carpenter to be sworn as a witness for the plaintiff because he was acting as an attorney for the plaintiff in conducting the trial of the cause; to which ruling the counsel for the plaintiff excepted.

It further appears from the bill of exceptions that afterwards, upon a motion for a new trial, the court said that the said Carpenter was in fact competent to testify as a witness for the plaintiff, but that his testimony was not offered at the proper time; that the testimony of the witness Carpenter was receivable only in chief and upon the plaintiff's opening, and not in rebuttal; and that this being the second trial of the cause, the plaintiff was not surprised by the testimony of the defendant, Hall, and it was his duty to give in chief and in his opening all evidence as to admissions by the defendant, as well as other matters. For this reason the motion for a new trial was denied.

The question for consideration is whether the court erred in its ruling in not permitting the examination of the plaintiff's attorney as a witness on the plaintiff's behalf. It appears from the bill of exceptions that no objection was made to the examination of the witness by the defendant; the refusal to allow him to be sworn seems to have emanated from the court sua sponte, on the ground that he was acting as an attorney for the plaintiff in conducting the trial of the cause. There is nothing in the policy of the law, as there is no positive enactment, which hinders the attorney of a party prosecuting or defending in a civil action from testifying at the call of his client. In some cases it may be unseemly, especially if counsel is in a position to comment on his own testimony, and the practice, therefore, may very properly be discouraged; but there are cases, also, in [155] which it may be quite important, if not necessary, that the testimony should be admitted to prevent injustice or to redress wrong. Such seems, also, to have been the more deliberate opinion of the circuit court in this case, as it appears from the bill of exceptions that the refusal to grant a new trial for the alleged error in its ruling was justified, not on the ground that the witness was incompetent, but that his testimony was not offered at the proper time, being receivable only in chief upon the plaintiff's opening, and not in rebuttal.

This reason might have applied if the object of the testimony had been merely to prove an admission on the part of the defendant, and the offer had been rejected on that ground at the time, although it would be a strict application of the rule to require the plaintiff to assume in advance that the defendant would deny as a witness the truth of the plaintiff's case. But aside from that, the testimony seems to have been competent in rebuttal as proof of a contradictory statement made by the defendant at another time and place, with a view to discrediting him as a witness. However that may be, and admitting that the testimony offered was strictly competent only in chief, nevertheless it was a matter of discretion with the court at the time of the trial whether the testimony should be admitted when offered after the defendant had testified. The plaintiff was entitled to the exercise of that discretion on the part of the court at that time, which in the present case he was deprived of by the ruling of the court rejecting the offer of the testimony on another and an illegal ground. We are of the opinion that the court erred to the prejudice of the plaintiff in this respect.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

[149] MINNEAPOLIS AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
COLUMBUS ROLLING MILL COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 149-153.)

Sales—offer to sell—qualified acceptance, a rejection—subsequent tender of acceptance does not revive offer—submission of question of law to jury.

1. An offer to sell imposes no obligation on either party until accepted according to its terms.
2. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance, upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer, and ends the negotiation, unless the offer is renewed, or the proposed modification accepted.
3. An offer which has been rejected cannot be revived by the tender of an acceptance of it.
4. The submission of a question of law to the jury is no ground of exception if they decide it aright.

Argued and submitted Nov. 12, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action by a railroad corporation established at Minneapolis in the State of Minnesota against a manufacturing corporation established at Columbus in the State of Ohio. The petition alleged that on December 19, 1879, the parties made a contract by which the plaintiff agreed to buy of the defendant, and the defendant sold to the plaintiff, two thousand tons of iron rails of the weight of fifty pounds per yard, at the price of $54 per ton gross, to be delivered free on board cars at the defendant's rolling mill in the month of March, 1880, and to be paid for by the plaintiff in cash when so delivered. The answer denied the making of the contract. It was admitted at the trial that the following letters and telegrams were sent at their dates, and were received in due course by the parties, through their agents:

December 5, 1879. Letter from plaintiff to defendant. "Please quote me prices for 500 to 3,000 tons 50-lb. steel rails, and for 2,000 to 5,000 tons 50-lb. iron rails, March, 1880, delivery."

December 8, 1879. Letter from defendant to plaintiff: "Your favor of the 5th inst. at hand. We do not make steel rails. For iron rails, we will sell 2,000 to 5,000 tons of 50-lb. rails for fifty-four ($54.00) dollars per gross ton for spot cash, F. O. B. cars at our mill, March delivery, [150 subject as follows: In case of strike among our workmen, destruction of or serious damage to our works by fire or the elements, or any causes of delay beyond our control, we shall not be held accountable in damages. If our offer is accepted, shall expect to be notified of same prior to Dec. 20, 1879."

December, 16, 1879. Telegram from plaintiff to defendant: "Please enter our order for twelve hundred tons rails, March delivery, as per your favor of the eighth. Please reply."

December 16, 1879. Letter from plaintiff to defendant: "Yours of the 8th came duly to hand. I telegraphed you to-day to enter our order for twelve hundred (1200) tons 50-lb. iron rails for next March delivery, at fifty-four dollars ($54.00) F. O. B. cars at your mill. Please send contract. Also please send me templet of your 50-lb. rail. Do you make splices? If so, give me prices for splices for this lot of iron."

December 18, 1879. Telegram from defendant to plaintiff, received same day: "We cannot book your order at present at that price."

December 19, 1879. Telegram from plaintiff to defendant: "Please enter an order for two thousand tons rails, as per your letter of the sixth. Please forward written contract. Reply." [The word "sixth" was admitted to be a mistake for "eighth."]

December 22, 1879. Telegram from plaintiff to defendant: "Did you enter my order for two thousand tons rails, as per my telegram of December nineteenth? Answer."

After repeated similar inquiries by the plaintiff, the defendant, on January 19, 1880, denied the existence of any contract between the parties.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, under instructions which need not be particularly stated; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions, and sued out this writ of error.

[151] Messrs. Eppa Hunton, O. N. Olds and L. J. Critchfield, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Richard A. Harrison, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The rules of law which govern this case are well settled. As no contract is complete without the mutual assent of the parties, an offer to sell imposes no obligation until it is accepted according to its terms. So long as the offer has been neither accepted nor rejected, the negotiation remains open, and imposes no obligation upon either party; the one may decline to accept, or the other may withdraw his offer; and either rejection or withdrawal leaves the matter as if no offer had ever been made. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance, upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer, and puts an end to the negotiation, unless the party who made the original offer renews it, or assents to the modification suggested. The other party, having once rejected the offer, cannot afterwards revive it by tendering an acceptance of it. Eliason v. Henshaw, 4 Wheat. 225 [17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 556]; Carr v. Duval, 14 Pet. 77 [39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 361]; Nat. Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 43, 50 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 822, 825]; Hyde v. Wrench, 3 Beav. 334; Fox v. Turner, 1 Bradw. 153. If the offer does not limit the time for its acceptance, it must be accepted within a reasonable time. If it does, it may, at any time within the limit and so long as it remains open, be accepted or rejected by the party to whom, or be withdrawn by the party by whom, it was made. Bost. & M. R. R. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. 224; Dickinson v. Dodds, 2 Ch. Div. 463.

The defendant, by the letter of December 8, offered to sell to the plaintiff two thousand to five thousand tons of iron rails on certain terms specified, and added that if the offer was accepted the defendant would expect to be notified prior to December 20. This offer, while it remained open, without having been rejected by the plaintiff or revoked by the defendant, would authorize the plaintiff to take at his election any number of tons not less than two thousand nor more than five thousand, on the terms specified. The offer, while unrevoked, might be accepted or rejected by the plaintiff at any time before December 20. Instead of accepting the offer made, the plaintiff, on December [152] 16, by telegram and letter, referring to the defendant's letter of December 8, directed the defendant to enter an order for twelve hundred tons on the same terms. The mention, in both telegram and letter, of the date and the terms of the defendant's original offer, shows that the plaintiff's order was not an independent proposal, but an answer to the defendant's offer, a qualified acceptance of that offer, varying the number of tons, and therefore in law a rejection of the offer. On December 18, the defendant by telegram declined to fulfill the plaintiff's order. The negotiation between the parties was thus closed, and the plaintiff could not afterwards fall back on the defendant's original offer. The plaintiff's attempt to do so, by the telegram of December 19, was therefore ineffectual and created no rights against the defendant.

Such being the legal effect of what passed in writing between the parties, it is unnecessary to consider whether, upon a fair interpretation of the instructions of the court, the question whether the plaintiff's telegram and letter of December 16 constituted a rejection of the defendant's offer of December 8 was ruled in favor of the defendant as matter of law, or was submitted to the jury as a question of fact. The submission of a question of law to the jury is no ground of exception if they decide it aright Pence v. Langdon, 99 U. S. 578 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 420].

Judgment affirmed.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, Plff. in Err. [176]

v.

EDWARD SALLINGER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 176–184.

Municipal bonds—purchase of building for court house—change of site—construction of Statutes of North Carolina.

1. Section 8, chapter 20, Laws of North Carolina of 1868, providing that the site of a county building already located can only be changed by the unanimous vote of the board of county commissioners, does not invalidate bonds issued in pursuance of a majority vote, to pay for a building which had been previously leased for use as a court house, the county court house located elsewhere having been destroyed by fire.

2. The Act of February 27, 1877, providing that the board of county commissioners shall not have power to purchase real estate without the concurrence of a majority of the justices of the peace of the county, applies only to such officers as are chosen thereafter.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. C. M. Busbee, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. S. F. Phillips and John W. Hinsdale, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opin [177] ion of the court:

The object of this writ of error is to reverse a judgment rendered against the plaintiff in error on five obligations in writing, for $1,000 each, of like tenor, as follows, to wit:

"OFFICE OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, N. C.

"No. 19.

"Twelve months after date, with interest from date at the rate of six per centum per annum, the Board of Commissioners of Washington County promise to pay to Louis M. Hornthal, or to his order, one thousand dollars, for value received, and to secure indebtedness contracted for the necessary expenses of said County in the purchase of brick building for court house.

"This first day of October, 1877.

"J. G. AUSBON, [SEAL.]

"Chairman of the Board of Commissioners of Washington County.

"Countersigned,

"W. H. STUBBS,

"Register of Deeds and Clerk of said Board.."

The plaintiff below was a purchaser for value before due, and without notice of any defense. His right to recover was denied on the ground that, under the circumstances, the Board of Commissioners of Washington County had no authority of law for making and issuing the obligations sued on.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the court house of Washington County was de-178] stroyed by fire in the spring of 1872; that in the following August the defendants, the County Commissioners, rented the building for the purchase of which the bonds sued on were afterwards issued, which is situated about 200 yards from the court house which was destroyed by fire, in the Town of Plymouth, and, before the succeeding fall term of the superior court, gave notice, by public advertisement for thirty days, declaring the house so rented to be the public court house of Washington County; and that courts were held continuously therein until the commencement of the action.

The defendant offered in evidence a copy of the proceedings, as recorded, of a special meeting of the Board of County Commissioners of Washington County, held on the first Monday in October, 1877, at which the whole number of five were present. The transcript of the proceedings of that meeting sets out a paper addressed to the Board of Commissioners of Washington County, signed by eight justices of the peace, requesting that body at its next meeting, to contract "for the purchase of the brick store and lot in Plymouth, lately the custom house, for the use of the County of Washington for a court house, paying for the same the bonds of the County, bearing six per cent interest; payable at one, two, three, four and five years, with interest from date, at price of five thousand dollars, or five bonds of one thousand dollars each, at the rate of interest due as aforesaid, as we have here reconsidered.

"Plymouth, N. C., September 24, 1877."

It was thereupon moved and seconded that a vote of the board be taken on the purchase of the brick building then used as a court house. Whereupon three votes were cast for said purchase and one vote against it. The record of the proceedings of the meeting then contains the following:

"Whereas, the court house of the County of Washington, with the offices for the preservation of the public records and for the transaction of the public business, were destroyed by fire in the month of May, 1872, and it is absolutely necessary that the County shall own a court house, with suitable offices wherein the public records may be safely kept, and wherein the officers of the court and the County can conveniently transact the public business, and this board declare that it is inexpedient longer to [179] occupy a rented house for these purposes, and whereas, Louis M. Hornthal, of the City of New York, has offered to sell to this Board of Commissioners for said County the water part of lot numbered one hundred and forty-nine, situated in the Town of Plymouth in said County so numbered upon the plat or plan of said town, known as the custom house property, fronting fifty feet upon Water Street and extending to the river, including the wharf upon the same, with the brick house forty feet wide, sixty feet long, of three stories in height, with basement or cellar, at the price of five thousand dollars, to be secured by the bonds of the Board of Commissioners, payable in five equal annual installments, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, and agree to execute title to the same upon payment of the purchase money and interest, and to execute to this board a bond, with surety, to perform this agreement; and whereas a majority of the justices of said County have in writing directed this Board of County Commissioners to accept the offer of the said L. M. Hornthal, and to make the purchase of said property upon the terms named:

"It is ordered by this board, a majority of said justices concurring, that James G. Ausbon, chairman of this board, contract with the said L. M. Hornthal, through his agent, L. H. Hornthal for the purchase of said property; that he take from the said L. M. Hornthal his bond, with surety as above provided, and that he execute, as chairman of this board, five bonds, each for one thousand dollars, payable severally first October, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, bearing six per centum interest; that he cause the same to be countersigned by the clerk of this board, who is the register of deeds for this County, and that the seal of his office be attached. (Signed) J. G. Ausbon, Chairman."

The transcript of the record of the proceedings of a special meeting of the Board of County Commissioners, held on the first Monday, November 5, 1877, was also put in evidence, wherein it appeared as follows: J. G. Ausbon, as chairman, reported in writing, "that in obedience to the order of this board proposed on the first day of October, 1877, he accepted the bond of L. M. Hornthal, of the City of New York, [180 in the penal sum of ten thousand dollars, with justified surety, conditioned to execute title to this Board of County Commissioners for the brick store and lot in Plymouth, known as the custom house, upon payment of the purchase money, and that under said order he executed to him five bonds, each for one thousand dollars, dated the first day of October, 1877, bearing six per cent interest from date, payable at one, two, three, four, and five years from date, which were countersigned by the clerk of this board, and sealed with the seal of his office as register of deeds, and that he has caused the said title bond to be proved and registered."

It was thereupon ordered that the report be adopted, and that the action of the chairman in the premises be in all respects confirmed and approved. All the commissioners were present at this meeting.

Upon this state of case, the court directed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and there was verdict and judgment accordingly.

It is now contended by the plaintiff in error that the ruling of the court and the judgment rendered in pursuance thereof, are erroneous on two grounds: First, that by the laws of North Carolina in force at that time, and applicable to the transaction, the Commissioners of the County had no power to change the site of the county court house, unless authorized to do so by a unanimous vote of all the members of the board at their September meeting, and after a notice of the proposed change, specifying the new site, published in a newspaper printed in the County, and posted in one or more public places in every township in the County for three months next immediately preceding the annual meeting at which the final vote on the proposed change was to be taken; and upon that point cites the Laws of North Carolina, 1868, chap. 20, § 8, subsec. 8; and Battle's Revisal, 1873, chap. 27, § 8, subsec 8. Second, that the Board of Commissioners did not have the power to make the contract in question, and the bonds in pursuance and execution of the same, "without the concurrence of a majority of the justices [181] of the peace sitting with them," in pursuance of section 5 of the Laws of North Carolina of 1876-1877, chap. 141.

The Statute of North Carolina referred to in support of the first assignment of error is the Act of 1868, chap. 20. It provides for the organization and government of counties, and enacts that every county is a body politic and corporate, and has the powers specified by statute or necessarily implied in such a body, which can only be exercised by the board of commissioners or in pursuance of a resolution adopted by them. Among its general powers enumerated is, "To purchase and hold land within its limits, and for the use of its inhabitants, subject to the supervision of the General Assembly." The board of commissioners of each county are required to hold a regular meeting at the court house on the first Mondays of September and March of each year. They are expressly authorized "To purchase real property necessary for any public county building, and for the support of the poor, and to determine the site thereof where it has not been already located;" also, to locate the necessary county buildings, and to raise, by tax upon the county, the money necessary for their erection. Subdivision 8 of section 8 of the statute is as follows: "To remove or designate a new site for any county building; but the site of any county building already located shall not be changed unless by a unanimous vote of all the members of the board at the regular September meeting, and unless upon notice of the proposed change, specifying the new site. Such notice shall be published in a newspaper printed in the county, if there be one, and posted in one or more public places in every township in the county for three months next immediately preceding the annual meeting at which the final vote on the proposed change is to be taken. Such new site shall not be more than one mile distant from the old, except upon the special approval of the General Assembly."

It is for want of conformity to the directions of this clause that it is contended that the proceedings of the County Commissioners of Washington County, in the purchase of the court house building which constitutes the consideration for the obligations in suit, are illegal. We are of opinion, however, that the provisions [182] of that subsection do not apply to the circumstances of the present case. The language of the law is limited to the removal or designation of a new site for an existing county building, and cannot be applied to a case such as the present, where the court house has been destroyed by fire. It was the duty of the commissioners, after the destruction of the existing court house, to provide a place where the courts could be held and a building suitable for the purpose. The renting of a building in another locality cannot be considered as a removal or designation of a new site for the county building already located. Where a county building has been destroyed by fire, its site cannot be said any longer to exist as a location. A literal adherence, as required by the argument for the plaintiff in error, to the terms of the section in its application to this case leads to a necessary absurdity; for the regular September meeting, at which the unanimous vote of the board must be given, which it is contended is a necessary condition precedent to the validity of the transaction, is required to be held at the court house, but, according to the circumstances of this case, there was no court house at which any such meeting could be held. By the terms of the law the county commissioners have power to designate the site of any county building not already and previously located, and the terms of the subsection relied on apply, we think, only to the case where it is a naked proposition to abandon one building, then in use for county purposes, and to establish another one in another site for the same purpose.

In the present case, also, if there was any change in the site of the county building, it took place immediately after the destruction by fire of the old one, when the premises subsequently purchased were leased by the commissioners and occupied as a county court house. This had been done five years previously. In the meantime the occupancy of the place in question as a court house had been public and notorious, so that, we think, it may be considered at the time when the purchase of the property was made that the site for a county court house had been already established. The change of title from that of lessee for a term of years to an ownership in fee by reason of [183] the purchase was not a change of the site of a county building. It, therefore, does not come within the prohibition relied on.

As to the second assignment of error, reliance is had upon an Act to establish county governments, ratified February 27, 1877, Laws N. C. 1876-1877, chap. 141, p. 226. That was a statute which enacted a new mode of governing counties. It provided in section 4 that justices of the peace should be elected by the General Assembly; and the General Assembly, it was provided, at its then present session, should elect three justices of the peace for each township in the several counties of the State, to be divided into three classes, and hold their offices for the terms of two, four, and six years respectively; but the successor of each class, as his term expired, should be elected by the General Assembly for the term of six years. It was also provided that the terms of those elected at the then present session of the General Assembly, should begin at the expiration of the terms for which the justices of the peace then in office had been elected, and not before. Section 5 enacted that justices of the peace for each county, on the first Monday in August, 1878, and, on the first Monday in August every two years thereafter, should assemble at the court houses of their respective counties, and, a majority being present, should proceed to the election of not less than three, nor more than five, persons to be chosen from the body of the county, including the justices of the peace, who should be styled the board of commissioners for the county, and hold their offices for two years from the date of their qualification, and until their successors should be elected and qualified. Those elected on the first Monday in August, 1878, were to enter upon the duties of their office immediately upon the expiration of the term for which the board of county commissioners then in office had been elected, and not before. The same section contained the following proviso: "Provided however, That the board of commissioners shall not have power to levy taxes, to purchase real property, to remove or designate new sites for county buildings, to construct or repair bridges the cost whereof may exceed five hundred dollars, or to borrow money for the county, nor alter or make additional townships, without the concurrence of a majority of the justices of [184] the peace sitting with them; and for the purposes embraced in this proviso the justices of the peace of the county shall meet with the board of commissioners on the first Monday in August, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, and annually thereafter, unless oftener convened by the board of commissioners, who are hereby empowered to call together the justices of the peace, when necessary, not oftener than once in three months; but for such services the justices of the peace shall receive no compensation."

The next section of the statute provided that the board of commissioners so elected should have and exercise the jurisdiction and powers vested in the board of commissioners then existing.

It is quite evident, we think, that the proviso to section 5, which is relied upon as prohibiting the exercise of the powers specified, except in conjunction with the justices of the peace sitting with the board of commissioners, applies only to those commissioners who should be chosen thereafter under the provisions of that Act, the first election under which could not occur prior to the first Monday in August, 1878; and that those then elected could not enter upon the duties of their offices until after the expiration of the term for which the existing boards of county commissioners then in office had been elected. The limitations upon the powers of the commissioners under that statute cannot be construed as affecting the powers of the boards of commissioners in office at the date of this transaction, which was in the year 1877. The Act of February 27, 1877, therefore, has no application to this case.

There is, therefore, no error in the record, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Jurisdiction of circuit court—jurisdictional facts must appear on face of record—citizenship—action by administratrix—amendment of record.

1. The facts on which the jurisdiction of the circuit court rests must, in some form, appear on the face of the record.
2. Where, in an action by an administratrix, the jurisdiction of the court depends on the citizenship of the parties, it is not sufficient that the citizenship of the intestate appears, or that it appears in what State the letters of administration were granted.
3. The record cannot be amended in this court to show the citizenship of the plaintiff, but the court below may in its discretion allow it to be so amended when the case gets back.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Samuel C. Perkins, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. C. Hooton and R. T. Cornwell, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the errors assigned on this record is that the circuit court had no jurisdiction. It was settled at a very early day that the facts on which the jurisdiction of the circuit courts rest must, in some form, appear on the face of the record of all suits prosecuted before them. Turner v. Bank of N. A. 4 Dall. 8 [4 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 718]; Bushnell v. Kennedy, 9 Wall. 387 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 736]; Hornthall v. Collector, 9 Wall. 565 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 562]; Ex parte Smith, 94 U. S. 455 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 165]; Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 1057]; Grace v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 283 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 934]; Bors v. Preston, 111 U. S. 255 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 420]; Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 382 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 463]; Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 229 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 714]. And it is error for a court to proceed without its jurisdiction is shown. Grace v. American Cent. Ins. Co. supra; Thayer v. Life Asso. 112 U. S. 717 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 864]; Mansfield R. Co. v. Swan, supra.

It is conceded that the jurisdiction in this case depends alone on the citizenship of the parties, and that there is not in the declaration any averment in express terms of the citizenship of the plaintiff. It does appear that the defendant was, at the commencement of the suit, a citizen 240] of Connecticut, and that the intestate, Maris Rhoads, was at the time of his death a citizen of Pennsylvania; but there is nothing to show the citizenship of the plaintiff, and the jurisdiction depends on her citizenship, and not on that of her intestate. Amory v. Amory, 95 U. S. 186 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 428]. It is true that the record does show that letters of administration were granted to her in Pennsylvania, but that does not make her a citizen of that State. It may be that by the law of Pennsylvania the personal representative of a deceased citizen of Pennsylvania is, in contemplation of law, resident within the State, and at all times amenable to the jurisdiction of the proper courts of that State; but that does not necessarily imply citizenship of the State. He must be there for the purposes of his administration, but that is all. And, besides, the jurisdiction must appear positively. It is not enough that it may be inferred argumentatively. Brown v. Keene, 8 Pet. 112 [33 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 885]; Robertson v. Cease, supra. If the plaintiff was actually a citizen of Pennsylvania when the suit was begun, the record cannot be amended here so as to show that fact, but the court below may, in its discretion, allow it to be done when the case gets back. Morgan's Exr. v. Gay, 19 Wall. 81 [86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 100]; Robertson v. Cease, supra..

It is not necessary to consider any of the other assignments of error.

E. J. LEBRETON, Admr. of THEODORE LEROY, Deceased, VICTOR LEROY ET AL., Heirs at Law of THEODORE LEROY, Deceased.

Decree of the court below, affirmed upon the evidence.

Where, from the general language used in a deed of trust, it became necessary for the plaintiff to resort to parol evidence to show that his claim was included within those protected by the trust, it was competent for the defendant to show by parol evidence that it was the intention of the parties to the instrument to apply the proceeds from the sale of the trust property to the reimbursement of the trustee, for all advances and payments made, and expenses incurred, by him, before paying the claim of the plaintiff. The plaintiff below, appellant here, brought this complaint, alleging that the defendant received certain property in trust to pay $446,849, of which sum $49,000 was due to plaintiff's assignors, and the remaining sum to the trustee. It did not appear from the terms of the deed of trust, whether the $49,000, was included in the gross sum named in the deed of trust as protected by the deed. It became necessary for plaintiff to establish this fact by parol evidence, and such evidence being introduced, the defendant was then allowed to show by parol proof that advances made by the trustee, debts assumed by him, and expenses incurred were to be first paid out of the sum realized on the sale of the trust property, and that such sum had not been sufficient to discharge such preferred claims. Upon this proof the Circuit Court of the United States, to which the cause was removed from the Superior Court of the State of California for the City and County of San Francisco, dismissed the bill, from which decree this appeal was taken. The appellee was appointed administrator of the estate of the defendant, who died after the appeal, and entered his appearance.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The amount secured to be paid by the deed of trust executed on the first day of October, 1870, by Juana M. Estudillo and others to Theodore LeRoy, was $446,849 in gold coin of the United States. Whether that sum included the $49,000 which is alleged to be due to Patterson, Wilson, Crittenden and Felton, for legal services rendered, cannot be determined by anything in the deed itself. The plaintiff, who sues as assignee of the claims of said attorneys, is compelled to resort to parol evidence to show that the parties to the deed intended to provide for the payment of the $49,000 out of the proceeds of the sale of the trust property, and to that end included it in the aggregate of $446,849. If that evidence was competent, it was the right of the defendant to show by parol evidence that the intention of the parties was to apply the proceeds of sale to the reimbursement of LeRoy for all advances and payments made and expenses incurred by him, before anything was paid on the claims of the attorneys. Looking at all the evidence, we are satisfied that these propositions are sustained, namely; 1. That the $49,000 was embraced in [265] the $446,849; 2. The former sum was not to be paid until LeRoy was reimbursed the entire amount due and to become due to him on account of principal, interest, advances, and expenses. That the sales of the trust property fell short of meeting these latter demands, by a large amount, is clearly established by the record of the suit in which the accounts of the trustee were audited and settled, and by other evidence in this cause.

Upon the whole case we think the decree was right, and it is affirmed.

JOHN W. GRAYSON.

Removal of causes—separable controversy—necessary party.

Grayson filed a bill against the appellant and the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, in the latter of which corporations he was a stockholder, asking that a lease made by the latter company to the former be declared void and that the latter company be enjoined from issuing stock and raising funds for the purpose of paying for the cancellation of the lease. On a petition for removal filed by the appellant, alleging that it was a citizen of Tennessee and Grayson a citizen of Alabama, held:

1. That the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company was a necessary party defendant to the controversy.

2. That there was no separate controversy between the appellant and the appellee.

Submitted Nov. 8, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Alabama. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. W. M. Baxter, for appellant.

Messrs. Henry E. Davis, F. P. Ward and R. W. Walker, for appellee:

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [241] ion of the court;

This is an appeal from an order remanding a suit in equity which had been removed from the Chancery Court of the Eastern Division of the State of Alabama. The bill was filed by John W. Grayson, a citizen of Alabama, and a stockholder of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, "in his own behalf, and in behalf of all other stockholders * * * who may come in and contribute to the expenses," against the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the States of Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi, and the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of Tennessee and Georgia. The bill was filed August 31, 1882, and alleged that on the second of June, 1877, the Memphis and Charleston Company executed what purported to be a lease of its railroad and [242] appurtenances to the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company for a period of twenty years from July 1, 1877; that this lease was modified in some particulars December 2, 1879; that neither the lease nor the modification were within the corporate power or authority of either of the parties thereto; that, notwithstanding this, the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company had taken possession of and was operating the leased railroad; that Grayson, the complainant, was not present, either in person or by proxy, at any meeting of the stockholders of the Memphis and Charleston Company, if any there ever had been, when the lease was authorized or approved; that he had never consented thereto, and his rights as a stockholder "are in nowise affected by any such action of a stockholders' meeting at which he was not present, in which he did not participate, and in which his stock was not represented—such action being ultra vires and without legal authority;" that at a meeting of the stockholders of the Memphis and Charleston Company, on the 22d of August, 1882, a resolution was adopted authorizing the directors to appoint a committee to meet the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company and arrange for a cancellation of the lease, it being understood that the last named Company would surrender its rights as lessee on payment of $400,000: that the resolution was adopted under the influence of the belief that upon the payment of this amount the lease would be abrogated; that at the same meeting a further resolution was adopted authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars of additional stock to be sold at eight cents on the dollar to raise the amount to be paid the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company, in case the proposed arrangement was carried out; that Grayson, the complainant, voted against both these resolutions; that, on a fair settlement of the accounts between the two Companies for the operations of the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company during the time it had been in possession under the lease, a large sum would be found due to the Memphis and Charleston Company; and that the directors of the Memphis and Charles-

[243] ton Company will not, and Grayson, the complainant, cannot, bring a suit in the name of the company to have the lease set aside. The prayer of the bill is for a cancellation of the lease, for an account, and for an injunction to restrain the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company from operating the road, and the Memphis and Charleston Company from paying $400,000 or any other sum for the cancellation of the lease, and from issuing the new stock to raise the money to make the payment.

On the 4th of September, 1883, the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company filed a petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States, on the ground that the Company is a citizen of Tennessee, and Grayson a citizen of Alabama, and "there is a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined between them; to wit, a controversy between the said petitioner and the said John W. Grayson." The circuit court, on motion, remanded the cause, and that order is now here for review.

We are unable to distinguish this case from that of N. J. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Mills, 118 U. S. 249 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 949]. It is brought by a stockholder of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, in behalf of himself and any other stockholders who will contribute to the expenses, to set aside a lease made by that corporation to the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad Company, in excess of its corporate powers, and to restrain the Memphis and Charleston Company from carrying into effect a resolution of its stockholders authorizing a settlement with the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company, by the payment of $400,000, to secure a cancellation of the lease. The bill was filed by one of the minority stockholders nine days after the resolution in favor of the settlement was passed, and one of its objects is to defeat this action of the majority. Under these circumstances it is clear that the Memphis and Charleston Company is not a mere formal party, or a party in the same interest with Grayson, but is rightly and necessarily a defendant. The corporation, as a corporation, has determined, by a vote of its stock-[244] holders, to pay $400,000, which it proposes to raise by a ruinous sale of stock, to get rid of a lease that Grayson insists is void and ought to be annulled without any payment whatever, and the lessee brought to an acconnt.

Neither is there a separate controversy in the case between the complainant and the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company. The principal purpose of the suit is to set aside the lease for want of authority to make it. For that purpose both the lessor and lessee are necessary parties. Grayson is not suing for the Memphis and Charleston Company, but for himself. It is true a decree in his favor may be for the advantage of the Memphis and Charleston Company, but he does not represent the company in its corporate capacity, and has no authority to do so. As a stockholder, he seeks protection from the illegal acts of his own company as well as the other. According to the allegations of the bill, it may fairly be inferred that a majority of the stockholders of the Memphis and Charleston Company have combined with the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Company to sacrifice the rights of the minority, and this suit is in behalf of the minority to protect themselves against this unlawful and fraudulent combination. Left to themselves, the two Companies will settle on a basis that will be ruinous to the interest of Grayson and those in like situation with himself. This he seeks to prevent.

In the argument it is suggested that this case differs from that of the N. J. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Mills, in the fact that in that the two corporations joined in an answer insisting on the validity of the lease, and in this nothing of the kind has been done. But here the allegations of the bill, which, for the purposes of the present inquiry, must be considered as confessed, are to the effect that the two companies are acting in harmony upon the question of validity, and that, unless restrained, the Memphis and Charleston Company will make a settlement which will be greatly to the injury of its minority stockholders, of whom this complainant is one. This is certainly the equivalent of the joint answer in the other case.

The order remanding the case is affirmed.

WILLAMETTE WOOLEN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 191-199.)

Corporations—authority to mortgage franchises and powers—construction of charter.

The sixth section of appellant's charter, which provided that the Corporation "shall have the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River, and may use, rent or sell the same, or any portion thereof as it may deem expedient," conferred upon the Company the right to mortgage "the power to bring water from the Santiam River," and also the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water from said river. A mortgage executed by the Company created a lien upon such powers and franchises.

Argued and submitted Nov. 9, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. George H. Williams, for appellant:

Corporations have none of the elements of sovereignty, and can have and exercise only such powers as are expressly conferred on them by the Act of incorporation, and such implied powers as are necessary to enable them to perform their prescribed duties.

Black v. Del. & R. Canal Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 130; Thomas v. West J. R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 950).

The Act of incorporation confers upon the Company "power to purchase, receive and possess lands, goods, chattels and effects of every kind, the same to use and dispose of at pleasure;" and "shall have the exclusive right to hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River, and may use, rent, or sell the same, or any portion thereof, as it may deem expedient." Its power to sell is defined, and does not include the power to dispose of its franchise; and the Act makes no provision for "assigns," and therefore the Corporation cannot merge itself into any "assigns," or confer upon them its corporate powers and functions. The right to take private property for its use upon paying a just compensation therefor is granted, and this was within the power of the Legislature.

Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 9 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 889).

The power not being conferred upon "the assigns" of the Company, the Corporation cannot, by the action of its directors, confer this right of eminent domain upon the Bank of British Columbia, a foreign corporation, or upon a private individual. The consent of the sovereign power would be necessary.

1 Bl. Com. 472.

The franchise of becoming and being a corporation is in its nature incommunicable by the act of the parties, and incapable of passing by assignment.

Commonwealth v. Smith, 10 Allen, 448; Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Commissioners, 112 U. S. 609 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 837); Hall v. Sullivan R. R. 21 Law Rep. 138; 2 Redf. Am. R. S. 217 (23:860), Branch v. Jesup, 106 U. S. 468 (27:279).

There can be no distinction between railroad cases and this, resting on the ground that the former are quasi public corporations, and the defendant Corporation not of that description.

This suit is to enforce that part of the contract which remains executory, and therefore the Corporation can set up the plea of ultra vires.

Thomas v. West J. R. R. Co. supra.

This is not a misuse of an admitted power, but an act not within the scope of the powers of the Corporation to perform under any circumstance or for any purpose.

This Corporation has not been dissolved. The insolvency of a corporation does not extinguish its legal existence.

Nor does the assignment or sale of the property dissolve a corporation created by special charter.

Mr. J. N. Dolph, for appellee:

That which was mortgaged by the appellant was in no sense a franchise. The power to condemn land for a right of way was the power to exercise a temporary franchise which, when the right of way was acquired, was exhausted, and the right of way, and the right to take water from the Santiam, became the property of the Corporation.

Morgan v. La. 93 U. S. 217 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 860).

By section 2 of its charter, the Corporation was empowered to purchase and receive and possess lands, goods, chattels and effects of every kind, and to dispose of them at pleasure. Whatever rights to the beneficial use of the waters of the Santiam River the Corporation acquired under the fifth section of its charter, whether the same was property, as distinguishable from its franchise, or not, it was expressly empowered to sell, in whole or in part, by the sixth section of its charter. This power to sell includes the power to sell the right to take the water, together with the means of conducting the same to the place where it is to be used.

Sheets v. Selden's Lessee, 2 Wall. 187 (Bk. 17, L. ed. 825).

The power of a corporation to sell its property and franchise includes the power to mortgage the same.

E. Boston Freight Co. v. Eastern R. R. Co. 13 Allen, 422; McAllister v. Plant, 54 Miss. 106; Sessions v. Bacon, 23 Miss. 272; Stone v. Montgomery, 35 Miss. 83.

Every corporation, unless expressly or impliedly prohibited, has the same power as an individual to sell its property, either absolutely or conditionally.

Aurora Agr. & H. Soc. v. Paddock, 80 Ill. 263; Ang. & Ames Corp. 153; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; Thompson v. Lambert, 44 Iowa, 239; Vanarsdall v. State, etc. 65 Ind. 176; 1 Jones, Mort. § 124; 3 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 382, 383; Clark v. *Farmers Woolen Mfg. If it be conceded that the rights in controversy were a part of the franchises of the appellant, it still had power to mortgage the same.

The appellant is estopped from denying its power to mortgage the portion of its property in controversy. It received and seeks to retain the benefit of the loan secured by the mortgage, and it cannot set up its want of power to execute it, to deprive appellee of the benefit of its security.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [192]
the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon.

The Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company, the appellant, was incorporated by an Act of the Territorial Legislature of Oregon on the 17th day of December, 1856, which Act is in the following language:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon, That George H. Williams, Alfred Stanton, Joseph Watt, Joseph Holman, Daniel Waldo, William H. Rector, E. M. Barnum, J. G. Wilson, and J. D. Boon, and their associates, stockholders in the joint stock Company known as the 'Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company,' and their successors, are hereby declared a body [193] corporate and politic by the name and style of the 'Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company,' for the purpose of creating and improving water powers and privileges, and manufacturing; and the present organization of said joint stock Company shall continue until changed by said Corporation.

"Sec. 2. Said Corporation shall have power to purchase, receive and possess, lands, goods, chattels, and effects of every kind, the same to use and dispose of at pleasure; to contract and be contracted with; to sue and be sued; to have a common seal, and the same to use and change at pleasure; and to ordain and establish such by-laws and regulations as it may deem expedient for its own government and the efficient management of its affairs, consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of this Territory.

"Sec. 3. The capital stock of said Corporation shall not exceed two hundred thousand dollars, and shall be divided into shares of not less than one hundred dollars each, transferable as its by-laws may provide.

hold and have, and may enforce by legal remedies, all claims and obligations due or to become due, given or that may be given to said Company; and all stock due or to become due to said Company shall be payable to and collected by said Corporation; and the individual members of said Corporation shall each and singular be liable for the corporate debts of said Company, contracted while a member of the same, to the amount of his share of the corporate property.

"Sec. 5. Said Corporation shall have power to bring water from the Santiam River to any place or places in or near Salem, to be brought as far as practicable through the channel or the valley of Mill Creek; and for such purpose may enter upon lands and also said creek, and do all things proper and suitable for a safe, direct and economical conveyance of water as aforesaid; but said Corporation shall do no unnecessary injury to private property, and shall be answerable in damages to any person whose property is injured by its acts.

"Sec. 6. Said Corporation shall have the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River, and may use, rent, or sell the same, or any portion thereof, as it may deem expedient. [194]

The present suit was brought by the Bank of British Columbia against that Corporation to foreclose a mortgage executed by it on the 24th day of August, 1875, to secure the payment of promissory notes made by the Company, amounting originally to over $80,000, of which, at the time of bringing the suit, only about $15,000 remained unpaid. To the bill of foreclosure the defendant, in the circuit court, filed an answer and a plea. The plea, which raises the only question in issue here, is as follows:

"And for a further defense and plea to said bill of complaint, said defendant, the Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company alleges that it is now, and continuously for more than twenty years next last past has been, incorporated under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Oregon, passed December 17, 1856, and entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company.' That the fifth section of said Act provides as follows, viz.:

"'Sec. 5. Said Corporation shall have power to bring water from the Santiam River to any place or places in or near Salem, to be brought as far as practicable through the channel or the valley of Mill Creek; and for such purpose may enter upon lands and also said creek, and do all things proper and suitable for a safe, direct, and economical conveyance of water as aforesaid; but said Corporation shall do no unnecessary injury to private property, and shall be answerable in damages to any person whose property is injured by its acts.'

"That the rights and powers enumerated in said section five of said Act, and thereby conferred upon defendant, constitute the personal and exclusive franchise of defendant as such Corporation, and that said mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's bill of complaint included said franchise, and of right ought by this honorable court to be declared null and void and of no effect so far as the same includes said franchise. That it is necessary to the use, enjoyment, and maintenance of defendant's said franchise that defendant shall have and retain the exclusive use and enjoyment of all the property mentioned and described in plaintiff's mortgage, set out in said bill of complaint, which relates to the power to bring water from said Santiam River to said Salem." [195]

That court overruled the plea, and decree was rendered for the plaintiff, ordering a sale of all the mortgaged property upon failure to pay the sum found due within a reasonable time. Sale was accordingly made by the commissioner appointed for the purpose, and the Manufacturing Company brought this case here on appeal.

The assignments of error made in this court are as follows:

"The court below erred:

"1. In holding that the mortgage was valid as to the franchise created by said section five of the Act.

"2. In entering a decree for the sale of said franchise.

"3. In determining said question in the affirmative.

"4. In holding that said Corporation had power to devest itself of its corporate franchise by mortgage, sale, or otherwise, without the consent of the Legislature of Oregon."

The mortgage commences its granting clause, descriptive of the property conveyed, by saying that the said Corporation "doth hereby grant, bargain, sell, assign, transfer, set over, and convey unto the party of the second part" —meaning the Bank—"its assigns, successors, and representatives, all the following real property lying and being situate in the County of Marion, and State of Oregon, more particularly described as follows, to wit:" Then follows a minute description by metes and bounds and courses and distances of the realty upon which the mill property of the party of the first part now stands. "The design hereof being to convey the entire parcel of realty, together with the tenements and buildings, together with all and singular the machinery of every kind used therein or thereabout. Also the power to bring water from the Santiam River to any place or places in or near Salem, the same to be brought as far as practicable through the channels or the valley of Mill Creek, and for such purposes may enter upon lands, and also said creek, and do all things proper and suitable for a safe and economical conveyance of water as aforesaid; also the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water from the Santiam River; also all the rights and powers of the said party of the first part in and to the water rights, powers, and privileges obtained under its charter or articles of incorporation, including all rights and property of kindred character acquired by said party of the first part in any way or from any person since the incorporation aforesaid. Also all that tract or parcel of realty upon which the party of the first part has now in operation a sash factory"—giving a full description of it—"together with all the rights of way now owned by said party of the first part, as appurtenant to or necessary to the [196] use or enjoyment of said rights, privileges, and easements in the water aforesaid, together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining," etc.

The decree of the court finds "that the defendant Corporation, the Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company, did have full authority and power to make and execute the mortgage now here sought to be foreclosed, and that it conferred upon the plaintiff Corporation, by said mortgage, a lien upon all its right and power, under said territorial Act, to take water from the Santiam River in upon its franchise touching the taking, carrying, and using of said water, and all the rights, privileges, and uses incident thereto," and orders a sale of the property as mortgaged, unless the defendant Company pay the sum of $15,606.51 within thirty days from the date of the decree.

The right of the Corporation to make a mortgage which should cover everything described in this mortgage under ordinary Acts of incorporation, or the provisions usually found in such Acts, might be an interesting question. It also admits of doubt whether the mortagor Corporation in this case intended, by the use of the general language found in this instru-[197] ment describing what was conveyed, to transfer all of the powers, the privileges, and the franchises conferred upon it by its charter. It was undoubtedly desirable, in making this mortgage, that if it became necessary to sell under it, the purchaser, in getting the realty, the houses, the mills, the manufacturing machinery, the conduits through which the water power came to operate upon that machinery, and all the tangible property necessary to the use of that water power, should also get the privilege of using it; and so far as the privilege of using that particular water appropriated to these mills was a franchise or special grant to the Corporation, it was intended to be conveyed in the mortgage. For all the powers which it was necessary to exercise in the use of this water as a manufacturing motive power, the Woolen Company intended to create a lien upon the property it mortgaged.

But there were franchises created by the Act of incorporation which would be of no value to the purchaser, which, in the nature of things, could not be transferred to it, and which were not intended to be transferred to it. Obviously among these was the right to exist as a Corporation. The sale under the decree of foreclosure did not annihilate the Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company so that it no longer had any existence. Nor was its power to make contracts, to sue and be sued, to have a common seal, to buy other lands and sell them, to make by-laws, and to do many other things which an incorporated body can do, and which are described in the second section of its charter, ended with such sale. Nor is it at all clear that, if it had sold outright the property which it mortgaged to this Company, it would not have still had the right to take other water from the Santiam River and conduct it to other mills and other places for the purposes of manufacture, provided it did not interfere with or limit the water and the use of the water which it had sold.

It is, however, unnecessary to examine these matters very critically. The charter itself seems to have given unlimited power to the Company to sell everything it had, including its exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River. Such is the express language of the sixth section of the charter. Describing what it is that is granted to this [198] Corporation with regard to the water and its use, and in the same language, what it may do in the way of disposing of it, it says, "said Corporation shall have the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River, and may use, rent, or sell the same, or any portion thereof, as it may deem expedient."

There seems to be here no limitation upon the power of the Corporation to dispose of whatever it acquired under the statute which called it into being. Describing in the same sentence that it shall have "the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges created by the water which it takes from the Santiam River," it declares that it "may use, rent, or sell the same," which means all of it; and to show that it does mean all of it, there is added after the words "sell the same," the further clause, "or any portion thereof, as it may deem expedient."

It is hardly necessary to say that this right to sell in these general and strong terms, or to rent or to use it, must include the power to mortgage it. A mortgage is in effect a sale with a power of defeasance, which may ultimately end in an absolute transfer of the title. This language is in its nature inconsistent with a limitation upon the power of the Company to transfer its rights and privileges. If there is anything peculiar in the word franchise it must include, in any definition that can be given it, this word "privileges;" especially when the statute speaks of "the exclusive right to the hydraulic powers and privileges."

As we have already said, it would be unprofitable to go into an inquiry of how far the Corporation could have transferred these exclusive rights and privileges to anybody else, and how far it could have devested itself of them, and of its power to use them, if no such language had been in the charter. But the supreme legislative power, which had the right to make this Corporation, and to which it would be subject more or less in its exercise of the powers conferred upon it, has also said, as it had a right to say, that it may sell these privileges, may part with them, and may transfer them to other persons, and we think this language is sufficient warrant for anything actually conveyed by the mortgage and by the decree of the court.

The decree is therefore affirmed.

MOSES R. CROW, Plff. in Err.,
v.
TOWNSHIP OF OXFORD.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 215–226.)

Municipal bonds—reference in to statute—owner bound to take notice of statutory requirements—of official records when—Kansas Acts of March 1, 2, 1872—registration under latter Act.

In an action on bonds issued by the Township of Oxford, Kansas, held:

1. That the plaintiff, being referred by the recitals in his bonds to the Act of March 1, 1872, as the statute under which they were issued, was bound (McClure v. Oxford, bk. 24) to take notice of that statute and of all its requirements, and if, finding the bonds invalid under that statute, he claims the right to refer to the Act of March 2, 1872, as the source of authority, he was bound to take notice of the requirements of that statute.

2. That though the plaintiff was a bona fide holder, he was, in the absence of recitals in the bonds to protect him, bound by the information open to him in the official records of the officers whose names were signed to the bonds, and such records showed proceedings not in conformity with the Act of March 2, and the recitals of the bonds excluded the possibility that they were issued under that Act.

3. That the registration of the bonds by the State Auditor, purporting to be done under the Act of March 2, 1872, and his certificate upon the bonds that they were regularly issued, etc., was not conclusive of the fact as to whether or not they were issued under the Act of March 2.

Submitted Oct. 25, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. S. E. Brown, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. Wade McDonald, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas, by Moses R. Crow against the Township of Oxford, in the County of Sumner, and State of Kansas, to recover the amount of ten bonds, of $500 each, issued by that Township, and one hundred forty coupons, of $25 each, cut from those bonds, being in all $8,500. It was tried before the court, without a jury; a special finding of facts was made, and a judgment was rendered for the defendant. The plaintiff has sued out a writ of error.

The defendant, on the 15th of April, 1872, made twenty bonds for $500 each. Coupons cut from some of those bonds were the subject of the suit of McClure v. Oxford, 94 U. S. 429 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 129]. The bonds and coupons involved in the present suit are all of the forms of the bond and coupon set out in the report of the McClure case, and each bond has indorsed on it, of the date of April 25, 1872, a certificate duly signed by, and attested by the seal of office of, the Auditor of the State of Kansas, the certificate being in the form of that contained in the report of the McClure case.

The bonds were made for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, at the town of Oxford, in the Township of Oxford; and were issued and delivered in payment for eighty-five shares, of $100 each, of the stock of the Oxford Bridge Company, a corporation which erected the bridge, for which the Township subscribed, and which it has ever since owned and held. The Township paid interest on the bonds up to April 15, 1877. It received dividends on the stock, amounting to about $650 per annum, from October, 1872, till June, 1876. The following proceedings were had and taken by the trustee, treasurer, and clerk of the township, on the following dates, as shown by the public records of the township:

Township board met.

Present: George T. Walton, trustee, and John H. Folks, clerk.

The fact being known to the clerk that an Act authorizing a majority of the township board to issue bonds for $10,000, and to subscribe stock in the Oxford Bridge Company, after giving notice thereof, and the voters of Oxford Township voting thereon, was passed and approved on the first day of March, 1872, and believing that, owing to the danger of a June freshet, injuring or preventing work and increasing the cost of said bridge, and believing the law only required 20 days' notice, it was ordered that such notice be given immediately, which notice was given by written notices posted on Clark's store, on the postoffice at Stanton's store, and at the schoolhouse in Oxford, believed to be three of the most public places in the Township.

GEORGE T. WALTON, Trustee.
JOHN H. FOLKS, Clerk.

MARCH 24TH, 1872.

At a special meeting of the Board of Oxford Township, held this day—George T. Walton, trustee, and John H. Folks present—a copy of the—Commonwealth was presented, in which the law relating to the bridge bonds was published, in which it was made necessary to give 30 days' notice thereon. It was ordered that said election be held on the 8th day of April, 1872, and additional notices were appended to the original notice posted as above stated, so continuing the time until the said 8th day of April.

GEORGE T. WALTON, Trustee.

April 8th, 1872.

At a special election held in pursuance of notices and of the Act of March 1, 1872, authorizing the trustee, treasurer and clerk, or any two of them, of the Township of Oxford, County of Sumner, and State of Kansas, to subscribe stock in the Oxford Bridge Company to the amount of $10,000, to aid in the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, at Oxford, in said county and State, and to issue bonds of said Township in payment thereof; George T. Walton, Edward Slay, Sr., and James Thompson, judges; and James O. Carpenter and W. H. Knapp, clerks. Whole number of electors voting, 140; for the bridge and bonds, 126; against the bridge and bonds, 14. Walton to return poll-books.

GEORGE T. WALTON, Trustee.
JOHN H. FOLKS, Clerk.

April 10th, 1872.

At a meeting of the trustee and clerk of Oxford Township, to take into consideration the subscribing of stock in the Oxford Bridge Company—present, George T. Walton, trustee, and John H. Folks, clerk—it was ordered that the [218] said George T. Walton, trustee, and John H. Folks, clerk, do subscribe to the capital stock of the Oxford Bridge Company for such amount of capital stock as the ten-thousand-dollar bonds may purchase, not to be less than eighty-three shares of said stock; and the said George T. Walton and John H. Folks are further authorized to vote the number of votes said Township shall be entitled to, at any meeting of stockholders of said bridge company, during their continuance in office, in pursuance of law. Also ordered, that a copy of said law be sealed in this book. GEORGE T. WALTON, Trustee.

JOHN H. FOLKS, Clerk.
April 12th, 1872.

At a meeting of the Board of Oxford Township, George T. Walton, trustee, T. E. Clark, treasurer, and John H. Folks, clerk, were present, and subscribed the said bonds to the Oxford Bridge & Ferry Company, and participated in the stockholders' meeting of said company, for and on behalf of the said Township; and George T. Walton, T. E. Clark and John H. Folks were elected directors of said Oxford Bridge & Ferry Company. Said township board authorized William J. Hobson to procure the printing of suitable bonds, and also authorized said William J. Hobson to contract the sale of said bridge bonds at not less than 83 cents, and such higher amount as he may be able to procure; and it was further agreed by said William J. Hobson, in behalf of C. Baker & Co., that, if he shall not be able to sell said bonds for 83 cents or over, the said C. Baker & Co. will take said bonds in payment for the township stock, at 83 cents on the dollar, and make a good and sufficient bond to Oxford Township, conditioned that said company will build said bridge, in all respects, in conformity to contract this day signed by the said C. Baker & Co and the directors of said Oxford Bridge & Ferry Company, said bond to be delivered to the township board of Oxford Township, and the bridge bonds to be delivered to said William J. Hobson as soon as may be after said bonds are printed.
GEORGE T. WALTON, Trustee.

No other proceedings were had or taken by or before the township board in respect to issuing the bonds, except that, on April 8, 1872, an election was held in the Township on the question, with the result set forth on the face of the bonds. The bridge was erected by the corporation, and was maintained as a toll bridge until it was destroyed by water on June 9, 1876.

The plaintiff owns and holds the bonds and coupons sued on, having purchased them before their maturity, for value, without actual notice of any defense to them or of any defect or infirmity in the proceedings for issuing them.

The petition of the plaintiff alleged that the bonds were issued in pursuance of an election held in the Township in conformity with an Act of the Legislature of Kansas, passed March 2, 1872, chapter 68.

A special Act of the Legislature of Kansas, approved March 1, 1872, chapter 158, entitled as set forth on the face of the bonds, authorized the trustee, treasurer and clerk of Oxford Township, or any two of them, to issue the bonds of the Township, to the amount of $10,000, for the purpose of aiding in building such bridge. It required that the bonds should be in sums not less than $500, payable in ten years from the date of issuing, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, in the City of New York; that interest coupons should be attached, signed by the trustee and attested by the clerk; that the bonds should contain a statement of the purpose for which they were issued, and the result of the vote of the inhabitants of the Township on the question of issuing the bonds; that before any of the bonds should be issued, the question of issuing them should be submitted to the legal voters of the Township, at an election for that purpose; that the time and place of holding the election should be designated by the trustee, treasurer, and clerk, or any two of them, "by giving at least thirty days' notice, by posting written or printed notices thereof in three of the most public places in said Township; and that if, at the election, a majority of the votes should be for the bridge and bonds, the bonds should be issued." Section 7 of the Act was as follows: "This Act shall take effect from and after its [220] publication in the Kansas Weekly Commonwealth." It was published in the Kansas Weekly Commonwealth, March 21, 1872.

The Act passed March 2, 1872, chapter 68, referred to in the petition as the Act in conformity with which the election was held in pursuance of which the bonds were issued, was an Act approved March 2, 1872, section 24 of which provided that it should "take effect and be in force from and after its publication in the Kansas Weekly Commonwealth." It was published in the Kansas Weekly Commonwealth, March 7, 1872. It bore the title set forth in the auditor's certificate indorsed on the bonds, and was the Act therein referred to. It was a general law applicable to all counties, cities and townships. It embraced bridges, railroads and water power. It authorized the issuing of bonds to build bridges, and also as donations, and to pay for stock, in aid of railroads and bridges. It graded the amount of bonded debt by taxable property. It allowed bonds of not less than $100, required them to be payable in the City of New York, in not less than five nor more than thirty years from their date, with interest not to exceed 10 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, on coupons, the bonds, if issued by a township, to be signed by the township trustee and attested by the township clerk. The bonds could not be issued unless ordered by a vote of the qualified electors of the township. To procure such vote, a petition was required, signed by at least one fifth of the voters of the township, to be presented to the trustee, clerk and treasurer, asking for a vote; and they were to call an election to be held within 30 days thereafter, and to give notice of it by publication, for at least three consecutive weeks, in each newspaper published in the township, and, if none were published, by posting up written or printed notices in at least 5 public places in each voting precinct in the township, for at least 20 days preceding the election, the notice to set forth the time and place of holding the election, the bridge proposed to be built, and whether the aid was to be by donation or taking stock.

The question of the validity of the bonds involved in the McClure case was there passed [221] upon by this court. No question was there presented as to their validity under the Act of March 2, 1872, or as to their having been issued under that Act, and not under the Act of March 1, 1872. It was there held that as the Act of March 1, 1872, did not go into effect till it was published, and it was not published till March 21, 1872, and required 30 days' notice of the election, and as the bonds were dated April 15, 1872, and stated that the election was held April 8, 1872, and gave the title of the Act, and the date of its approval, their invalidity appeared on their face, in connection with the terms of the Act, because 30 days had not elapsed between the time the law took effect and the day of the election.

It is contended for the plaintiff in the present case, that, as the Act of March 2, 1872, took effect on March 7, 1872, the day before the commencement of the proceedings for an election, and there was an interval of full 30 days between March 8, 1872, and April 8, 1872, the day of the election, there was legislative authority under the Act of March 2, 1872, for all that was done. It is urged that in the McClure case no reference was made, in the record or in the arguments of counsel, to the latter Act, and that the question, as to the validity of the bonds under that Act is not controlled by the decision in the McClure case. The whole point of the contention in favor of the validity of the bonds is based on the proposition that the bonds were in fact issued under the authority of, and in compliance with, the provisions of the Act of March 2, 1872, instead of the Act of March 1, 1872.

The plaintiff, being referred by the bonds to the Act of March 1, 1872, as the statute under which they were issued, was bound, as was said in the McClure case, to take notice of the statute and of all its requirements. If, finding the bonds invalid under that statute, as he is held by law to have done, he claims the right to refer to the Act of March 2, 1872, as the source of authority, because that Act was in force from March 7, 1872, he was bound to take notice of the requirements of that Act. Looking at them, he was met by the fact that that Act required that the proceedings should be initiated by a petition of voters to the trustee, clerk, and treasurer of the township, and be [222] followed by the publication of the notice of election for three consecutive weeks in each newspaper, if any, published in the township; and if none were published, then by the posting of written or printed notices in at least five public places in each voting precinct in the township, for at least twenty days preceding the election. These proceedings were all variant from those to be had under the Act of March 1, 1872, which did not require any prior petition of voters, nor any newspaper publication of the notice, but only a posting of notices, and those only in three public places in the township, and not in five public places in each voting precinct in the township. Looking at the public records of the Township, he was met by the following facts: The proceedings made no reference to the Act of March 2, 1872, or to any petition of voters, but stated that they were taken under the Act of March 1, 1872, and that the officers gave thirty days' notice of election by posting written notices in only three public places in the Township. Even though the plaintiff purchased the bonds and coupons, as the finding of facts says, "before their maturity, for value, without actual notice of any defense to them, or of any defect or infirmity in the proceedings for issuing them," he was, in the absence of such recitals in the bonds as would protect him, bound by the information open to him in the official records of the officers whose names were signed to the bonds. The recitals in the bonds could not avail him, because as to the only Act recited, that of March 1, 1872, that Act was not in force long enough before the election to allow the required notice to be given; and, as to the Act of March 2, 1872, the records, which showed proceedings not in conformity with it, and the bonds, by the absence of all reference to it, and by their recitals as to the Act of March 1, 1872, excluded the possibility that the town officers issued the bonds, or intended to issue them, under the authority of, or in pursuance of, the Act of March 2, 1872. The statement in the bonds that they were issued "in pursuance of a vote of the qualified electors of said township, had at an election held therein on the eighth day of April, A. D. 1872, which said election resulted in a majority of 112 in favor of issuing said bonds in a total [223] vote of 140," can refer only to an election held under the Act of March 1, 1872, before recited in the bond by its title and date, which was an illegal election for want of due notice; and the records showed that the election was held under that Act.

The case of Anderson Co. v. Beal, 113 U. S. 227 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 966], is relied on by the plaintiff, but does not aid him. In that case, although the bonds recited the wrong Act, the records of the county officers who issued the bonds did not show any want of compliance with the later Act, but showed a substantial compliance with it, and in fact the proceedings were had and were intended to be had under it. The reference in the bonds to the earlier Act as the source of authority was thus a mere clerical error. In the case at bar, the reference in the bonds to the Act of March 1, 1872, was not a clerical error, and the proceedings were intended to be had under that Act, and the records show a failure to comply with the Act of March 2, 1872, and an attempt to comply only with the Act of March 1, 1872. In the Anderson County case, legislative authority having been given for the issue of bonds by a statute under which the authorities in fact acted, the recital in the bonds, that the bonds were issued in pursuance of the vote of the electors, was effective to cover any irregularity as to notice, which did not appear of record, but was sought to be proved aliunde. In the present case, no such doctrine is applicable.

In Commissioners v. January, 94 U. S. 202 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 110], an Act was recited in the bonds which had been repealed by a later Act. The order for the election was made while the earlier Act was in force. The election was held after its repeal, and after the new Act went into force, but there was no new order of election. Otherwise, all the proceedings after the new Act went into force were in conformity with it. It was held that a recital in the bonds that they were issued "in pursuance of, and in accordance with, the vote of a majority of the qualified electors of the county" "at a regular election, held on" a day named, estopped the county from raising the objection of the want of an order under the new Act, although the old Act, and not the new Act, was recited in the [224] bonds, as the statute authority. We think that case is distinguished from the present one by the fact that in it all the proceedings after the new law took effect were in conformity with it, while in the case at bar, none of the proceedings were in conformity with the Act of March 2, 1872.

Another question is presented in the case before us. Section 14 of the Act of March 2, 1872, provides that the holder of bonds issued under it shall, within 30 days after their delivery, present them to the Auditor of State for registration, and that he shall, on being satisfied that the bonds have been issued according to the provisions of the Act, and that the signatures thereto of the officers signing the same are genuine, register them in a book, "and shall, under his seal of office, certify upon such bonds the fact that they have been regularly and legally issued; that the signatures thereto are genuine; and that such bonds have been registered in his office according to law." As each of the bonds in suit has indorsed on it a certificate under the hand and seal of office of the Auditor of the State of Kansas, dated April 25, 1872, certifying that it "has been regularly and legally issued; that the signatures thereto are genuine; and that such bond has been duly registered" in his office, in accordance with the Act of March 2, 1872, giving its title, it is contended, for the defendant, that this certificate concludes all questions as to the regularity and legality of the issuing of the bonds.

In McClure v. Township of Oxford [supra], although the record set forth at length the certificate of the auditor on the bonds, and the brief of the plaintiff in error contended that such certificate was a final and conclusive determination that the bonds were regularly and legally issued, according to the provisions of the Act of March 1, 1872, this court, in its opinion, made no reference to that point. It was argued in that case, for the defendant in error, that the Act of March 2, 1872, as to registration, did not apply to the bonds as bonds issued under the Act of March 1, 1872, and that, if it did, the registration could not, as a recital, aid the want of authority disclosed by the face of the bond.

[225] But now it is contended that the provision for registration in the Act of March, 2, 1872, settles the question, that the bonds were bonds issued under that Act, and were "regularly and legally issued," according to the provisions of that Act. The case of Lewis v. Commissioners, 105 U. S. 739 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 993], is cited as sustaining that view. But we do not so regard it. In that case, section 14 of the Kansas Act of March 2, 1872, was under consideration in regard to the bonds of a county in Kansas, issued, in fact, under that Act, each of which had indorsed on it a certificate by the state auditor, that it had been "regularly and legally issued," and that it had been registered in his office according to law. A defense was set up against a bona fide holder of the bonds, that they had been issued in violation of a condition contained in the popular vote, and were fraudulently parted with by the person in whose hands they were put, to be deposited with the state treasurer in escrow, to await a compliance with the condition. This court held, as to the effect of the registration, that the determination by the auditor involved an investigation as to every fact essential to the validity of the bonds; that the bona fide purchaser was not bound, under the circumstances disclosed in that case, to find out whether the auditor had ascertained all the facts; and that the auditor was authorized by the statute to inquire whether the bonds were, as a matter of fact, of the class which, under the Act, should have passed through the hands of the state treasurer (it being required by the Act that some should do so, and others not), and, also, whether the conditions on which they were deliverable had been performed. But there is nothing in the decision which carries the doctrine further than that the auditor is authorized to ascertain whether the facts exist which the statute requires should exist, to make a valid issue of bonds. That this is so is shown by the case of Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 83 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 360]. In that case, there was an innocent holder of bonds, of a county in Nebraska, and on each bond was indorsed a certificate of the state auditor that the bond was "regularly and legally issued." As against an objection that the bonds were issued in violation of a restriction in the Constitution of the State as to the amount of bonds to be [226] issued, it was held by this court, under a registration statute like that in the present case, that no conclusive effect was given by the statute to the registration or to the certificate; that the certificate was no more comprehensive or efficacious than the statement in the bond; that such statement did not extend to or cover matters of law; and that "a certificate reciting the actual facts, and that thereby the bonds were conformable to the law, when, judicially speaking, they are not, will not make them so, nor can it work an estoppel upon the county to claim the protection of the law."

As the recitals in the bonds here are of no avail to the plaintiff, as before shown, so the certificate of the auditor does not aid him. The bonds on their face excluded the possibility of their having been issued under the Act of March 2, 1872, and as the public records showed that the proceedings were not taken under that Act, and as the auditor was authorized by section 14 of that Act only to register bonds issued under that Act, and as these bonds did not fall within the purview of bonds authorized to be registered by him under section 15 of that Act, it follows that the auditor had no right to decide, as matter of law, that the bonds were bonds of the kind which he was authorized by the Act of March 2, 1872, to register and certify, when, as a matter of law, they were not.

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGE H. WOOSTER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 322–326.)

Bill to restrain, and to recover damages for, infringement of patent—equity jurisdiction—reissued patent,* prima facie *evidence of its validity—established license fee, usual measure of damages.

1. A court of equity has jurisdiction of a bill filed to restrain the infringement of a patent and to recover profits and damages, although the patent expired fifteen days after the bill was filed, when, by the course of the court, an injunction might have been obtained within that time. Whether to retain or dismiss the bill was within the discretion of the court below with which this court will not interfere unless that discretion was illegally exercised.

2. The reissued patent itself, with proof of infringement, made a prima facie case for complainant; and allegations in the answer, that the patent was illegally reissued, required to be proved.

3. Established license fees are the best measure of damages that can be used in patent cases; and the evidence in the present case as to the license fee was sufficient.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Frederick P. Fish and T. L. Livermore, for appellants.

Mr. Frederick H. Betts, for appellee.

This is a suit on a patent, brought by Wooster, the appellee, against the persons composing the firm of Johnson, Clark & Co., of New York, to restrain them from infringing the patent, and to recover profits and damages. The bill was filed on the 20th of December, 1879, and the patent expired fifteen days afterwards. The patent was for folding guides used on sewing machines, and is the same that was involved in the case of Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 105]. It was granted to one Douglas in October, 1858, for a period of fourteen years, was extended in October, 1872, for seven years longer, and was then, in the same month, surrendered and reissued. The bill does not specify the particular ground on which the reissued patent was granted; and although the answer avers that it was unlawfully granted, that the original was surrendered for the purpose of claiming more and other things than were described and claimed in it, and that the reissued patent is not for the same invention for which the original was granted, it does not set out the original, nor was the original put in evidence in the cause, and no evidence was offered to substan-

[324] tiate the allegations of the answer. The complainant produced the reissued patent in evidence and proved infringement. The defendant adduced evidence before the examiner, but out of time, and it was ruled out by the court. A decree was made establishing the patent, and the infringement thereof by the defendants, and referring it to a master to take and state an account of profits, and to assess damages, and the defendants were ordered to produce their books, papers, and devices used, so far as related to the matter in issue. Upon this reference, the parties entered into a stipulation before the master, by which the defendants admitted that they had purchased and disposed of 15,000 folding guides covered by the decree; and in consideration thereof the complainant waived all further testimony as to profits received by the defendants therefrom, and agreed to rely on proof of damages in place of profits. The complainant adduced evidence to show that he had an established license fee of ten cents for each folding guide purchased or disposed of, and had granted licenses at that rate to divers sewing machine companies. The master, being satisfied with this evidence, reported the damages at $1,500. The defendants filed a number of exceptions to the report, none of which were sustained, and a decree was entered for the amount of damages reported. The defendants thereupon appealed.

The points taken by the appellants are:

First. That the court below, sitting as a court of equity, had no jurisdiction of the case, because the complainant had a plain and adequate remedy at law

Second. That the reissue of the patent was illegal by reason of laches in applying for it.

Third. That the court erred in finding that the measure of damages was an established license fee, and that such license fee was proved.

As to the first point, the bill does not show any special ground for equitable relief, except the prayer for an injunction. To this the complainant was entitled, even for the short time the patent had to run, unless the court had deemed it improper to grant it. If, by the course of the court, no injunction could have been obtained in that time, the bill could very properly have been dismissed, and ought to [325] have been. But by the rules of the court in which the suit was brought, only four days' notice of application for an injunction was required. Whether one was applied for does not appear. But the court had jurisdiction of the case, and could retain the bill, if in its discretion it saw fit to do so, which it did. It might have dismissed the bill, if it had deemed it inexpedient to grant an injunction; but that was a matter in its own sound discretion, and with that discretion it is not our province to interfere, unless it was exercised in a manner clearly illegal. We see no illegality in the manner of its exercise in this case. The jurisdiction had attached, and although, after it attached, the principal ground for issuing an injunction may have ceased to exist by the expiration of the patent, yet there might be other grounds for the writ arising from the possession by the defendants of folding guides illegally made or procured whilst the patent was in force. The general allegations of the bill were sufficiently comprehensive to meet such a case. But even without that, if the case was one for equitable relief when the suit was instituted, the mere fact that the ground for such relief expired by the expiration of the patent would not take away the jurisdiction, and preclude the court from proceeding to grant the incidental relief which belongs to cases of that sort. This has often been done in patent causes, and a large number of cases may be cited to that effect; and there is nothing in the decision in Root v. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 975] to the contrary. Cotton Tie Co. v. Simmons, 106 U. S. 89 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 79]; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Car-Brake Co. 110 U. S. 229 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 129]; Consolidated Valve Co. v. Crosby Valve Co. 113 U. S. 157 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 939]; Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 105]. It is true that where a party alleges equitable ground for relief and the allegations are not sustained, as where a bill is founded on an allegation of fraud, which is not maintained by the proofs, the bill will be dismissed in toto, both as to the relief sought against the alleged fraud, and that which is sought as incidental thereto.

The point insisted on, that the bill contained no charge of continued infringement, or of infringement at the time of commencing the suit, if it were material, is not sustained by the fact. The bill does contain such a charge.

[326] As the court had jurisdiction at the inception of the suit, even though upon a narrow ground, yet, as the defendants did not ask the dismissal of the bill on the ground of want of jurisdiction, we should be very reluctant, if we had the power, now, on an appeal, after the case has been tried and determined, to reverse the decree.

The second point raised was substantially disposed of in the case of Thomson v. Wooster, qua supra. The allegations in the present bill are the same as they were in that case. Neither the bill nor the proofs show any thing from which the court can infer that the reissue was illegally granted; and the allegations of the answer are unsupported by evidence. The reissued patent itself made a prima facie case for the complainant. The allegations of the answer, that it was issued for the mere purpose of expanding the claim of the original, and that it was for another and different invention, should have been proved. But we have no evidence on the subject, not even the original patent with which to compare the reissue. This point, therefore, is wholly without foundation.

The third point, as to the measure of damages and the want of proof thereof, is equally untenable. It is a general rule in patent causes, that established license fees are the best measure of damages that can be used. There may be damages beyond this, such as the expense and trouble the plaintiff has been put to by the defendant, and any special inconvenience he has suffered from the wrongful acts of the defendant; but these are more properly the subjects of allowance by the court under the authority given to it to increase the damages.

As to the sufficiency of the proof, we see no occasion to disturb the conclusion reached by the master on this point. The complainant proved several instances of licenses given by him to large sewing machine companies, the fees on which were regularly paid, and corresponded with the rate allowed by the master. We think that the defendants have no occasion to complain of the amount awarded.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

VICKSBURG, SHREVEPORT AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 280-285).

Construction of bridges across navigable streams—regulation of, within power of States when Congress has not acted—damnum absque injuria.

1. Whenever the exercise of a right conferred by law for the benefit of the public is attended by temporary inconvenience to private parties, in common with the public in general, they are not entitled to damages therefor.

2. Where a railroad company has been authorized by a State to construct a bridge across a navigable stream, and some obstruction to navigation is unavoidable during its construction, a private party damaged by such obstruction cannot hold the company liable for such damage.

3. There is nothing in any of the Acts of Congress which deprives the Legislature of the State of Louisiana of the power to determine the character of the bridges which may be erected over the Boeuf River.

4. When a State provides for the form and character of a bridge its directions will control, irrespective of its effect upon navigation, except as against the action of Congress.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. John T. Ludeling, for plaintiff in error:

The Supreme Court of Louisiana held that the Legislature of that State had the power to confer upon the defendant the right to build all necessary bridges across any navigable stream in the course of its line.

34 La. Ann. 973.

Upon rehearing the court said: "As to streams which are navigable only within the limits of a single State, the authority of its Legislature is complete." Id. 975.

The navigable rivers and waters in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana are made public highways by the Act of March, 3, 1811. The Mississippi and navigable waters leading into the same, or into the Gulf of Mexico, are made public highways and forever free by the Act of the 20th of February, 1811, Act of March 1, 1817, and by the Act of June 4, 1812.

Gordon, Digest, 640, note.

They are so declared by the Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 5251 and 2476.

The Boeuf River is in fact navigable, and is therefore in law a public navigable river.

The Montello, 20 Wall. 441 (87 U. S. bk. 22. L. ed. 394).

Usefulness for purposes of transportation for rafts, boats, or barges, gives a navigable character; reference being due to its natural state rather than to its average depth the year round.

Such a decision does not apply to a valid law which Congress had the power to enact where the waters were within a State or territory.

Wallamet Iron Br. Co. v. Hatch, 19 Fed. Rep. 347.

But whatever may be the construction of the Acts of Congress, admitting the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, etc., Congress has, since the admission of Louisiana into the Union, legislated upon the subject of the navigation of Boeuf River.

Rev. Stat. U. S. 1878, §§ 2476, 5251.

The decision in Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 2 Pet. 245 "was based entirely upon the absence of any legislation of Congress upon the subject."

Escanaba, etc. Co. v. Chicago, supra.

In cases last cited, the decision rested upon the fact that "bridges over navigable streams which are entirely within the limits of a State," are regulated by the State. E converso, rivers running through two or more States are not.

In the Slaughter House Cases, "the right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several States," is recognized.

Messrs. George Hoadly, Jr., Edgar M. Johnson, Edward Colston and George Hoadly, for defendant in error:

The power of the original States to authorize the obstruction of navigable streams, within their territory, was recognized in Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 2 Pet. 245 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 412).

Gilman v. Phila. 3 Wall. 713 (70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 96).

The Statutes of the United States upon which the plaintiff in error relies have no bearing upon the power of the States to thus obstruct navigable waters within their limits.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court: [281]

The authority vested by its Act of incorporation in the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company, to construct a railroad from a point opposite Vicksburg to the state line of Texas, empowered it to construct as part of the road all necessary bridges for the crossing of navigable streams which might be on its line. It was so held by the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, and it would seem to be a self-evident proposition. What the form and character of the bridges should be, that is to say, of what height they should be erected, and of what materials constructed, and whether with or without draws, were matters for the regulation of the State, subject only to the paramount authority of Congress to prevent any unnecessary obstruction to the free navigation of the streams. Until Congress intervenes in such cases, and exercises its authority, the power of the State is plenary. When the State provides for the form and character of the structure, its directions will control, except as against the action of Congress, whether the bridge be with or without draws, and irrespective of its effect upon navigation. [282]

As has often been said by this court, bridges are merely connecting links of turnpikes, streets and railroads; and the commerce over them may be much greater than that on the streams which they cross. A break in the line of railroad communication from the want of a bridge may produce much greater inconvenience to the public than the obstruction to navigation caused by a bridge with proper draws. In such cases, the local authority can best determine which of the two modes of transportation should be favored, and how far either should be made subservient to the other. Gilman v. Phila. 3 Wall. 713, 729 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 96, 101].

In the case at bar no specific directions as to the form and character of the bridges over the streams on the line of the railroad were prescribed by the Legislature of the State. The authority of the Company to construct them was only an implied one, from the fact that such structures were essential to the continuous connection of the line. Two conditions, however, must be deemed to be embraced within this implied power: one, that the bridges should be so constructed as to insure safety to the crossing of the trains, and be so kept at all times; and the other that they should not interfere unnecessarily with the navigation of the streams.

The line of road crossed a small stream, one of the tributaries of the Ouachita River, called Boeuf River, which was navigable for about six months in the year. This river has its rise in Arkansas, and by its connection with the Ouachita, which empties into the Red River, its waters find their way to the Mississippi. Over this river the Company constructed a bridge with a draw sufficiently large to allow the passage of steamers. It was used for years without complaint from anyone, so far as the record discloses. But in 1880 it was found, upon inspection, to be decayed and unsafe for the passage of trains. The defendant, which had succeeded to the property and interests of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Company, therefore determined to rebuild it. To carry out this purpose with as little inconvenience as practicable to vessels navigating the river, the [283] Company contracted with an experienced builder to construct the bridge during the summer months, when the river was usually too low for navigation. The work could not be begun until the subsidence of the water in July. In order to expedite its construction, the Company stipulated with the contractor to prepare the timbers at its workshops and transport them to the ground as soon as the state of water would permit the work to be commenced; and it carried out its stipulation in that respect. In the construction of the new bridge it became necessary to dismantle the draw of the old one, and to erect temporary supports while the timbers and draw of the new bridge were being put in place. To prevent the stoppage of its trains while this building was going on, the Company constructed a temporary bridge adjoining the old one, for their transportation, expecting to have the new bridge completed before the winter rise, which usually began near the close of December, should render the river navigable. But early in August rains set in, and continued almost incessantly for months, rendering the river navigable in November, much earlier than usual. The work on the new bridge was thereby greatly impeded. To obviate this impediment, as far as possible, the Company added to the contractor's force a gang of its own bridge laborers, who assisted by working at night and on Sundays.

The court below found that the Company did everything in its power to accelerate the work on the new bridge, but it was not completed until December 20, following. The water in the river being increased by the unusual rains, there was sufficient depth on the 6th of November to carry the plaintiff's steamer with freight above the bridge. But the steamer could not pass owing to the temporary structure and the supports used in the erection of the new bridge. For the losses alleged to have been sustained from this obstruction between the 6th of November and the 20th of December, the plaintiff brought this action.

The District Court of Louisiana gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, from which both parties appealed to the Supreme Court of the State—the plaintiff because he did not recover as much as he claimed, and the de-[284] fendant because there was a recovery of any sum. The supreme court reversed the judgment, holding that the Company was authorized by the charter of the original company, to which the defendant had succeeded, to construct a bridge over the river for the passage of its trains, and, when out of repair and decayed, to replace it with a new one; that the obstruction to navigation caused by the construction of the new bridge was unavoidable, and the Company could not, therefore, be held responsible for any injury resulting therefrom; that it was a case in which the defendant was entitled to the protection of the rule of damnum absque injuria. It accordingly reversed the judgment, and ordered that the action be dismissed.

The plaintiff contends that Congress had previously acted with respect to the navigation of this river and of all other navigable waters in Louisiana, and had thereby interdicted the placing of any obstruction in them, even of a temporary character, to the passage of vessels. He cites in support of this position the Act of February 20, 1811, enabling the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and state government, the third section of which enacted that the convention called to frame the Constitution should, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, provide, among other things, "that the River Mississippi and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost or toll therefor, imposed by the said State" (2 Stat. at L. 642); and also the proviso to the Act of April 8, 1812, for the admission of Louisiana, which declares that it is upon a similar condition that the State is incorporated into the Union. Id. 701, § 1.

A similar provision is found in the Acts admitting the States of California, Wisconsin and Illinois into the Union, with respect to the navigable rivers and waters in them, the purport and meaning of which have been the subject of consideration by this court. Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 442] and Cardwell v. American Bridge Co. 113 U. S. 205 [28: 959]. In the latter case we had before us [285]
the clause in the Act admitting California, and we held that it did not impair the power which the State could exercise over its rivers, even if the clause had no existence. We there referred to previous decisions upon a similar enactment, and said "that if we treat the clause as divisible into two provisions, they must be construed together as having but one object; namely, to insure a highway equally open to all without preference to any, and unobstructed by duties or tolls, and thus prevent the use of the navigable streams by private parties to the exclusion of the public, and the exaction of any toll for their navigation; and that the clause contemplated no other restriction upon the power of the State in authorizing the construction of bridges over them, whenever such construction would promote the convenience of the public."

The objection to the authority conferred upon the Company to construct the bridge, from the legislation of Congress, is therefore not tenable; and we agree with the ruling of the court below that whenever the exercise of a right, conferred by law for the benefit of the public, is attended with temporary inconvenience to private parties, in common with the public in general, they are not entitled to any damages therefor. The obstruction caused to the navigation of the stream during the progress of the work on the new bridge, therefore, afforded no ground of action. The inconvenience was damnum absque injuria. Bennett v. New Orleans, 14 La. Ann. 120; Barbin v. Police Jury, etc. 15 La. Ann. 559. Judgment affirmed.

WHARTON BRANCH ET AL., Intervenors, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
W. A. PATRICK, Admr. of ELIZA M. O'BRIEN, Deceased, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 156-176.)

Separate writs of error from joint judgment—alienage—construction of the Texas Statutes—repeal—grantor of present interest in real property not estopped as to subsequently acquired title by covenant of general warranty—evidence—objections to deed—erasure—execution—power of attorney—conveyance of real property in Texas to wife, upon nominal consideration—intention to vest title in her, presumed.

1. When a judgment against defendants is joint, all the parties affected thereby must join in the writ of error, or there must be a summons and severance, or its equivalent.

2. In an action to try the title to real estate, where intervenors are admitted, who claim under the plaintiffs, but hostile to them, and who can only recover by establishing the rights of the plaintiffs to recover, a finding for the plaintiffs and against both the intervenors and the defendant, and a judgment thereon, although single, is upon different and distinct issues, and must be regarded as joint only in form, and severable in fact and law; and a motion to dismiss a writ of error sued out by the defendant, on the ground that the judgment was jointly against him and the intervenors, and that all should have been in the same writ, will be denied.

3. The same principle must govern judgments at law, rendered in actions according to the forms of procedure prescribed by the statutes of the State in which they are tried, where interventions to assert title are permitted, as in equity, where interventions pro interesse suo have been permitted to those affected by the proceeding, but not parties to the original controversy; which principle is, that where the decree is final, and separate or separable, those not affected by it are not necessary parties to the appeal.

4. This court holds, both upon reason and the authority of the Supreme Court of Texas, that the Act of 1854 of that State, defining the rights of aliens, did not repeal the provision of the Act of 1848, providing that alien heirs of real property should be entitled to nine years in which to dispose of it, or to become citizens and take possession thereof; and that, under the Act of 1854, the English Act of 1870 changed the defeasible title of the alien heirs of an owner of lands situated in Texas, who died in 1865, into an indefeasible title.

5. In the absence of a recital in a deed which estops the grantor as to the character of his title, or the quantum of interest intended to be conveyed, a covenant of general warranty, where the estate granted is the present interest and title of the grantor, does not operate as an estoppel to pass a subsequently acquired title.

6. Where a deed, executed in a foreign country, professes to have been signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, one of whom, a justice of the peace, certifies to such execution, and the other subscribing witness makes an affidavit of its execution, which is certified by the Consul of the United States, the proof of execution is sufficient to entitle the deed to admission in evidence.

7. Where it appears upon the face of a deed that wherever the name of the grantor was mentioned in the body, the name, as originally written, was Elizabeth O'Brien, and that a portion of said name had been erased so as to read Eliza O'Brien, proof that Elizabeth O'Brien and Eliza O'Brien, were one and the same person, met any objection based upon the erasure. The presumption was that the erasure was made before the execution of the deed.

8. Where some of the parties who have executed a power of attorney, granting authority "to recover their interest in an estate," died before action under the power, as to them and their heirs or assigns, if not as to all who have executed, the power is revoked. Such a power does not authorize the execution of a deed conveying away the interest of the principals.

9. While by the law of Texas property purchased during the marriage, whether conveyed to the husband or the wife, is prima facie community property, the rule only holds where the purchase is made with community funds. Where the consideration was nominal, and the deed was made to the wife, the presumption is that it was intended to vest the title in her as separate property.

Argued Oct. 28, 29, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas. Motion to dismiss denied and judgment affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. T. Brady and H. N. Low, for defendants in error, on motion to dismiss writ of error for want of jurisdiction.

The writ of error is prosecuted by the plaintiff in error, Hanrick, alone, and the record does not show any attempt to join the other parties against whom judgment was also rendered, nor does it disclose any reason for their nonjoinder. The judgment is joint.

Simpson v. Greeley, 20 Wall. 152 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 338); Masterson v. Herndon, 10 Wall. 416 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 953); Burleson v. Henderson, 4 Tex. 55; Schram v. Gentry, Galveston Term, 1885, Sup. Court of Texas; Smith v. Gentry, Id.

The writ of error must be dismissed.

Simpson v. Greeley, and Masterson v. Herndon, supra; O'Dowd v. Russell, 14 Wall. 402 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 857); Hampton v. Rouse, 18 Wall. 187 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 593); Williams v. Bank, 11 Wheat. 414 (24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 508); Owings v. Kincannon, 7 Pet. 399 (32 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 727); Todd v. Daniel, 16 Pet. 521 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 1054); Fields, Fed. Courts, 296; 2 Abb. U. S. Pr. 248, 250.

See also authorities under next proposition.

The objection to nonjoinder of Branch and Sargent in the petition for writ of error goes to the jurisdiction of the court, and may be made at any time.

Wilson's Heirs v. Life & Fire Ins. Co. 12 Pet. 140 (37 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 1032); Simpson v. Greeley and Masterson v. Herndon, supra; Semple v. Hagar, 4 Wall. 431 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 402); 2 Abb. U. S. Pr. 250.

This defect can only be cured by dismissing the writ and bringing another in which all against whom judgment is rendered are made parties.

Mussina v. Cavazos, 20 How. 280 (61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 878).

Messrs. W. Hallett Phillips and L. W. Goodrich, for E. G. Hanrick, plaintiff in error in case No. 20, and Mr. M. F. Morris, for plaintiffs in error in case No. 475 in answer to motion,

The general rule proceeds upon the principle that all the parties who are united in interest ought to unite under the writ of error, that the court may not be required to decide for the second time the same question on the record. An additional reason is that the successful party should be allowed to proceed against the parties who are satisfied with the judgment.

Owings v. Kincannon, 7 Pet. 399 (32 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 727); Todd v. Daniel, 16 Pet. 521 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 1054); Masterson v. Herndon, 10 Wall. 416 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 953); Cox v. U. S. 6 Pet. 172 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 359); Germain v. Mason, 12 Wall. 259 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 392); Feibelman v. Packard, 108 U. S. 14 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 634).

Intervenors cannot be considered defendants, as their titles are hostile to both. The circuit court followed the Texas state practice, which confounds distinctions between law and equity.

Hurt v. Hollingsworth, 100 U. S. 100 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 569); Noonan v. Lee, 2 Black, 499 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 278); Bein v. Heath, 12 How. 168 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 939); Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. 648 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 532).

The defendant Hanrick and the intervenors were not united in interest, and the judgment as to them is severable. In legal effect the judgment is against them for the land which they respectively claimed.

Ex parte French, 100 U. S. 1 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 529).

Messrs. W. Hallett Phillips and L. W. Goodrich, for E. G. Hanrick, plaintiff in error in case No. 20, on the merits:

The common-law rule as to aliens is stated in Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 458 (17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 613); Cryer v. Andrews, 11 Tex. 171; Barclay v. Cameron, 25 Tex. 242; White v. Sabriego, 30 Tex. 584; Hardy v. DeLeon, 5 Tex. 242.

The Constitution of Texas of 1836 declared that no alien should hold land except directly from that Republic. Section 14 of the Act of 1840, re-enacted as section 9 of the Act of 1848, provided that every alien to whom land may be devised, or may descend, shall have nine years to become a citizen, and take the land, or nine years to sell the same, before it shall be declared forfeited. This provision was construed in McKinney v. Saviego, 18 How. 235 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 365).

The Act of 1854 accorded such rights as are accorded American citizens by the laws of the nation to which the alien belongs. Section 4 repeals section 9 of the Act of 1848, so far as inconsistent with the Act of 1854. The law of Great Britain giving aliens the right to inherit was not passed until 1870. As the ancestor died before the passage of the English Statute, it would be contrary to the spirit of the Act of 1854 to permit the heir to take any estate which an American citizen could not have taken at that time in England.

Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259 (15 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 234); Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 628); State v. International & G. N. R. R. Co. 57 Tex. 534; Bryan v. Sundburg, 5 Tex. 423; Sharpe v. De St. Sauveur, 26 L. T. N. S. (Ch.) 142; Crane v. Reeder, 21 Mich. 24; Shelton v. Collector, 5 Wall. 113 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 544).

As the Act of 1854 covers the whole subject of the Act of 1848, and embraces new provisions, it is a repeal by construction.

U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 92 (78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 154); Daviess v. Fairbairn, 3 How. 636 (44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 760); State v. Stoll, 17 Wall. 431 (84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 654); Cook Co. Nat. Bank v. U. S. 107 U. S. 450 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 539); Bryan v. Sundburg, supra.

The guiding principle in the legislation of modern States on the subject of alien property rights has been that of reciprocity.*

Sirey, under art. 11, Aubry and Rau. tit. Droit's Civil; Proudhon, chap. 9, § 2, chap. II, § I; Merlin, art. Etranger, § 1, Nos. 7 and 8; Duranton, 1, pp. 159, 160; Dalloz, Jurisp. Generale.

If it were necessary to resort to section 9 of the Act of 1848, we understand that the Legislature by that Act only meant the alien to take and dispose of the estate, or become a citizen, and that it applied to cases where the property would vest at once in the State for want of some person who could at common law inherit. Such was the construction placed by this court on the Missouri Alien Act.

Sullivan v. Burnett, 105 U. S. 333 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1125).

The Act of 1854 makes no distinction between indefeasible and defeasible estates. The sole test is reciprocity. A defeasible title by descent in an alien is unknown to the common law.

Fairfax v. Hunter, 7 Cranch. 603 (11 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 453); Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535 (20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 516).

The decision of the question, here presented, by the Supreme Court of Texas, was rendered in a suit brought by different plaintiffs, and delivered after this suit had been brought in the United States Circuit Court, and after the demurrer interposed by the defendant had been overruled; and is only so far obligatory on this court as its reasoning convinces.

Gibson v. Lyon, 115 U. S. 447 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 442); East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 352 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 140).

At the time the circuit court ruled on the demurrer in this case, the state court had not so held the law to be, but by a well settled line of decisions had held to the contrary.

Hardy v. DeLeon, and Cryer v. Andrews, supra; McGahan v. Baylor, 32 Tex. 792; Wardrup v. Jones, 23 Tex. 489; Warnell v. Finch, 15 Tex. 168.

*NOTE.—The following references to the volume of Public Treaties, 1873, show the right of our citizens to hold real estate and the right of succession in foreign countries, so far as secured by treaty, as also the rights of aliens in this country:

The decision in Hanrick v. Hanrick, 54 Tex. 101, and 61 Tex. 596, cannot be reconciled with the opinion of this court in McKinney v. Saviego, supra.

Much less can they be reconciled with a long line of decisions, beginning with Orr v. Hodgson, supra, and Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 603); Chirac v. Chirac and Hauenstein v. Lynham, supra.

The decision in Hanrick v. Hanrick, supra, is still pending and undetermined, and on final disposition the court may restore the old rule.

Reeves v. Petty, 44 Tex. 252.

Where a circuit court has decided a question in accordance with the decisions of the state court at the time, a reversal by the state court of its rulings will not induce the supreme court to reverse the decision of the circuit court.

Mr. M. F. Morris, for plaintiffs in error in case No. 475, upon the merits:

The circuit court was not justified in following the practice of the state courts, in their blending of common-law and equity procedure, and in permitting the attempt to break down the deeds under which the intervenors claimed title, by merely equitable considerations.

Hurt v. Hollingsworth, Noonan v. Lee, Bein v. Heath and Boyle v. Zacharie, supra.

The heirs at law of James Hanrick brought suit in 1879 against the same defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, for their one third interest in the estate of Edward Hanrick, deceased, in one of the state courts, and the same question of alienage was there raised. The Supreme Court of the State held that the plaintiffs were not disqualified.

Hanrick v. Hanrick, supra.

Elizabeth O'Brien was the only person that could object that the deed from Philip O'Brien to Jenkins, and the deed from Jenkins to her, were not warranted by the power of attorney to the former; and yet she ratified and confirmed it by her conveyance to Eliza M. O'Brien. This is the very deed under which the defendants in error claimed title, and by operation of the covenant of warranty in the deed from Eliza M. O'Brien to Sargent, the title acquired by the grantor inured to the benefit of the grantee.

Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297 (52 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 703); Harrison v. Boring, supra.

Evidence that the deed from Elizabeth O'Brien to Eliza M. O'Brien was a gift, and therefore within the exception of the statute, was inadmissible, because another consideration is stated in the deed.

Where the condition of title is known to both parties, or may be ascertained with equal facility by both, there is no estoppel.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [158]

Eliza M. O'Brien, since deceased, with Philip O'Brien, her husband, and William Brady, citizens of New York, commenced their action in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, against Edward G. Hanrick, a citizen of Texas. It was an action of trespass to try the title to real estate in the County of Falls, in that State, described generally as three tracts, one known as the Antanacio [159] de Le Serda eleven league grant; the second as two parcels granted to Pedro Zarza; and the third a part of the eleven league tract granted to Rafael de Aquire. The common source of title as between these parties was Edward Hanrick, who died in 1865 in Montgomery County, Alabama, intestate and without issue, never having married. The plaintiffs below claim title as follows: Edward Hanrick left surviving him as his next of kin and only heirs at the time of his death, one sister, Elizabeth O'Brien, two brothers, named respectively: John and James Hanrick, and one nephew, Edward G. Hanrick, the defendant, he being the son and only child of Philip Hanrick, who died in 1852, and who was another brother of Edward Hanrick. Elizabeth O'Brien resided in the County of Wexford, Ireland, and is, and always was, an alien to the United States, and a subject of Great Britain. John Hanrick died intestate and without issue, never having married, in the year 1870, in the County of Wexford, Ireland, an alien to the United States, and a subject of Great Britain. The said James Hanrick left surviving him, as his next of kin and only heirs, four daughters, named respectively Elizabeth Clare, Catherine O'Neill, Annie, otherwise called Honora, and Ellen Hanrick, and four grandchildren, the children of a deceased daughter, named respectively Mary, Elizabeth, Bridget, and Robert Whelan, and one son, Nicholas Hanrick. These descendants of James Hanrick reside in Ireland, except Nicholas, Annie otherwise called Honora, and Ellen Hanrick, who reside in the State of New York. By virtue of these facts, and of the laws of Texas and Great Britain, as hereafter shown, it was claimed that Eliza O'Brien in 1878 was seised and possessed of an undivided one-third interest in the said estate of Edward Hanrick in the said lands, when it was claimed she conveyed to the plaintiff, Eliza M. O'Brien, her daughter-in-law, for her separate use and benefit, all her interest in the said estate and lands; William Brady, the other plaintiff below, being entitled to one half of the said undivided one third by virtue of a conveyance from Eliza M. O'Brien and her husband, Philip O'Brien.

[160] The defendant in possession, having pleaded not guilty of the trespass complained of, asserted title in himself as the sole heir at law of the said Edward Hanrick, deceased, on the ground that he was the only descendant having inheritable blood, according to the laws of Texas.

The suit was begun February 13, 1880, and issue was finally joined on amended pleadings by the filing of an answer by Edward G. Hanrick on April 3, 1883. On the next day, Wharton Branch appeared as an intervenor in the cause, and filed a pleading called an original answer, in which he denies the sufficiency in law of the plaintiffs' petition: objects that on its face it is shown that necessary parties have not been joined as plaintiffs; denies all the allegations of the petition; pleads not guilty to the trespasses alleged therein; and then sets up title in himself to an undivided one fourth of three fourths of the estate under a conveyance alleged to have been made to him on the 14th of February, 1878, by Philip O'Brien, as attorney in fact, acting under a power of attorney alleged to have been made on the 16th of May, 1870, by Elizabeth O'Brien and James and John Hanrick. It is alleged that by that power of attorney Philip O'Brien was authorized and empowered to sell and convey their interests in said estate, and in pursuance of which he made the deed under which the intervenor claims title. The consideration of that deed is stated to have been money theretofore paid out, and expenses incurred and legal advice and information furnished and rendered by the defendant to the said Philip O'Brien. The pleading concludes by praying judgment for the defendant against all parties to the suit, establishing his right, title and interest in the estate; and that the same be set apart to him in severalty; and for costs and general relief.

On the same day John B. Sargent also appeared as intervenor, and filed an original answer on his behalf, similar in form to that of Wharton Branch, and claiming title to an undivided one half of the interest of Elizabeth O'Brien and John and James Hanrick, under a deed made to him conveying that interest on the 14th of February, 1878, by Philip O'Brien, acting as their attorney in fact under the same power of attorney referred to in the answer of [161] Wharton Branch; and concluding with a prayer for a similar judgment in his own behalf.

Thereupon the plaintiffs in the action filed pleadings styled an answer to the petition for leave to intervene, and plaintiffs' first supplemental petition, in which they asked that the leave to intervene on behalf of Branch and Sargent be denied and their petitions struck from the files; and specifically setting out the grounds on which they claimed that the alleged conveyances made by Philip O'Brien, as attorney in fact, to them respectively, should be held to be null and void. Amongst those grounds were the following: First. Prior to the execution of the deeds under which the intervenors claim title, two of the principals in the power of attorney, James and John Hanrick, had died, thereby revoking the authority. Second. That the execution of the said deeds on the part of said Philip O'Brien had been obtained by the said Branch and the said Sargent by fraudulent representations, and that the same had never in fact been delivered. The plaintiffs' supplemental petition concludes with a prayer that they have and recover of the said Wharton Branch and the said John B. Sargent, as well as the said Edward G. Hanrick, an undivided one third interest in the lands described in their original complaint, and for all other relief, general and special.

The defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, after the filing of these interventions, moved to dismiss the cause on the ground, among others, that he had no interest in the controversy as between the plaintiffs on the one hand and Branch and Sargent on the other; but all objections to the intervention were overruled or disregarded, and the cause proceeded to trial on the issues as made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, and also on those as between the plaintiffs and the said Branch and Sargent. The cause having been submitted to the jury on the 10th of April, 1883, a verdict was returned as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs;" and thereupon judgment was entered on the verdict as follows: "It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged by the court that the plaintiffs, Eliza M. O'Brien and Philip O'Brien and William Brady, have and recover of the defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, [162] and of the intervenors, Wharton Branch and John B. Sargent, an undivided one third interest in and to the following described lands: * * *. And it is further ordered that a writ of possession in favor of said plaintiffs issue therefor; and that plaintiffs do have and recover of such intervenors such costs by them incurred by reason of such intervention, and of defendant all costs which were incurred herein, not including any costs incurred by the said intervention, for which let execution respectively issue."

To reverse this judgment, the defendant,

Edward G. Hanrick, sued out a writ of error on April 16, 1888, which was docketed in this court on the 16th of August of the same year. To reverse the judgment as against them, the intervenors, Wharton Branch and John B. Sargent, sued out their writ of error separately on September 26, 1884, which was docketed in this court on the 24th of November of the same year. The intervention of Branch and Sargent was permitted in compliance with article 4788 of the Revised Statutes of 1879, Laws of Texas, which provides that "When a party is sued for lands, the real owner or warrantor may make himself, or may be made, a party defendant in the suit, and shall be entitled to make such defense as if he had been the original defendant in the action."

Article 1188 prescribes that "The pleadings of an intervenor shall conform to the requirements of pleadings, on the part of plaintiff and defendant respectively, so far as they may be applicable."

The defendants in error, the administrator of Eliza M. O'Brien, Philip O'Brien, and William Brady, now move to dismiss the writ of error sued out by Hanrick, on the ground that the judgment was jointly against him and the intervenors, Branch and Sargent, and that all should have joined in the same writ. The same objection, of course, applies to the writ of error sued out severally by the intervenors, Branch and Sargent. This motion presents the first question for consideration.

We assume, without so deciding, that the [163] proceedings on the part of the intervenors may be justified under the Statutes of Texas. It must also be admitted to be a general rule, well established by the practice and in the decisions of this court, that when a judgment against defendants is joint, all the parties affected thereby must join in the writ of error, or there must be a summons and severance, or its equivalent. The question here, however, is whether this judgment, although so in form, is joint in law as against the original defendant and the intervenors. The verdict in favor of the plaintiffs against them, although single, was rendered upon different and altogether distinct issues. The intervenors defended as against the plaintiffs, not on behalf of the original defendant, but altogether in their own interest, claiming title, not only against the plaintiffs, but adverse to that of the defendant. Indeed, the intervenors' title was derived through the plaintiffs, and their claim was under them, and, as between them and the original defendant, their interest was altogether with the plaintiffs and against the defendant. The ground of their right of recovery against the defendant was the very title asserted by the plaintiffs, and their claim could be successfully prosecuted only by establishing the right of the plaintiffs to recover. Their right against the defendant was to recover against him if the plaintiffs recovered; and their right against the plaintiffs was to recover against the defendant, only in the event that the plaintiffs first succeeded in recovering against him. The situation as to them is anomalous. The litigation was triangular. The judgment must be regarded as joint only in form, but severable in fact and in law. It is to be read as if it were based upon a finding that the plaintiffs recover as against the defendant for the title asserted against him, and against the intervenors in respect to the title asserted by them against the plaintiffs. The judgment for costs is in fact separated, the costs of the intervention being regarded as costs in a separate suit. In fact there were two suits, one interjected in the other, in which the parties are different, the titles are different, the interests are different; and there could be no joint judgment in both except in mere words. None of the cases cited in support of the motion to dismiss are applicable here, because they refer to judgments in common-law actions [164] where no such anomaly as is presented in this record could occur. In equity, where interventions pro interesse suo have been permitted to those affected by the proceeding, but not parties to the original controversy, or where the original parties have distinct and separable interests, the same general rule as to appeals applies to joint decrees; but it has always been held that where the decree is final and separate or separable, those not affected by it are not necessary parties to the appeal. Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. 201 [47 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 404].

The same principle must govern judgments at law rendered in actions according to the forms of procedure prescribed by the statutes of the States in which they are tried where interventions such as the present are permitted, and the same rule must be adopted in reference to them.

The motions to dismiss are therefore denied.

The principal question in the original action arises upon the defense that the plaintiffs below were aliens at the time of descent cast by the death of Edward Hanrick, in 1865, and, under the laws of Texas, therefore not capable of acquiring title by inheritance; it being claimed that the defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, a citizen of Texas, was the sole heir at law.

The Constitution of the Republic of Texas, continued in that of the State, contained the following provision (section 10, General Provisions): "No alien shall hold land in Texas, except by titles emanating directly from the Government of this Republic. But if any citizen of this Republic shall die intestate or otherwise, his children or heirs shall inherit his estate, and aliens shall have a reasonable time to take possession of and dispose of the same, in a manner hereafter to be pointed out by law."

In pursuance of this provision, an Act defining what a reasonable time should be was passed on January 28, 1840 (Hart's Digest, article 585), and re-enacted March 18, 1848 (Paschal's Digest, article 44), in section 9 of an Act entitled "An Act to Regulate the Descent and Distribution of Intestates' Estates," as follows: "Section 9. In making title to land by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate is or hath been an alien; [165] and every alien to whom any land may be devised or may descend shall have nine years to become a citizen of the Republic and take possession of such land, or shall have nine years to sell the same before it shall be declared to be forfeited, or before it shall escheat to the government."

An Act was passed February 13, 1854, entitled "An Act to Define the Civil Rights of Aliens," which is as follows:

"Section 1. Any alien, being a free white person, shall have and enjoy in the State of Texas such rights as are or shall be accorded to American citizens by the laws of the nation to which such alien shall belong, or by treaties of such nation with the United States.

"Section 2. Aliens may take and hold any property, real or personal, in this State by devise or descent from any alien or citizen, in the same manner in which citizens of the United States may take and hold real or personal estate by devise or descent within the country of such alien.

"Section 3. Any alien, being a free white person, who shall become a resident of this State, and shall, in conformity with the naturalization laws of the United States, have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall have the right to acquire and hold real estate in this State, in the same manner as if he were a citizen of the United States.

"Section 4. The ninth section of an Act entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Descent and Distribution of Intestates' Estates,' approved March 18, 1848, is hereby repealed so far as the same may be inconsistent with this Act; and this Act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

This Act was in force in 1865, when Edward Hanrick died. At that time the common law was in force in England whereby, as was held by this court in Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 453 [17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 613], an alien might take an estate by the act of the parties, as by purchase, but could not take by the act of the law, as by descent, for want of inheritable blood. "Where a person dies leaving issue who are aliens, the latter are not deemed his heirs at [166] law, for they have no inheritable blood, and the estate descends to the next of kin who have inheritable blood, in the same manner as if no such alien issue were in existence."

But on the 12th of May, 1870, the British Parliament passed an Act entitled "An Act to Amend the Law Relating to the Legal Condition of Aliens and British Subjects, styled the Naturalization Act of 1870." By section 2 it prescribed the status of aliens in the United Kingdom as follows: "Real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject, and the title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien in the same manner in all respects as through, from, or in succession to a natural-born British subject; Provided, first, That this section shall not confer any right on an alien to hold real property situate out of the United Kingdom, and shall not qualify an alien for any office or for any municipal, parliamentary, or other franchise; second, that this section shall not entitle any alien to any right or privilege as a British subject, except such rights and privileges in respect of property as are hereby expressly given to him; third, that this section shall not affect any estate or interest in real or personal property to which any person has or may become entitled, either mediately or immediately, in possession or expectancy, in pursuance of any disposition made before the passing of this Act, or in pursuance of any devolution by law on the death of any person dying before the passing of this Act."

It is conceded that if Edward Hanrick, the ancestor, had died after the enactment of this British Statute, the plaintiffs below would have been entitled under the Texas Statute of 1854 to claim as his heirs at law their proportion and interest in his real estate. It is contended, however, on the part of the defendant, that inasmuch as at the time of the descent cast in 1865 there was no such British Statute as that contemplated by the Texas Act of 1854, the plaintiffs were under such a disability of alienage at that time that they were cut off from the inheritance, which, becoming at that instant vested [167 by law in the defendant, Edward G. Hanrick, the subsequent passage of the British Statute could not be permitted by any retroactive effect to devest that interest in favor of the plaintiffs. On the other hand, it is contended by the plaintiffs that under the ninth section of the Act of March 18, 1848, which they claim was still in force in 1865, Elizabeth O'Brien, as sister of Edward Hanrick, although an alien, was entitled as his heir at law to a defeasible estate as such, which she was entitled to make indefeasible within nine years after descent cast by becoming a citizen of the State and taking possession of the land, with the right to sell the same in the alternative before it should be declared to be forfeited, or before it should escheat to the government, and which subsequently became indefeasible by the operation of the Act of 1854, in consequence of the passage of the British Statute of 1870.

This contention on the part of the plaintiffs below is met again by the defendant with the proposition that section 9 of the Act of March 18, 1848, was repealed by section 4 of the Act of February 13, 1854.

This very question in another litigation involving the same title came up directly for adjudication in the Supreme Court of Texas in the case of Hanrick v. Hanrick, 54 Tex. 101. The following is an extract from the opinion of the court in that case: "The Statute of 1854 is an affirmative one, and by long established rules of construction must be considered as additional to the then existing section 9, Act of 1848, upon the same subject matter, and that the latter is not repealed by it, unless this is done in express terms or by necessary implication. Potter's Dwarris, Stat. 189; 1 Bish. Crim. L. 1st ed. par. 175, 194. The Statute of 1854 does not in express terms repeal section 9, Act of 1848, for it is affirmatively provided that it is repealed so far as inconsistent with the Act of 1854, thus clearly evincing the legislative intent that the latter Act would be the rule only in certain cases. Neither, it is believed, was this section 9 repealed by the Statute of 1854 by implication, under old and well-established rules of construction governing such cases."

The court then proceeds to point out from the history of the legislation of Texas on the [168] subject the policy of the State, and adds as follows: "In pursuance of this policy, and to meet in a proper spirit the modern liberal international legislation upon the subject of alienage, the Act of 1854 was passed, not it is believed in a spirit of retaliation and to withdraw from citizens of those countries which may not have passed such reciprocal laws, as contemplated by that Act, the benefits of our previous legislation, but simply to make our legislation conform in the particular case with that of those countries which may also have legislated upon the subject. The Act of 1854 did not in terms limit the rights of aliens generally which previously had been granted by section 9, Act of 1848, by restricting them to such rights, and those only, as were or might be granted to citizens of the United States by their government. On the contrary, it was an affirmative and enlarging statute, and intended to give to aliens such rights and privileges, in addition to those granted by section 9, Act of 1848, as had been or should be given by their government to citizens of the United States."

In conclusion on this point, the court says: "We are of opinion, therefore, that the Statute of 1854, neither by its express terms nor by a proper construction of its provisions and intention, did so repeal section 9, Act of 1848, as to prevent, if they are otherwise entitled, the alien heirs of Edward Hanrick from deriving title by descent under it to real estate in Texas."

The Supreme Court of Texas thereupon proceeded to consider the further question whether, if a title did so descend and vest in such alien heirs, they can, being still aliens and subjects of Great Britain, maintain a suit for the recovery of their interests after nine years have elapsed since descent was cast in 1865. In answer to that question they say: "Notwithstanding the tendency of the earlier decisions of this court to the contrary, under its more recent decisions and those of the Supreme Court of the United States, the effect of the provision of the Constitution of the Republic, and the Statutes of 1840 and 1848, upon the subject of alienage, before quoted, was to vest a defeasible title to real estate in Texas, into the alien children and heirs of a citizen of the United States who may have died intestate leaving such property; which [169] title was valid both against individuals and also the State, not only for the period of nine years, but for such further time until the State by some proper proceedings in the nature of office found had declared a forfeiture. Sabriego v. White, 30 Tex. 576; Settegast v. Schrimpf, 35 Tex. 328; Andrews v. Spear, 48 Tex. 567; Osterman v. Baldwin, 6 Wall. 116 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 730]; Airhart v. Massieu, 98 U. S. 491 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 213]; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 603]. No proceeding has been taken in this case to declare the land forfeited. From the date of the death of Edward Hanrick, in 1865, to the passage of the above Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in 1870, nine years have not elapsed. Immediately upon the passage of this Act the defeasible title in the alien heirs of Edward Hanrick was, by the provisions of the Act of 1854, changed into an indefeasible title; the same vesting into his heirs according to our Statute of Descent and Distribution in force at the time of descent cast."

This decision of the Supreme Court of Texas is directly in point, and was repeated in the case of Hanrick v. Hanrick, 61 Tex. 596, and also in the case of Hanrick v. Hanrick, 63 Tex. 618.

In the case of Airhart v. Massieu [supra] some of these provisions of the law of Texas in one aspect were carefully reviewed, and it was there said that "The Act of January, 1840, declared that, in making title by descent, it should be no bar to a party that any ancestors through whom he derives his descent from the intestate is or hath been an alien. This law would seem to be the legitimate result of the status of aliens with regard to title to lands in Texas; the prohibition to hold lands being provisional only, not operative unless they fail to become citizens or dispose of their land within nine years; and not even then until regular proceedings should be provided for and should be had to annul the title. The later cases in Texas have fully established this doctrine;" referring to the cases of Sabriego v. White, Settegast v Schrimpf, and Andrews v. Spear [supra].

Great weight, if not conclusive effect, in our opinion, is to be given to these decisions of the Supreme Court of Texas upon the question of [170] the construction of the statutes of the State, as affecting titles to real estate within its territory, and upon the authority of those decisions alone we are quite willing to rest the conclusion that the ninth section of the Act of 1848, so far as it conferred upon the plaintiffs below a defeasible estate by inheritance from Edward Hanrick, notwithstanding their alienage, is not repealed by the subsequent provisions of the Act of 1854. Middleton v. McGrew, 23 How. 45 [64 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 408]. We are, however, also of the opinion that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Texas on that point are well sustained by the reasons on which they proceed. It follows, therefore, that the defense put forward by Edward G. Hanrick, as against the plaintiffs, based on the alienage of Elizabeth O'Brien, cannot be sustained.

We proceed, in the next place, to consider and dispose of certain assignments of error predicated on the rulings of the court as to the admission in evidence and effect of a deed produced by the plaintiffs and read to the jury, dated May 11, 1878, purporting to be signed by Eliza O'Brien, to Eliza M. O'Brien, one of the plaintiffs. This deed appears to have been made between Eliza O'Brien, in the County of Wexford, Ireland, as grantor, and Eliza Mercy O'Brien, the wife of Philip O'Brien, as grantee. It is expressed to be in consideration of the sum of one dollar. It grants all the right, title, and interest of the grantor in and to certain tracts of land therein described, which belonged to Edward Hanrick, deceased, including that in controversy. It professes to have been signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, of whom one was Francis Ruttledge, a justice of the peace of the County of Wexford, who certifies that Elizabeth O'Brien, personally known to him to be the individual described in and who executed the deed, personally came before him and acknowledged its execution. Martin O'Brien, the other subscribing witness, makes an affidavit that he knew Eliza O'Brien, the individual described in the document, and that he was present, and saw her sign, seal, and deliver it as her act and deed, which is certified on the deed by the Consul of the United States for Dublin. It also appears from the indorsement [171] on the deed that it has been duly recorded in the various counties in which the land lies.

It is stated in the bill of exceptions that "Upon the face of said deed it appeared that wherever the name of the grantor was mentioned in the body of said deed, the name, as originally written, was Elizabeth O'Brien, and that a portion of said name had been scratched or erased so as to read Eliza O'Brien, of which changes no note of explanation or emendation appeared in said deed."

When the deed was offered, the defendant objected to its introduction in evidence for the following reasons: 1. Because it had been impeached as a forgery by the affidavit of Wharton Branch, one of the intervenors, who filed his affidavit to that effect on the 4th of April, 1883. 2. Because the deed did not purport to be the deed of Elizabeth O'Brien, nor to vest title in the grantee, Eliza M. O'Brien, to hold as her separate property. 3. Because of the unexplained changes apparent on the face of the deed. The court overruled the objections, but before the deed was read in evidence to the jury, the plaintiffs offered preliminary proof to the court to prove the execution of the instrument as at common law, and a witness was called and sworn who testified to the court that "the grantor in said deed and the subscribing witnesses all reside in Ireland; that he was acquainted with the handwriting of Francis Ruttledge, one of the subscribing witnesses to said deed, and that he believed the said Francis Ruttledge to have signed the same as subscribing witness thereto." Evidence was also given to the court tending to rebut said statement, and in the further progress of the case before the jury evidence was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to show that Elizabeth O'Brien and Eliza O'Brien were one and the same person. Evidence was also introduced tending to rebut the alleged fact. Plaintiffs then proposed to prove by the deposition of Philip O'Brien that no consideration was paid for said conveyance, and that the same was intended as a gift to his wife, Eliza M. O'Brien. To the admission of this testimony the defendant objected, because the deed, being upon its face a deed for valuable consideration [172] made to a married woman during coverture, was in law a deed to the community, and subject to the sole control and disposition of the husband, and a trust in favor of a separate right could not at law be engrafted upon it by parol testimony. These objections were overruled by the court, and the testimony was admitted.

We are of opinion that these rulings of the court were correct, on the supposition that the plaintiffs were properly put upon proof of the genuineness of the deed. Irrespective of the certificate from the record. The proof of execution, by proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness, was sufficient. The objection founded upon the supposed erasures was fully met by testimony as to the identity between Elizabeth O'Brien and Eliza O'Brien. The only erasure appearing, being a change from one name to the other, was sufficiently explained by the proof of identity At any rate, the presumption was that the erasure was made before the execution of the deed. Little v. Herndon, 10 Wall 26 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 878]. The consideration of the deed, being one dollar was merely nominal. Hite v. Nat. Met. Bank, 111 U. S. 722 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 577]. And while it appears to be well established law in Texas that property purchased during the marriage, whether the conveyance be to the husband or wife, is prima facie community property (Higgins v. Johnson, 20 Tex. 389), that rule only holds where the purchase is made with community funds, and this presumption may be rebutted by proof that the purchase was intended for the wife, Dunham v. Chatham, 21 Tex. 244. As in this case the consideration was nominal only, and the deed made to the wife, the presumption is that it was intended to vest the title in her as separate property.

The remaining questions, which we deem it important to notice, arise upon the title claimed by the intervenors, Branch and Sargent. They are material also in the controversy between the plaintiff and the original defendant, as the latter was entitled to defeat the plaintiff's recovery by showing an outstanding legal title in any other parties. To sustain this claim of title, the defendant and the intervenors introduced, first, a power of attorney, dated May 16, [173] 1870, purporting to be executed by James Hanrick, John Hanrick, and Elizabeth O'Brien to Philip O'Brien. This power of attorney granted power and authority to Philip O'Brien, on behalf of the other parties, to recover their interest in the estate of Edward Hanrick, and for that purpose to do all such acts, and take such proceedings, and use all such lawful ways and means, as he should deem necessary to assert and establish their right. It also contained the following clause: "And also for and on behalf and in the names of us, and as our acts and deed, to make, sign, seal, execute, and deliver all such agreements, contracts, leases, conveyances and assurances, with all usual and reasonable covenants therein, on our part, of all and any part of said messuages, tenements, premises, estate and effects, as shall be found necessary or expedient."

Professing to act under this power of attorney, Philip O'Brien executed a deed in the names of his principals, on February 1, 1878, to William Jenkins, Jr. in consideration of one dollar and other valuable considerations, conveying all the right, title and interest of his principals in the real estate belonging to them as heirs of Edward Hanrick. On the same day, William Jenkins, Jr., the grantee in that deed, conveyed the same interest to Eliza M. O'Brien, the wife of Philip O'Brien. On the same day, Eliza M. O'Brien, wife of Philip O'Brien, in her own right, her husband joining in the conveyance, in consideration of one dollar and other valuable considerations, granted to John B. Sargent, one of the intervenors, "one undivided half of all my right, title, and interest in and to the following described lands, situated in the State of Texas, the said land being the same this day conveyed to me by William Jenkins, Jr." This deed contained covenants that the grantor is "lawfully seised of an interest in fee simple of the granted premises aforesaid; that they are free from all incumbrances by me incurred, and that I have good right to sell and convey the same as aforesaid, and that I will, and my heirs, executors, and administrators shall warrant and defend the same to the said grantee, and to his heirs and assigns forever, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons."

On the 14th of February, 1878, Philip O'Brien, acting for himself and his wife, Eliza M. O'Brien, and for James Hanrick, John [174] Hanrick, and Elizabeth O'Brien, the heirs of Edward Hanrick, deceased, in consideration of one thousand dollars to be paid by John B. Sargent, conveyed to him in fee simple an undivided one-half interest in and to all the estate of Edward Hanrick, deceased, to which the grantors were entitled, their interest therein being described as three fourths thereof. This deed contained covenants "that our said interest in the property and premises are free and clear of all and every incumbrance, and that we," etc., "will warrant and defend the the same," etc. A similar deed, on the same date, was made in the name of the same grantors to Wharton Branch, conveying an undivided one-fourth interest in and to all the estate of Edward Hanrick, deceased, to which the grantors were entitled. It was also shown that Eliza M. O'Brien, in the years 1877 and 1878, had acquired the title of Nicholas Hanrick, Ellen Hanrick, and Honora Hanrick, children and heirs at law of James Hanrick, a brother of Edward Hanrick. On the 11th of May, 1878, Elizabeth O'Brien, by the name of Eliza O'Brien, executed a deed conveying all her right, title and interest in the estate of her deceased brother, Edward, to Eliza M. O'Brien, the wife of Philip O'Brien, being the same deed already referred to in a previous part of this opinion. It is conceded that John Hanrick and James Hanrick, brothers of Edward Hanrick, who joined in the power of attorney to Philip O'Brien, dated May 16, 1870, had both died, John Hanrick in 1870, and James Hanrick in 1875, and before Philip O'Brien executed any conveyance of the property as their attorney in fact. As to them and their heirs or assigns, of course the power of attorney was thereby revoked.

The deed from Philip O'Brien to Branch, dated February 14, 1878, and the deed to Sargent of the same date, were also ineffectual as to Eliza M. O'Brien, his wife, for whom he had no authority to act at all. They were also void as to Elizabeth O'Brien, because the conveyances were not authorized by the power of attorney, even if the latter was not revoked as to [175] her also by the death of her brothers, with whom she had joined in its execution. Equally unwarranted was the deed from Philip O'Brien to Jenkins, dated February 1, 1878, and the conveyance by Jenkins to Eliza O'Brien of the same date. O'Brien's authority under the power of attorney from his principals was to recover their estate for them, and not to give it away. The intervenors, however, rely upon the operation of the covenant of warranty contained in the deeds to John B. Sargent of February 1, 1878, made by Eliza M. O'Brien, in conjunction with her husband, Philip O'Brien, claiming that it operated to convey her title subsequently acquired under the deed from Eliza O'Brien, her mother-in-law, dated May 11, 1878.

The covenant of warranty in the deed to Sargent, however, relates only to the premises granted, which the grantors agree to warrant and defend, and the premises granted are described as "one undivided half of all my right, title and interest in and to the following described lands," and cannot, therefore, operate as an estoppel preventing the grantors from asserting any subsequently acquired title. The conveyance and the covenants are both confined to the right, title and interest which Eliza M. O'Brien had at the date of the deed, expressly referred to and described in the deed of February 1, 1878, as the interest conveyed by the deed from Jenkins. There is no recital in the deed to estop her as to the character of her title or the quantum of interest intended to be conveyed, within the rule laid down by this court in Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297 [52 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 703]. In the absence of such recital, a covenant of general warranty, where the estate granted is the present interest and title of the grantor does not operate as an estoppel to pass a subsequently acquired title.

The rule on that point seems well stated by Mr. Rawle (Covenants for Title, 4th ed. 393) in the following language: "Where the deed, although containing general covenants for title, does not on its face purport to convey an indefeasible estate, but only the right, title and interest of the grantor, in cases where those covenants are held not to assure a perfect title, but to be limited and restrained by the estate conveyed, the doctrine of estoppel has been considered not to apply, in other words, although the covenants are as a general rule invested with the highest functions of an estoppel in passing, by mere operation of law, an after-acquired estate, yet they will lose that attribute when it appears that the grantor intended to convey no greater estate than he was possessed of." White v. Brocaw, 14 Ohio St. 343; Adams v. Ross, 1 Vroom (N. J.) 509; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 47; Brown v. Jackson, 3 Wheat. 452 [16 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 432]. [176]

In the present case there is no ground for supposing that the parties to the deed had in contemplation anything more than the supposed interest of Eliza M. O'Brien existing at that date, as derived under the deed from William Jenkins, Jr., of February 1, 1878. The conclusion is that the covenant of warranty relied upon does not have the effect claimed of enlarging the estate conveyed by including the subsequently acquired title which passed to Eliza M. O'Brien by the deed from Elizabeth O'Brien of May 11, 1878.

This disposes of all questions of substance arising upon the record. We find no error in the proceedings and judgment of the circuit court.

Its judgment is accordingly affirmed.

CLARK POMACE HOLDER COMPANY

v.

WILLIAM H. FERGUSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 335-338.)

Patent law—patent void for want of invention.

A patent for an "improvement in cheese formers for cider presses" held void; the device of the patentee not involving any invention.

Argued Nov. 19, 1886. Decided Dec. 6, 1886

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Walter E. Ward, for appellant:

Clark did all that is necessary to constitute one an inventor. He invented a new "guide frame," a new "extended pomace rack," and an entirely new combination of the "racks," "form," and "cloths," which operated in a manner never before known. His invention was new and useful and has been of great benefit to the public. He was clearly entitled to a patent.

Rep. 560; Celluloid M. Co. v. American Zylonite Co. 36 O. G. 1043.

Mr. William H. King, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, for the infringement of letters patent No. 187100, granted to John Clark, February 6, 1877, for an "improvement in cheese formers for cider presses," on an application filed September 11, 1876. The specification and drawings of the patent are as follows:

[336] "The object I have in view is, in laying up a 'cheese' for the cider press, where each layer is folded up in a cloth, to secure uniformity of thickness of all the layers in the mass or cheese, and thus secure uniform pressure on its entire area, and to avoid all tendency to break the pomace frames or racks. To this end it consists in the employment of a guide frame, in combination with extended pomace racks, as more fully hereinafter set forth. Figure 1 is a perspective view, showing the manner of laying up a cheese in press. Figure 2 is a cross [337] section at x x. In the drawing, A represents the lower framework of a cider press, on which is laid a bed, B. C is a pomace rack, which may be rigid, as shown, or flexible, as described in letters patent No. 148034, issued to me March 3, 1874. On this rack is laid a guide frame, D, whose bottom girts are not spaced far enough apart to extend the full length of the rack on which they rest. A cloth, E, large enough to envelop the layer, is then laid on the rack, inside the frame, and opened out to receive the pomace, which is 'struck' level with the girts of the frame, after which the cloth is folded over the leveled pomace, and the frame is lifted off. The next and succeeding racks are in like manner laid on the first, and filled up, and a follower is placed on the upper one, when the cheese is ready to press. Laid up in this way, the several layers are uniform in thickness, and the cheese, in mass, is level on top, and offers a uniform resistance to the pressure, over its entire area, thus assuring the expression of all the juice and precluding all danger of breaking the pomace racks. If the bed, B, be extended, a cheese may be built upon a board while one is being pressed, and then be slid under the follower when the first one is removed."

The claim is in these words: "The guide frame, D, in combination with an extended pomace rack, and a cloth to inclose a layer of pomace therein, substantially as described."

The answer sets up as defenses, want of novelty, want of patentability, and public use for more than two years before the application for the patent. After a hearing on proofs, a decree was made adjudging the patent to be invalid and dismissing the bill. The plaintiff has appealed.

The decision of the circuit court (21 Blatchf. 376) proceeded on these grounds: 1. Cloths, and also racks, and also guide frames, having each been used before, the aggregation of them, as described in the patent, was not a valid combination. 2. The use of the described guide frame, in connection with the racks and cloths, did not involve invention. 3. The precise combination described in the patent was in public use more than two years before the patent was [338] applied for.

Without examining any other question raised in the case, we are of opinion that the patent must be held void on the second ground above mentioned. A rack on which to place the pomace was old, and a cloth to cover the pomace lying on the rack was old, the two being used in connection, and an enclosure was used with them, which enabled the operator to make the pomace of uniform depth on each rack, and prevented the lateral spreading of the pomace. The only point of the invention would seem to be the use of a guide frame smaller than the rack; or, in other words, the use of a rack larger than the guide frame. There was no invention in making the guide frame or the rack of the desired size. It required only ordinary mechanical skill and judgment. Within the recent cases in this court on the subject the patent must be held void. Vinton v. Hamilton, 104 U. S. 485 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 807]; Hall v. Macneale, 107 U. S. 90 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 367]; Atlantic Works v. Brady, 107 U. S. 192, 200 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 438, 441]; Slawson v. Grand St. R. R. Co. 107 U. v.

ELLEN HASKELL AND J. C. HASKELL.

Construction of Act of Congress of July 23, 1866, "to quiet land titles in California"—survey operative without approval of land commissioner—rights of State and settlers—when title vests.

*1. Where, under the eighth section of the Act of July 23, 1866, "to quiet land titles in California," a survey is made by the U. S. Surveyor-General for California of a claim to land under a confirmed Mexican grant and land is set off by him in satisfaction of the grant, the survey is operative without the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. Land lying outside of such survey then becomes subject to state selection in lieu of school sections covered by the grant, and is open to settlement under the preemption laws.

2. As between the State and the settler, the party which first commences the proceedings required to obtain the title, if they are followed up to the final act for its transfer, is considered to have priority of right. The rule prevails in such cases, first in time first in right.

3. For lands selected by the State of California, it has not been the practice of the Land Department to issue patents. When the selections are approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a list of them, with the certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, is forwarded to the state authorities. This listing operates to transfer the title to the lands, as of the date when the selections were made and reported to the local land-office, and cuts off all subsequent claimants. Accordingly, where a selection was made in 1868, which was subsequently approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands were listed to the State by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, a patent for the same lands issued upon a settlement made in December, 1869, under the preemption laws, conferred no title as against the State.

Argued Nov. 12, 1886. Decided Dec. 6, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice FIELD.

Messrs. George F. Edmunds and William J. Johnson, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith, A. T Britton, J. H. McGowan and A. B. Browne, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of court:

This was an action for the possession of a tract of land in the County of Los Angeles, California, described in the complaint as the southeast quarter of section fourteen, in township two, in that county. The plaintiff asserted [328] title to the premises by a patent of the United States, bearing date October 10, 1879, issued upon an alleged settlement and purchase under the preemption laws. He claimed to have settled upon the land December 21, 1869; to have filed his declaratory statement November 28, 1871; and to have paid the purchase money and received his certificate of entry in April, 1876.

When this action was commenced and when it was tried, Mrs. Fuller was one of the defendants. She traced title to the land by a patent of the State of California to one Keller, bearing date March 4, 1874, issued to him upon a certificate of purchase, given December 21, 1871; and by conveyance from him to her husband, now deceased. By order of the Probate Court of Los Angeles County the land was set apart to her as a homestead. The other defendant claimed possession merely as her agent and employee. After the case was brought to this court she died, and, upon representation that her interest had passed to Ellen Haskell, the latter was substituted as defendant in her place.

The land was selected by the State in part satisfaction of section sixteen of one of the townships of the county, which was within the limits of a confirmed Mexican grant, as hereafter mentioned. By the Act of Congress of March 3, 1853, making the public lands of California, with certain exceptions, subject to the general preemption law of September 4, 1841, sections sixteen and thirty-six of each township were granted to the State for the purpose of public schools, provided the sections, before the public surveys were extended over them, were not settled upon, and the settlement shown by the erection of a dwelling house, or the cultivation of a portion of the land, or were not reserved for public uses or "taken by private claims." If the sections were thus settled upon, or reserved, or "taken by private claims," the State was authorized to select other lands in lieu thereof. 10 Stat. at L. 244, chap. 195, §§ 6, 7. The Mexican grant, within the claimed limits of which the premises in contro- [329] versy were situated, was known as the Sausal Redondo Rancho; it also embraced sections sixteen and thirty-six of the township. It was made to one Antonio Ignacio Abila, May 20, 1837, by the then acting Governor of California. The claim of the grantee to the land was confirmed, on the 10th of June, 1855, by the board of land commissioners for the ascertainment and settlement of private land claims in California, and by the District Court of the United States, at its December Term, 1856. The decree of the court became final by the dismissal, under stipulation of the Attorney-General, of the appeal taken from it to the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1858, a survey of the land claimed was made by a deputy surveyor, but not being approved by the Surveyor-General it amounted to nothing more than a private survey. It was not until 1868 that any other survey was made, nor does it appear that there was any application for one by the grantee or any party interested in the claim. For such neglect, the Act of Congress of July 23, 1866, "to quiet land titles in California," furnished a remedy. 14 Stat. at L. 218, chap. 219. It provided that in all cases where a claim to land by virtue of a right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican authorities had been finally confirmed, or should thereafter be finally confirmed and a survey and plat thereof should not have been requested within ten months after the passage of that Act, or after the final confirmation subsequently made, it should be the duty of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, as soon as practicable, to cause the lines of the public surveys to be extended over said lands, and to set off in full satisfaction of such grant, and according to the lines of the public surveys, the quantity of land confirmed by such final decree, and as nearly as could be done in accordance with it. And the Act declared that "All the land not included in such grant as so set off shall be subject to the general land laws of the United States." Under this Act, the land claimed was surveyed by a deputy United States Surveyor, George Hansen, and set apart to the grantee in satisfaction of the grant. The survey was approved by the Surveyor-General, and over the land the section and township lines were extended. On

The land lying outside of this survey thus became, in the language of the Act, "subject to the general land laws of the United States." It was opened to settlement with other public lands, and consequent preemption by settlers; and to selection by the State in lieu of the school sections within the confirmed Mexican grant. Frasher v. O'Connor, 115 U S. 102, 113 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 311, 315]. As between the settler and the State, the party which first commenced the proceedings required to obtain the title, if followed up to the final act of the government for its transfer, is considered as being entitled to the property. In such cases, the rule prevails that the first in time is the first in right. In Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 424] where there was a contest between a state selection and a settler, we said: "The party who takes the initiatory step in such cases, if followed up to patent, is deemed to have acquired the better right as against others to the premises. The patent, which is afterwards issued, relates back to the date of the initiatory act, and cuts off all intervening claimants. Thus the patent upon a state selection takes effect as of the time when the selection is made and reported to the land-office; and the patent upon a preemption settlement takes effect from the time of the settlement as disclosed in the declaratory statement or proofs of the settler to the register of the local land-office. The action of the State and of the settler must, of course, in some way be brought officially to the notice of the officers of the government having in their custody the records and other evidences of title to the property of the United States, before their respective claims to priority of right can be recognized. But it was not intended by the eighth section of the Act of 1841, in authorizing the State to make selections of land, to interfere with the operation of the other provisions of that Act regulating the system of settlement and preemption. The two modes of acquiring title to land from the United States were not in conflict with each other. Both were to have full operation, that one controlling in a particular case under which the first initiatory step was had."

of the school sections covered by Mexican grants, it has not been the practice of the Land Department to issue patents. When the selections are approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a list of them, with the certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, is forwarded to the state authorities. The list thus certified operates to convey the title to the State as fully as by patent. The Revised Statutes, embodying the provisions of the Statute of August 3, 1854, 10 Stat. at L. 346, chap. 201, provide that when a law of Congress making a grant does not convey the fee simple title to the lands, or require patents to be issued therefor, the lists of such lands certified by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office under his seal of office, either as originals or copies of the originals or records, "shall be regarded as conveying the fee simple of all the lands embraced in such lists that are of the character contemplated by such Act of Congress and intended to be granted thereby; but where lands embraced in such lists are not of the character embraced by such Acts of Congress, and are not intended to be granted thereby, said lists, so far as these lands are concerned, shall be perfectly null and void, and no right, title, claim, or interest shall be conveyed thereby." U. S. R. S. 2449.

Where, by reason of the loss of the school sections, a selection is made of other lands, the list certified operates upon the selection as of the day when made and reported to the local land-office, and cuts off, as would a patent in such cases, all subsequent claimants.

In the present case the selection by the authorities of the State, of the land in controversy, in part satisfaction of school section sixteen covered by the Mexican grant, was made on the 22d of April, 1868, nearly one year and eight months before the alleged settlement of the plaintiff. The subsequent approval of the selection by the Secretary of the Interior and the listing of the land to the State by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, completed the proceedings which vested the title in the State as of the date of the selection.

The case at bar is similar in the principles [332] which control its disposition to that of Frasher v. O'Connor, which was before us at the October Term, 1884 [supra]. It differs from it in the fact that there the defendants claimed that they had acquired, by their settlement upon the land, the right of preemption, and as preemptors were entitled to patents of the United States, and therefore could call in question the validity of the proceedings by which the land was selected by the state agents and listed to the State; but here the plaintiff has obtained a patent of the United States, issued upon a settlement made after the selection of the land by the State. In the former case the court held that the only question for consideration by the officers of the United States respecting lands granted to the State was, whether the State possessed the right to claim the land under the grant, and whether the land was subject to selection by its agents. Irregularities in the transactions between the state agents and its purchasers were matters which did not come under review by those officers. So far as the General Government is concerned, it was sufficient that the State did not complain, and accepted the selection in satisfaction of the grant to her. The claim of a third party could not be improved by showing irregularity in the proceedings to which the State did not object. The issue of a patent to the alleged preemptors in that case—it being held that they had no right to settle upon the land with a view to secure a preemptive right—would not have rendered their position more tenable.

The contention of the plaintiff, as we understand it, is that the land in controversy, being within the claimed limits of a Mexican grant, was not open to selection by the State until the survey of the land confirmed was finally approved by the Land Department, and that such approval was not had until October, 1871, after his settlement. It was upon that theory that the local court of California held that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land-Office (for it seems that they both acted) had inadvertently and by mistake listed the land to the State in lieu of the quarter section supposed to be lost. It would seem that at one time the Land Department had come to the same conclusion, although its utterances on the subject were hesitating and conflicting. In Frasher v. O'Connor we con- [333] sidered at length the effect of the survey of Hansen, and the right of the State to select lieu lands outside of it. By the Act of Congress of July 1, 1864, "to expedite the settlement of titles to land in the State of California" (13 Stat. at L. 332, chap. 194), the surveys of private land claims in that State were made subject to the supervision and control of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. Without his approval a survey had no binding force, and could not be treated as segregating the land surveyed from the public lands. That Act also provided that it should be the duty of the Surveyor-General of California to cause all private land claims finally confirmed to be accurately surveyed, and plats thereof to be made whenever requested by the claimants, provided the claimant should first deposit in the district court of the district a sufficient sum of money to pay the expenses of the survey and plat, and of the publication required. It was supposed that the surveys of confirmed claims under Mexican grants would be thus expedited and patents sooner obtained. But no such result followed. Many claimants failed to ask for a survey of their claims. Most of the grants were of a specific quantity of land lying within boundaries embracing a much larger quantity. The specific quantity to which alone the grantee was entitled could be segregated and set apart only by an official survey. Until that was had the grantee remained a cotenant with the government in possession and use of the whole tract. He was not, therefore, inclined to expedite the survey. His interest was to postpone it. To do away with the delays which grew out of this and other causes, the Act of July 23, 1866, to which we have referred, was passed, declaring that if no survey be requested, as provided by the Act of 1864, within ten months as to previously confirmed claims, and ten months after confirmation as to subsequently confirmed claims, it should be the duty of the Surveyor-General to survey the land and to set off the land confirmed in full satisfaction of the grant; and "that all the land not included in such grant as so set off shall be subject to the general land laws of the United States." The survey in such cases was thus withdrawn from the supervision of the Land Department. That the grantee should be bound by it, at least until the survey should be set aside by competent authority, was not unreasonable. It was always in his power to have a survey made of the confirmed claim under the Act of 1864, which would have been subject to the supervision and control of the Land Department. It was his neglect to request such survey that conferred upon the Surveyor-General the duty of acting [334] upon his own responsibility. That action was sufficient to subject the land outside of the survey to state selection and other modes of disposal of the public lands. It is true the Surveyor-General did afterwards, upon the demand of the grantee, order a new survey and recall the township plats; but his action was not sustained by the Secretary of the Interior. That officer set aside the new survey and ordered the township plats to be returned to the land-office, and approved of the original survey. The selection by the State was made before the order for a new survey and the withdrawal of the township plats. It is not necessary to express any opinion as to what would have been the effect upon the selection if the new survey had been sustained. As we said in Frasher v. O'Connor, "All that is necessary to decide here is, that, after the grant had been surveyed and the township plats filed, the State was at liberty to make selections from land lying outside of the survey, and preemptors were at liberty to settle upon it, and, if the survey were not ultimately set aside, their rights thus initiated would be protected." [Supra.]

The conclusion we have reached renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of the judgment rendered in the case of Keller v. McCreery, as an adjudication of the questions presented with reference to the premises in controversy.

v.

J. D. HOUSTON, State Tax Collector, AND LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 265-280.)

Constitutional law—charter of Louisiana State Lottery Company—embodied in State Constitution of 1879—Legislature cannot contravene, even in exercise of police power—tax upon corporation.

1. The effect of article 167 of the Constitution of Louisiana of 1879 was to revive the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, granted in 1867, except as to certain exclusive privileges, and to recognise the charter, thus modified, as a contract binding on the State for the period therein specified.

2. The grant of the charter to the Louisiana State Lottery Company, being contained in the Constitution of the State, the Legislature, acting under that Constitution, cannot contravene it, although the subject matter of such contract may have been embraced within the police power of the State.

3. Section 48, Act No. 77 of 1880, of the Legislature of Louisiana, imposes a tax upon a corporation, as distinguished from a tax on stockholders, within the meaning of the prohibition in the charter of the Lottery Company.

4. The taxation of the Louisiana State Lottery Company is not within the purview of section 48, or if otherwise, the Act is void.

Argued Nov. 17, 18, 1886. Decided Dec. 6, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Walter H. Rogers and J. Ward Gurley, Jr., for appellants.

[266] Mr. John A. Campbell, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 27th of January, 1881, the Louisiana State Lottery Company, alleging itself to be a corporation under the laws of the State of Louisiana, filed its bill in chancery against the City of New Orleans and the tax assessors for the Parish of Orleans, the object and prayer of which were to obtain a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from the assessment and collection of certain taxes about to be enforced against the complainant by the seizure and sale of its property. On final hearing there was a decree in conformity with the prayer of the bill, from which the defendants below prosecute the present appeal.

The allegations of the bill are, in substance, that by an Act of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana passed in 1868, being Act No. 25 of that year, the Louisiana State Lottery Company was established and organized as a corporation. That, among other immunities and franchises granted by said Act, it was provided in article 5 that the Company "shall pay the State of Louisiana the sum of forty thousand dollars per annum, which sum shall be payable quarterly in advance, from and after the first day of January, 1869, to the state auditor, who shall deposit the same in the treasury of the State, and which shall be credited to the educational fund; and said Corporation shall be exempt from all other taxes and licenses of any kind whatever from the state, parish, or municipal authorities." That in the year 1871 legal proceedings were instituted by the City of New Orleans against the said Company, in the Superior District Court for the Parish of Orleans, for the purpose of enforcing on behalf of said City certain taxes alleged to have been assessed against it, notwithstanding said exemption contained in its charter, the City of New Orleans claiming therein that said exemption was void. That such proceedings were had thereon that on final hearing in the Supreme Court of Louisiana a judgment was rendered in favor of the Lottery Company, declaring said exemption to [267] be valid and the said taxes illegal. That the said Company claims that the provision in its said charter exempting it from taxes as aforesaid beyond the sum of $40,000, payable annually, is a contract between the State of Louisiana and itself, and has been expressly confirmed and recognized as such by the present Constitution of the State of Louisiana, adopted in 1879, in article 167, all the provisions of which, it is alleged in the bill, the complainants have complied with.

The bill further alleges that, notwithstanding the provisions of the said charter, and in defiance of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and contrary to the Constitution of the State, the defendants "are about to levy and assess a tax upon the capital stock and other property of your orator, and the other defendants hereinbefore named have threatened and are about to take proceedings against your orator for the collection of said illegal tax, which is illegal because prohibited by the Constitution of the United States as violative of the said contract between your orator and the State of Louisiana;" that the said officers of the State pretend to justify their action under the provisions of Act No. 77 of the Legislature of Louisiana of 1880, which the complainant avers to be null and void and of no effect, so far as it may be construed to authorize the proceedings of the defendants. The bill alleges that the complainant has always promptly paid the amount called for by its charter to the state treasurer, and in advance, and owes nothing to the State on that account; and accordingly prays for an injunction to restrain the defendants from further attempts to enforce the collection of the tax complained of.

To this bill a joint and several answer was filed by all of the defendants. That answer admits the incorporation of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, as alleged in the bill, and that its charter constitutes a valid contract between the State of Louisiana and the Company. It admits that the defendants are about to levy a tax upon the capital stock and upon other property of the complainant, but denies that such proceedings are illegal; and claims that Act No. 77 of the year 1880, passed by the Louisiana Legislature, is in no respect null and void.

On final hearing a decree was passed, wherein "The court decrees and declares that the Act of [268] the Legislature (No. 77 of the Acts of 1880), so far as it imposes a tax upon the capital stock of the complainant, or upon the shares of the stock held by the shareholders of the complainant, is in conflict with article 5, section 1, of complainant's charter, found in Act No. 25 of the Acts of 1868, and therefore impairs the obligation of a contract and is void. The court further decrees and declares that, under the provisions of said charter as adopted as a contract by the Constitution of 1879, the capital of the complainant, both in the aggregate and as held by its shareholders, is exempted from all taxation of every kind, excepting the annual payment of $40,000. The court further decrees that the defendants herein be enjoined and restrained in manner and form and to the extent prayed for in the bill of complaint herein."

It is objected to this decree, in the first place, on behalf of the City of New Orleans, that that municipality was not properly in court by due service of process, but the objection does not seem to be well founded in fact. There was service of process upon the mayor, which is conceded to be the statutory method of serving process in such cases, and the City actually appeared by attorney and answered.

The principal question, however, arises upon the terms of article 167 of the Constitution of the State of 1879. That clause is as follows: "The General Assembly shall have authority to grant lottery charters or privileges; Provided, Each charter or privilege shall pay not less than forty thousand dollars per annum in money into the treasury of the State; and provided further, that all charters shall cease and expire on the first of January, 1895, after which no lottery shall be drawn within the State of Louisiana. The forty thousand dollars per annum now provided by law to be paid by the Louisiana State Lottery Company, according to the provisions of its charter granted in the year 1868, shall belong to the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, and the charter of said Company is recognized as a contract binding on the State for the period therein specified, except its monopoly clause, which is hereby abrogated; and [269] all laws contrary to the provisions of this article are hereby declared null and void; provided said Company shall file a written renunciation of all its monopoly features in the office of the Secretary of State within sixty days after the ratification of this Constitution."

It appears that by an Act of the Legislature of Louisiana, which took effect on the 31st of March, 1879, Act No. 25 of the year 1868, which incorporated and established the Louisiana State Lottery Company, and all other laws on the same subject matter, were repealed, and the Louisiana State Lottery Company was thereby abolished and prohibited from drawing any and all lotteries or selling lottery tickets, either in its corporate capacity, or through its officers, members, stockholders or agents, either directly or indirectly. That Act also made it a penal offense to draw any lottery or have any connection or interest in or with the drawing of any lottery in the State, or to sell or offer to sell any lottery tickets, or to set up or promote any lottery in the State. This statute took effect before the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, and was in force when the latter went into operation in December, 1879.

It is now contended, on the part of the appellants, that article 167 of the Constitution of the State does not have the effect to revive the original charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company as though it had never been repealed, but revives it only so far as under that clause the General Assembly was authorized to grant lottery charters or privileges in the future; that this constitutional authority to grant new lottery charters or privileges does not warrant the Legislature in stipulating, by way of contract, that the minimum license tax of $40,000 per annum shall be in lieu of all other taxes upon the property, and operate to exempt the Company, so far as taxation is concerned, from the effect of other clauses of the Constitution; that, by other provisions of the Constitution, particularly article 207, no property can be exempt from taxation except public property, places of religious worship or burial, charitable institutions, buildings and property used exclusively for colleges and other school purposes, real and personal estate of public libraries, household property to the value of $500, and, for the period of ten [270] years from the adoption of the Constitution, the capital, machinery and other property employed in certain enumerated manufactories, wherein not less than five hands are employed in any one factory.

It is argued that the whole proper effect to be given to the provisions of article 167 of the Constitution is to secure to the Louisiana State Lottery Company such a charter as the General Assembly was authorized thereby to grant to any other lottery company, and to modify it as though it had been actually granted by the General Assembly under that clause. This intent is inferred from the language of the Constitution, which specifically forbids the future existence of the "monopoly clause" of the charter of the Company, and requires it to file a written renunciation of this feature with the Secretary of State within sixty days after the ratification of the Constitution; the object in view being, as it is contended, obviously, to place the Louisiana State Lottery Company under its charter as granted in the year 1868, but subject to and modified by the provisions of the Constitution of 1879, on an equal footing merely with other and new lottery companies, to which by the terms of the Constitution the General Assembly was authorized to grant charters; and the conclusion deduced is that as under that Constitution the General Assembly had no authority to grant a charter for a lottery company which should contain the exemption relied upon as the ground of relief in the present suit, the exemption so relied on was repealed by the Constitution.

The argument seems to be that if the Louisiana State Lottery Company is exempt from taxation beyond the annual sum of $40,000, and other companies to be chartered under the Constitution of 1879 are not and cannot be, the monopoly secured to the former by its original charter is perpetuated and not abrogated, as it was the express purpose of the Constitution to accomplish, for the reason that such a discrimination effectually and in advance prevents all possible competition.

The charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, being Act No. 25 of the year 1868, [271] establishes a corporation for the purpose of carrying on the business of a lottery, with a capital stock of $1,000,000. By the 4th section of the 8th article it was provided that the Corporation should continue during the term of twenty-five years from January 1, 1869, for which time, it was added, it "shall have the sole and exclusive privilege of establishing and authorizing a lottery or series of lotteries, and selling and disposing of lottery tickets, policy combination devices, and certificates and fractional parts thereof." And by section 5 of the same article it was provided "That the said Corporation shall also have the sole right and privilege, during the whole term of its existence as hereinbefore provided for, to dispose of by lottery, or series of lotteries, any lands, improved or unimproved, which said Corporation may become possessed of by purchase or otherwise."

The exclusive right conferred by these provisions became the subject of judicial consideration by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. Richoux, decided in November, 1871, and reported in 23 La. Ann. 743. By the decision in that case the exclusive right claimed by the Louisiana State Lottery Company to establish lotteries and to sell lottery tickets in the State, was adjudged in its favor by an injunction restraining the defendants from vending lottery tickets of other companies, in violation of the exclusive right claimed by the plaintiffs. The validity of the exemption of the Lottery Company from taxation in excess of the annual sum of $40,000, as stipulated in article 5, section 1, of its charter, was upheld by a decision of the same court in the case of Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. New Orleans, 24 La. Ann. 86. The exemption was attacked in that case on the ground that it was in violation of the State Constitution then in force, because it infringed the principle of equality and uniformity in the matter of imposing taxes, the Legislature being prohibited from exempting from taxation any species of property except such as was actually used for charitable, educational or religious purposes; and for the additional reason that it granted certain rights to the plaintiff which were denied to other citizens of the State. In reference to these objections the Supreme Court of Louisiana said: "It may be said that the power [272] of a State Legislature to impose what is known as a commutation tax is a well-recognized power, not only in our own jurisprudence, but generally. New Orleans v. Mascaro, 11 La. Ann. 733; Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 594]; Ill. Cent. R. R. v. Co. of McLean, 17 Ill. 291; Clarke v. Henshaw, 30 Ind. 146. In the Act under consideration the Legislature has deemed it advisable to grant to the Lottery Company an exemption from all other taxation except of paying $40,000 per annum to the State for public education. On the commutation principle, we think the Act is not violative of the Constitution. It is not clear that the City has any grounds to object to this exemption by the State of the Company it claims the right to require the payment of licenses from, the City being a municipal corporation and deriving its right to levy licenses from the State, and in this instance the right is withheld." The City of New Orleans was accordingly enjoined from further attempts to collect from the Lottery Company any municipal taxes or licenses.

It was in view of these decisions of the Supreme Court of the State, that the present Constitution was framed and adopted. Article 167 of that instrument expressly recognizes the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, as granted in the year 1868, as existing with the force both of law and of contract, with the exceptions mentioned. It specifies that "The $40,000 per annum now provided by law to be paid by the Louisiana State Lottery Company, according to the provisions of its charter, granted in the year 1868, shall belong to the Charity Hospital of New Orleans;" but the only law which provided for the payment of $40,000 per annum was the charter of the Company, and this clause diverts it from the educational fund, to which it had been appropriated by the terms of the charter, to the uses of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans. The article of the Constitution then proceeds to say: "And the charter of said Company is recognized as a contract binding on the State for the period therein specified, except its monopoly clause, which is hereby abrogated." The monopoly clause hereby excepted and abrogated can be no other than that already referred to as contained in sections 4 and 5 of article 8, by which was conferred upon the Corporation the sole and exclusive privilege of establishing and authorizing a lottery or series of lotteries, and selling and disposing [273] of lottery tickets, etc. These are the only clauses in the charter granting any exclusive rights, and, therefore, the only ones which can be properly styled monopoly clauses.

The constitutional article then proceeds to say that "All laws contrary to the provisions of this article are hereby declared null and void." This clause operates as a repeal of so much of Act No. 44, approved March 27, 1879, as repeals the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, and prohibits it from drawing lotteries and selling lottery tickets. That it did operate to that extent, but no further, was the express decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of State, ex rel. Carcass v. Judge of First Dist. Court, 32 La. Ann. 719. It was held in that case that those portions of Act No. 44 which define the offenses of drawing lotteries and selling lottery tickets, and providing punishment therefor, by all persons other than the Louisiana State Lottery Company, were not affected by the Constitution of 1879. The court in its opinion says: "Construing the Act of 1879 and the article of the Constitution together, so as to give full effect to each and all the parts of both, and blending them together, we consider that the law of Louisiana on the subject of the vending of lottery tickets simply is: The sale of lottery tickets in this State is absolutely prohibited unless by organizations chartered by the State, which before dealing in that kind of speculation, shall have paid an annual license of not less than $40,000 to the State. There shall exist no monopoly for the sale of such tickets or doing such business. Individuals violating the law by selling lottery tickets or dealing in the lottery business, without having previously obtained a charter and paid the required license in the manner provided by law, shall be prosecuted and punished by fine and imprisonment. The Louisiana State Lottery Company, previously in existence, shall continue its operations on abdicating all its professions to a monopoly, and on complying with the requirements touching the payment of the license."

The effect, therefore, of article 167 of the Constitution of Louisiana is to revive the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company granted in the year 1868, notwithstanding its repeal [274] by Act No. 44 of the year 1879, except as to the clause which confers upon it the exclusive privilege of establishing a lottery and dealing in lottery tickets, and to recognize the charter thus modified as a contract binding on the State for the period therein specified. This renews and establishes the obligation of the Corporation under section 1, article 5 of its charter, to pay to the State the annual sum of $40,000, in consideration of which it is declared to be "exempt from all other taxes and licenses of any kind whatever, whether from state, parish or municipal authorities."

In answer to the argument of counsel that this places the Louisiana State Lottery Company, under the Constitution of 1879, on a better footing than any other lottery company chartered by the General Assembly thereafter, for the reason that no such exemption can be granted to the latter, it is sufficient to say, that, if this consequence be admitted, the monopoly, which is supposed to be thus created in favor of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, is not one derived under any clause of its charter, as granted in the year 1868, but is one created by the Constitution itself, although, merely by way of inference, by this mode of interpretation.

It is further contended, however, on the part of the appellants, that if the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company is recognized as a contract by article 167 of the Constitution, it is not such a contract as is protected by the Constitution of the United States against future legislation by the State impairing its obligation, for the reason that its subject matter is embraced within the scope of the police power of the State, the exercise of which cannot be effectually bound by contract. And thus the case is thought to be brought within the principle established by this court in the case of Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 1079]. In its opinion in that case the court said: "The contracts which the Constitution protects are those that relate to property rights, not governmental. It is not always easy to tell on which side of the line which separates governmental from property rights a particular case is to be put; but in respect to lotteries there can be no difficulty. They are not, in the legal acceptation of the term, mala in se, but, as we have just seen, may properly be made mala prohibita. * * * Certainly the right to suppress them is governmental, to be exercised at all times by those in power at their discretion. Anyone, therefore, who accepts a lottery charter does so with the implied understanding that the people [275] in their sovereign capacity, and through their properly constituted agencies, may resume it at any time when the public good shall require, whether it be paid for or not. All that one can get by such a charter is a suspension of certain governmental rights in his favor, subject to withdrawal at will. He has in legal effect nothing more than a license to enjoy the privilege, on the terms named, for the specified time, unless it be sooner abrogated by the sovereign power of the State. It is a permit, good as against existing laws, but subject to future legislative and constitutional control or withdrawal."

This language must be construed in reference to the circumstances of the case in respect to which it was used. That was a case of an Act of the Legislature of Mississippi granting a charter to a lottery company abrogated by a provision in the Constitution of the State subsequently adopted. The converse is the present case. The grant of the charter to the Louisiana State Lottery Company is contained in the Constitution, and the question is whether the Legislature, acting under that Constitution, can contravene it. That is a question which needs no answer; its statement is sufficient. It is undoubtedly true that no rights of contract are or can be vested under this constitutional provision which a subsequent Constitution might not destroy without impairing the obligation of a contract, within the sense of the Constitution of the United States, for the reason assigned in the case of Stone v. Mississippi. But an ordinary Act of legislation cannot have that effect, because the constitutional provision has withdrawn from the scope of the police power of the State, to be exercised by the General Assembly, the subject matter of the granting of lottery charters, so far as the Louisiana State Lottery Company is concerned, and any Act of the Legislature contrary to this prohibition is upon [276] familiar principles null and void. The subject is not within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, as it is permitted to be exercised by the Legislature under the Constitution of the State.

It is next contended, on the part of the appellants, that the exemption contained in the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, as confirmed by the Constitution of the State, does not extend further than those taxes and licenses in excess of the annual sum of $40,000, which may be assessed upon the Corporation itself; and it is said that the tax sought to be levied, and the assessment of which has been enjoined in the present case, is not a tax upon the Corporation itself, but upon the shareholders on account of their shares in its capital stock held by them as individuals. The facts in regard to the character of the tax, and the mode of its assessment, do not clearly appear from the pleadings. In the bill it is alleged that the defendants "are about to levy and assess a tax upon the capital stock and other property of your orator," and "are about to take proceedings against your orator for the collection of said alleged tax * * * by serving a notice to that effect, to seize and sell the property rights and credits of your orator," and that these acts are done under the pretended authority of "the provisions of Act No. 77 of the Legislature of Louisiana of 1880, which said law," it is averred, "is null and void and of no effect, so far as your orator is concerned, inasmuch as by authorizing the levy of a tax upon the property of your orator, other than that provided for in the charter of your orator as aforesaid, said Act violates the contract between your orator and the State of Louisiana by requiring of your orator other taxes than those provided for in said charter, and is repugnant to paragraph 2, section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States."

In the answer the defendants "admit that, at the time of the issuance of the preliminary injunction herein, the State Assessors for the Parish of Orleans were about to levy a tax upon the capital stock of the complainant, and upon other of complainant's property;" and the State Tax Collector admits that he had served notice [277] upon the Company, that he was about "to seize and sell the property rights and credits of complainant, and to take the legal measures to enforce the collection of the tax complained of." It is also admitted, on the part of the City of New Orleans, that it intended to compel payment of the taxes assessed as aforesaid on its behalf, and Act No. 77 of the Legislature of Louisiana of 1880 is set up as a justification. Section 48 of that Act is as follows: "That no assessment shall hereafter be made under that name, as heretofore, of the capital stock of any national bank, state bank, banking company, banking firm, or banking association, or of any corporation, company, firm, or association, whose capital stock is represented by shares; but the actual shares shall be assessed to the shareholders who appear as such upon the books, regardless of any transfer not registered or entered upon the books; and it shall be the duty of the president, or other proper officer, to furnish to the tax collector a complete list of those who are borne upon the books as shareholders; and all the taxes so assessed shall be paid by the bank, company, firm, association or corporation, which shall be entitled to collect the amounts from the shareholders or their transferees. All property owned by the bank, company, firm, association or corporation, which is taxable under sections one and three of this Act shall be assessed directly to the bank, company, firm, association or corporation, and the pro rata of such direct property taxes, and of all exempt property, proportioned to each share of capital stock, shall be deducted from the amount of taxes assessed to that share under this section. * * * Such assessments shall be made where the bank, etc., is located, and not elsewhere, whether the shareholders reside there or not. * * * ."

It is well settled by the decisions of this court that the property of shareholders in their shares, and the property of the corporation in its capital stock, are distinct property interests, and, where that is the legislative intent clearly expressed, that both may be taxed. Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 229]; Delaware R. R. Tax, 18 Wall. 206 [85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 888]; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 558].

[278] [Bk. 29, L. ed. 830, 832], the chief justice delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In corporations four elements of taxable value are sometimes found: (1) franchises; (2) capital stock in the hands of the corporation; (3) corporate property; and (4) shares of the capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders. Each of these is, under some circumstances, an appropriate subject of taxation; and it is no doubt within the power of a State, when not restrained by constitutional limitations, to assess taxes upon them in a way to subject the corporation or the stockholders to double taxation. Double taxation is, however, never to be presumed. Justice requires that the burdens of government shall, as far as is practicable, be laid equally on all, and if property is taxed once in one way, it would ordinarily be wrong to tax it again in another way, when the burden of both taxes fall on the same person. Sometimes tax laws have that effect; but if they do, it is because the Legislature has mistakenly so enacted. All presumptions are against such an imposition."

But the question of legislative intent is always open upon the language of the exemption. In the present case the Corporation is exempted by its charter from all other taxes and licenses of any kind whatever in excess of the sum of $40,000 per annum, and yet by Act No. 77, though the assessment is not to be made upon its capital stock, but upon the shares of shareholders appearing upon its books, nevertheless, the tax so assessed is to be paid by the Company, although it is entitled to collect the amount so paid from the shareholder on whose account it is payable; but this payment by the Company is to be made irrespective of any dividends or profits payable to the shareholder out of which it might be repaid. That it is substantially a tax upon the Corporation itself, is unequivocally shown by the subsequent clause which authorizes a deduction from the amount of taxes assessed to each share of its proportion of the direct property taxes paid by the Company as such under sections 1 and 3, and of all exempt property belonging to the Corporation. But as all the property of the Louisiana State Lottery Company is exempt from taxes after payment of the annual sum of $40,000, nothing remains to be charged as a tax upon the shareholder as distinct from the Corporation under [279] the provisions of this section. Indeed, it is quite apparent from the language of the whole section, that, while nominally the taxes authorized are not to be assessed upon the capital stock of the Corporation in the aggregate and as its property, yet in substance that is its effect. The taxes are assessed upon the actual shares as registered in the names of individual shareholders but are to be paid by the Corporation, so that, while the form and mode of taxation is changed, its substance remains as though assessed against the Corporation by name.

The case differs altogether from that of U. S. v. R. R. Co. 17 Wall. 322 [84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 597], in which it was held that the tax provided for in the 122d section of the Internal Revenue Act of 1864, as amended, requiring railroad and other corporations to pay a tax upon interest and dividends payable by them, with the right to deduct the same from the amounts otherwise due to creditors and stockholders, was a tax upon the latter and not upon the corporation, because the corporation was made use of merely as a convenient means of collecting the tax. And it cannot be considered as ultimately a tax upon the shares, as the property of the shareholders, within the principle of the decision in Nat. Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 353 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 701]. There the Act of Congress expressly distinguished between the taxing of the bank and the taxing of its shareholders on account of their shares, and, as was held in that case, left it open to the State to collect the tax levied on the shares by imposing the duty of collecting it upon the corporation. That, we think, is prohibited in this case by the terms of the contract contained in the charter, which exempts the Corporation from the payment of all taxes whatever in excess of the specified annual sum, whether levied on it or to be paid by it on any account whatever. A tax such as that sought to be imposed upon the Company by the appellees is a tax upon the Corporation within the meaning of the prohibition of its charter, because it is compelled to become surety for taxes nominally imposed upon its stockholders, and is made liable primarily for their payment; a payment which, in the first instance, must be made out of the corporate property, without other resource than an action against individual stockholders to recover the amounts advanced on their account.

The fair inference is that the taxation of the Louisiana State Lottery Company is not within the purview of section 48 of Act No. 77 of the year 1880, and that it was not within the intention of the Legislature, as expressed in that Act, to impose upon the Company any other taxes than those provided for in its own charter; but if otherwise, Act No. 77 is void, as a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

We find no error in the decree of the Circuit Court, and it is therefore affirmed.

CITY OF FORT WAYNE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 312-322.)

Construction of contract for water works—changes in plan by city—contractors' claim for extras allowed.

1. The clause in a contract for the construction of water works, providing that no claim for extra work should be allowed unless done in obedience to a written order by the engineer and trustees, and the clause providing that the trustees shall have the right to make any alterations in the plan of the work, held to be independent.

2. The trustees having changed the place of crossing a river, after the contract had been made, so as largely to increase the expense, the contractors are entitled to recover the value of the extra labor and material, although no written order for such change had been given to them.

3. A provision in the contract that all loss or damage arising "from any unforeseen obstructions, or any difficulties that may be encountered in the prosecution of the work shall be incurred by the contractors without extra charge" to the city, does not apply to difficulties at the changed place of crossing the river, arising from increased depth of water and quicksand.

4. A provision in the contract that the contractors "shall have no claim upon the city for any delay in the delivery of pipes or other materials from the manufacturers" does not cover the case of damages occasioned by the defective character of castings, which defect was such as could only be discovered after the castings had been delivered and put in place.

5. The size of valve boxes, not being mentioned in the contract, the usual size was to be understood; and the contractors were entitled to recover for the extra expense involved in putting in those of an unusual size which were required by the trustees.

Argued Nov. 16, 1886. Decided Dec. 6, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. J. Rodman Paul and George W. Biddle, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs were entitled, under the contract, to submit to the jury their claim for the additional expense caused by a change of plan, ordered by the defendant, which fixed the crossing of the river at Clinton Street instead of at Calhoun Street.

The stipulation of the contract that claims for extra work should not be entertained, unless done in obedience to a written order, had no reference to work done in pursuance of a change of plan, which was governed by an entirely different clause of the contract, by which the water works trustees were authorized to change the plan; and it was agreed that extra work performed in consequence of such change should be paid for at contract rates for work of its class.

Plaintiffs might have disregarded the express agreement for payment altogether, and recovered on their common counts by indebitatus assumpsit for the work done.

The trustees were expressly authorized to make alterations in the plan of the work, and alterations made by them were in legal effect made by the City itself.

Where contract work is increased by reason of a change of plan directed by the party for whom the work is done, or by one authorized by him to make such change, the contractor is entitled to recover the value of such work in an action of indebitatus assumpsit apart from his remedy under the contract.

Dermott v. Jones, 23 How. 233 (64 U. S. 16: 448); Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 9 (69 U. S. 17: 764); Mfg. Co. v. U. S. 17 Wall. 592 (84 U. S. 21: 715).

In Indiana where the contract was made, it is established that a party to a special contract may recover on a quantum meruit for work done outside of it.

Adams v Cosby, 48 Ind. 153; Canby v. Ingersol, 4 Blackf. 493; Shilling v. Templeton, 66 Ind. 585.

The plaintiff is entitled to show to a jury that this extra work was done.

Dubois v. Del. etc. Canal Co. 12 Wend. 334 Bestor v. U. S. 8 Nott & Hunt. 425.

The plaintiffs were entitled to submit to the jury their claim for the extra expense caused by the defective shape and size of the special castings furnished by the defendant.

Messenger v. Buffalo, 21 N. Y. 196.

The plaintiffs were entitled to submit to the jury their claim for the difference in cost between the valve boxes originally agreed upon, and those subsequently ordered by the defendant. There is no provision in the contract relating to the size or cost of the valve boxes; and where a contract is silent the ordinary and usual dimensions and costs are presumed.

Whart. Ev. § 969; Heald v. Cooper, 8 Me. 32.

Mr. L. M. Ninde, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [313]

This is an action at law, brought October 26, 1881, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, by Richard Wood and others, partners, doing business as R. D. Wood & Co., in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, against the City of Fort Wayne, a municipal corporation in Indiana, to recover damages for the alleged breach by the latter of a written agreement made between it and the plaintiffs, on the 10th of September, 1879, in reference to the construction by the latter of water works in the City of Fort Wayne. The agreement was made between the City, by its "trustees of water works," of the first part, and R. D. Wood & Co., of the second part, and bore the seal of the City, and the statement that it was "approved by the City Council, September 15, 1879," signed by the clerk.

By the contract the party of the second part agrees, for the consideration mentioned in it, "to do all the work and furnish all the materials called for by this agreement, and in strict accordance with the specifications and requirements as hereinafter set forth. And that the said City shall have the right to appoint such civil engineer, and inspectors under him, as the trustees of water works may deem advisable; and that said engineer shall determine the amount of work and materials to be paid for under this contract, decide all questions relative to the execution thereof, and his estimate and decision shall be final and conclusive. The whole to be in accordance with the preceding proposal signed by the said second party, and conformably to the following specifications, [314] both of which are to be mutually considered, as to all expressions, intents and purposes, as a part of this contract."

The material parts of the agreement, out of which the questions involved in the suit arise, are as follows:

"Specifications. The work to be done consists in furnishing * * * cast-iron water pipes," some "of sizes ranging from 24 inches to 4 inches diameter; * * * also, in trenches, laying pipes and special castings, including back filling, setting valves, constructing and setting valve boxes, vaults and covers, and setting hydrants, including all crossings of rivers and canals. * * *

The delivery of the pipe shall commence on or before the first day of October, 1879, and be continued with regularity until the completion of the contract, which shall be on or before the first day of June, 1880. Special castings shall be delivered as may be required by the engineer. * * *

Pipe laying will consist in excavating and refilling trenches; in taking up and replacing pavements or other surfaces; in hauling and laying pipes, setting special castings, stopcocks, aircocks, checkvalves, hydrants, and all other appurtenances incident to the pipe distribution; in cutting pipes, making joints, preparing foundations, building brick or stone vaults, blow-off wells; in repairing damages caused to gas pipes, sewers, drains, and cisterns; in clearing the streets and grounds of all rubbish or refuse caused by the above work; in furnishing lead and gasket for joints, fuel for melting lead, clay and rope for bands, blocks and wedges for use under pipes, wrought-iron straps for securing caps, reducers, and other parts liable to draw; in furnishing and setting or constructing boxes or vaults for stopcocks, aircocks and manholes, including furnishing and fitting cast-iron frames and covers thereto; in furnishing sand and all other materials for masonry, and all tools and labor necessary for the complete fulfillment of this contract. * * *

The above work to be done in the City of Fort Wayne, Indiana, along the lines and in the streets, as indicated on the distribution map in the office of the trustees or city engineer's office, and in such other streets and places in said City as may be directed. The trenches for [315] the pipes shall be opened in accordance with the lines and grades as given or directed by the engineer. * * *

All pipes, special castings, stopcocks, aircocks, checkvalves and hydrants will be furnished to the contractor in the city pipeyard, or on the cars upon which they are received from the foundry. They will be delivered to him as soon as received, and it shall be his duty to notify the engineer of any defects or breakage before removal from cars; otherwise, all damage arising from such cause shall be made good by said contractor. The contractor shall have no claim upon the City for any delay in the delivery of pipes or other materials from the manufacturers. * * *

Stopcocks, aircocks, hydrants, special castings, and all other parts pertinent to the supply or distribution, shall be set or laid at the required points in such manner as the engineer may direct. * * *

A box or vault of wood or masonry shall be furnished and set over each of the stopcocks, and over each of the aircocks and manhole pipes, and the iron frames and covers shall be properly fastened to them. These boxes are to be made of the form and dimensions shown on the plans furnished, and approved by the engineer. * * *

And the said party of the second part hereby agrees to receive, and the said first party hereby agrees to pay, the following prices as full compensation for the work contemplated in this contract:

1. For laying the pipes and all special castings appertaining thereto, setting checkvalves, stopcocks and aircocks, including the excavation and refilling of trenches; all bailing and shoring and ramming; the taking up and replacing paving or other surface of the streets; the removal of all rejected or surplus materials from the grounds or streets; the repairing of damage caused to gaspipes, sewers, drains, streets, cisterns, etc., and the expense of avoiding such obstructions; the hauling of all pipes and other castings and appurtenances on to the grounds, and returning those not used to the pipeyard; the furnishing of all blocks and wedges, and all materials for making the joints; the cutting of pipes; and all other expenses of materials, tools and labor required by the specifi- [316] cations and incident to this particular work; the lengths to be measured along the center of the pipe, and in the case of branches as starting from the center of the main pipe—twenty-four-inch pipe—the sum of sixty (60) cents per lineal foot. * * *

5. For furnishing and setting all wooden stopcock and aircock boxes, including fitting and securing the iron covers, the sum of —— each; cost is included in price for pipe laying. * * *

And it is hereby agreed that no claim for extra work shall be made or entertained, unless such extra work shall have been done in obedience to a written order of the engineer and trustees, and a stipulated price for same agreed upon, whenever such stipulation may be practicable. When otherwise, such claims to be made to the trustees in writing within ten days after the completion of such extra work, or before the payment of the next succeeding monthly estimate after such work is done; failing to do which all rights of the contractor to such extra pay shall be forfeited. * * *

The said trustees shall have the right to make any alterations in the extent, dimensions, form or plan of the work contemplated by this contract, either before or after the commencement of construction. If such alterations diminish the quantity of work, the price paid shall be proportionately diminished, and no anticipated profits allowed for the work omitted. If they increase the work, such actual increase to be paid for at contract rate for work of its class.

All loss or damage arising out of the nature of the work aforesaid, or from the action of the elements, or from any unforeseen obstructions, or any difficulties that may be encountered in the prosecution of the same, also for all expenses which may be incurred in consequence of the temporary suspension of any part of said work, shall be incurred by the contractor without extra charge to said City."

The complaint sets forth a compliance by the plaintiffs with the contract, and the completion of the work September 1, 1880, and the failure of the defendant to pay to them $4,179.75 allowed by the contract to be retained by the defendant until six months after the completion [317] of the work.

It also avers, in its second paragraph, that, before the contract was made, two agents of the plaintiffs were shown by the trustees a distribution map in the office of the city engineer, as indicating the lines and streets on which the pipes were to be laid, from which to make their bid for the work; that, before making their bid, they examined the map, and found that the main pipe leading from the pumping works to the reservoir was to cross the St. Mary's River on the line of Calhoun Street; that they thereupon carefully examined the river bed in the Calhoun Street line, and estimated that the crossing of the river at that place would cost only $500, which was a correct estimate of such costs; that the bid of the plaintiffs for the work and the contract was made with express reference to the crossing of the river at that place; that the contract expressly refers to such distribution map, as showing the lines and the streets on which the work was to be done, it being the only distribution map then on file in the office of the trustees or in that of the city engineer; that, as the plaintiffs were about commencing the work, their agents were informed by the trustees and the engineer that they had changed the plan of the work so as to make the crossing of the river on the line of Clinton Street instead of Calhoun Street, and the plaintiffs were ordered to make the crossing at Clinton Street; that the plaintiffs, after their agents had examined the river bed at the Clinton Street crossing, and had found that the water there was seven feet deep (it being only about two feet deep at the Calhoun Street crossing), and that the bed of the river was composed of quicksand, protested against the change, and declined to go on with the work unless they would be paid for the extra or additional cost of making the crossing at Clinton Street, over the cost of making it at Calhoun Street; that the trustees requested such agents not to make at that time any claim for extra work or extra pay for crossing the river, and insisted that the work should be proceeded with, promising that they would in future make it all right about such extra work; that such agents gave to the trustees notice in writing that, by reason of such change, the plaintiffs would demand extra pay for crossing at Clinton Street equal to the difference in cost [318] over crossing at Calhoun Street; that, under the direction of the trustees and the engineer, the plaintiffs laid the main pipe across the river, on the new line, at an additional cost, over the cost of crossing at Calhoun Street, of $4,575; and that, within two days after the completion of the work of crossing the river, such agents made their claim in writing to the trustees for the extra work, with an itemized account of its cost, the whole cost being $5,075, from which $500 was to be deducted, as the cost of crossing at Calhoun Street, the item being, "Extra expense on river crossing with 24 inch pipe, caused by change of original plan, $4,575."

The complaint also contains, in its third paragraph, the common counts, claiming $12,000 for work and labor done, materials furnished, personal property sold and delivered, and money paid, laid out and expended. A bill of particulars under this paragraph claims, in addition to the $4,575, these items: "Extra expense caused by special castings not fitting, and delay in receiving same, in 20 inch line, $750; 149 wooden valve boxes, difference between those furnished and those contracted for, at $3, $447."

The defendant demurred to the second paragraph of the complaint, but the demurrer was overruled. It then answered by a general denial and a plea of payment in full. It also set up a claim of $3,000 against the plaintiffs for work done by the defendant, which the plaintiffs were bound by the contract to do but neglected to do.

As to the second paragraph of the complaint, the answer avers that, when the contract was executed, it was stated to the plaintiffs, and agreed, that no map or plan of distribution of pipes had been made, but that the defendant's engineer, Cook, would prepare such a map and plan and file it in the office of the trustees or in that of the city engineer; that such map and plan was to be the map and plan referred to in the contract, and was to designate the streets on which the pipes were to be laid, to all of which the plaintiffs then agreed; that Cook prepared a plan and map, and it was filed; that, when the plaintiffs commenced work, they inquired where the pipes were to be laid, and [319] the city engineer pointed out to them where the work was to be done and, at their request, prepared a map and plan showing the manner in which the pipe was to be laid under the river on the line of Clinton Street, which the plaintiffs accepted, and which was in accordance with Cook's map and plan; that the plaintiffs then commenced work on Clinton Street, in excavating and laying pipes under the river, where it crossed Clinton Street, and according to such working plan, without objecting; that it was no more difficult or expensive to lay the pipe under the river on Clinton Street than it would have been to lay it under the river where the river crosses Calhoun Street; and that any expenditure over $500 was the result of extravagance and unskillfulness.

As to the third paragraph of the complaint, the answer, in its sixth paragraph, avers that all the materials were furnished, and all the labor was performed, under the written contract, at prices specially set forth therein; that the contract price has been fully paid; and that no written order was made by the city engineer and the trustees, directing the plaintiffs to furnish any extra materials or do any extra work.

A motion by the plaintiffs to strike out the sixth paragraph of the answer was denied, and then the plaintiffs replied denying generally the allegations of the answer.

The case was tried before a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiffs, for $4,100, being the amount agreed to be due to the plaintiffs, excluding the three above named items of $4,575, $750, and $447, amounting to $5,772; and a judgment for $4,100, with interest and costs, was entered for the plaintiffs, to review which they have brought this writ of error.

The plaintiffs gave some evidence in support of the three items amounting to $5,772 (the defendant introducing no evidence); but the court declined to allow the plaintiffs to introduce further testimony in support of those items, "on the ground," as the bill of exceptions states, "that, notwithstanding the location of the crossing of the St. Mary's at Calhoun Street, the defendant had a right, under its contract with the plaintiffs, to change the place of crossing to Clinton Street, as it did, said [320] contract securing to the defendant that right, and that the plaintiffs had no right, under the contract between the parties, to claim anything on account of either of the three items." The court also struck out all of the plaintiffs' evidence, except the contract, in support of the three items, and instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiffs for $4,100. To these rulings and instructions the plaintiffs excepted. This action of the circuit court is assigned for error.

We are of opinion that the court erred in its view of the rights of the plaintiffs under the contract. The clause providing that no claim for extra work shall be made or entertained, unless such extra work shall have been done in obedience to a written order of the engineer and trustees, is an independent clause from that which provides that the trustees shall have the right to make any alterations in the plan of the work, either before or after its commencement; and the extra work referred to in the former clause does not embrace work done in pursuance of an alteration made by the trustees in the plan. The latter work may be, in one sense, extra work; but if it results from an alteration of plan by the trustees, and there is, in consequence, an increase in the quantity of work, the actual increase is to be paid for at the "contract rate for work of its class." The extra work referred to in the former clause required the authoritative written order of the engineer and trustees; but, as the trustees had the right to alter the plan, work done to carry out such alteration, when made by the trustees, was authorized by the trustees, in a manner equivalent to a written order by them and the engineer. The change of plan involved in crossing at Clinton Street was authority for the additional cost of crossing there, without a written order.

The contract states that the work is to be done "along the lines and in the streets, as indicated on the distribution map." The plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that the map which the plaintiffs' agents examined before making the contract did not then show a crossing at Clinton Street; that the plaintiffs consequently based their estimates and bid on a crossing at Calhoun Street; that the change by the trustees to Clinton Street was notified to the plaintiffs on the day on which the work on the river was to begin; that the map was sub- [321] sequently marked with a crossing at Clinton Street; and that the increased cost caused by the change was $4,575. The contract expressly provides that if the alteration of the plan increases the quantity of work, the actual increase shall be paid for by the City. The only measure of payment provided for is the "contract rate for work of its class." The price fixed in the contract, of 60 cents per lineal foot for laying 24 inch pipe, such as that used in crossing the river, was based on the obstructions and difficulties to be expected in crossing at Calhoun Street, in two feet of water; the general price being based on the laying of the pipe on land, and the expense of crossing the river at Calhoun Street being estimated at $500, in the price per lineal foot asked for laying 24 inch pipe. The increase of cost in crossing at Clinton Street was $4,575. The contract fixes no special rate for laying the pipe under the river; and it cannot fairly be said that there was any contract rate for work of the class of that done in crossing the river in the depth of water, and with the quicksand, found at Clinton Street. On the view taken by the defendant, the trustees could have made an alteration of plan requiring that the pipes should traverse a great length of the river, in deep water and quicksand, in crossing it diagonally, and the City could have had all the work done at the general price per lineal foot for laying the pipe. The contract is not capable of such a construction. The actual increase of cost is to be paid for.

The provision that all loss or damage arising "from any unforeseen obstructions, or any difficulties that may be encountered in the prosecution of the" work, "shall be incurred by the contractor without extra charge" to the City, cannot fairly apply to the obstructions and difficulties at the changed place of crossing, resulting from the increased depth of water and the quicksand.

As to the claim for the $750, the "special castings" were to be supplied by the defendant from a manufacturer at Fort Wayne, and not by the plaintiffs. They were connections between larger and smaller pipes. The plaintiffs had the trenches ready, but the castings, when [322] furnished to them, were defective in size; and expense and delay ensued, in remedying the defects, causing a damage to the plaintiffs, as alleged, of $750. The defendant contends that the clause in the contract which provides that the plaintiffs "shall have no claim upon the City for any delay in the delivery of pipes or other materials from the manufacturers," throws the loss from these defects on the plaintiffs. But we do not so think. The defects were such as could not be detected till the castings were being put in place, and the claim is not for delay in their delivery, within the meaning of the clause referred to. Nor does any work done by the plaintiffs in altering the castings, come under the head of such extra work as required a written order.

The size of the valve boxes is not mentioned in the contract, nor their cost. They were, therefore, to be of the usual size and cost. The trustees afterwards required the valve boxes to be of a size which made them cost $8 more each than those of the usual size would have cost. This was a change of plan, and the increased work caused by it is agreed to be paid for, but there is no contract rate for work of the class. The item of $447 seems to be recoverable.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to award a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

[343] FRANKLIN COIT, Admr. of WILLIAM A. COIT, Deceased, Appt.,
v.
NORTH CAROLINA GOLD AMALGAMATING COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 343-347.)

Corporations—personal liability of stockholders—stock paid for in property—increase of capital stock.

In an action brought by a judgment creditor of a corporation to compel stockholders to pay what was claimed to be due on the shares held by them, held:

1. That, where the charter authorized capital stock to be paid in property, and the shareholders honestly and in good faith put in property, instead of money, in payment of their subscriptions, third parties have no ground of complaint.

2. That, in the present case, there was no evidence to sustain the allegations of intentional fraud.

3. That the increase of the capital stock, as was permitted by the charter—a part of which increase was distributed to the old stockholders, the capital stock being afterwards reduced to the original amount—did not render the stockholders liable on such increased stock to a creditor who did not become such after the increase and relying upon such increased capital stock as security.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Edward F. Hoffman and Chas. Hart, for appellant.

Messrs. R. C. McMurtrie and Pierce Archer, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, the North Carolina Gold Amalgamating Company, was incorporated under the laws of North Carolina, on the 30th of January, 1874, for the purpose, among other things, of working, milling, smelting, reducing and assaying ores and metals, with the power [344] to purchase such property, real and personal, as might be necessary in its business, and to mortgage or sell the same.

The plaintiff is the holder of a judgment against the Company for $5,489, recovered in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, on the 18th of May, 1879, upon its two drafts, one dated June 1, 1874, and the other August 15, 1874, each payable four months after its date. Unable to obtain satisfaction of this judgment upon execution, and finding that the Company was insolvent, the plaintiff brought this suit to compel the stockholders to pay what he claims to be due and unpaid on the shares of the capital stock held by them, alleging that he had frequently applied to the officers of the Company to institute a suit for that purpose, but that under various pretenses they refused to take any action in the premises.

By its charter the minimum capital stock was fixed at $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each, with power to increase it from time to time, by a majority vote of the stockholders, to two million and a half of dollars. The charter provided that the subscription to the capital stock might be paid "in such installments, in such manner and in such property, real and personal," as a majority of the corporators might determine, and that the stockholders should not be liable for any loss, or damages, or be responsible beyond the assets of the Company.

Previously to the charter, the corporators had been engaged in mining operations, conducting their business under the name and title which they took as a Corporation. Upon obtaining the charter, the capital stock was paid by the property of the former association, which was estimated to be of the value of $100,000, the shares being divided among the stockholders in proportion to their respective interests in the property. Each stockholder [345] placed his estimate upon the property; and the average estimate amounted to $137,500. This sum they reduced to $100,000, inasmuch as the capital stock was to be of that amount.

The plaintiff contends, and it is the principal basis of his suit, that the valuation thus put upon the property was illegally and fraudulently made at an amount far above its actual value; averring that the property consisted only of a machine for crushing ores, the right to use a patent called the Crosby process, and the charter of the proposed organization; that the articles had no market or actual value and, therefore, that the capital stock issued thereon was not fully paid, or paid to any substantial extent, and that the holders thereof were still liable to the Corporation and its creditors for the unpaid subscription.

If it were proved that actual fraud was committed in the payment of the stock, and that the complainant had given credit to the Company from a belief that its stock was fully paid, there would undoubtedly be substantial ground for the relief asked. But where the charter authorizes capital stock to be paid in property, and the shareholders honestly and in good faith put in property instead of money, in payment of their subscriptions, third parties have no ground of complaint. The case is very different from that in which subscriptions to stock are payable in cash, and where only a part of the installments has been paid. In that case there is still a debt due to the corporation, which, if it become insolvent, may be sequestered in equity by the creditors, as a trust fund liable to the payment of their debts. But where full-paid stock is issued for property received there must be actual fraud in the transaction, to enable creditors of the corporation to call the stockholders to account. A gross and obvious overvaluation of property would be strong evidence of fraud. Boynton v. Hatch, 47 N. Y. 225; Van Cott v. Van Brunt, 82 N. Y. 535; Carr v. LeFevre, 27 Pa. 413.

But the allegation of intentional and fraudulent undervaluation of the property is not [346] sustained by the evidence. The patent and the machinery had been used by the corporators in their business which was continued under the charter. They were immediately serviceable, and therefore had to the Company a present value. The corporators may have placed too high an estimate upon the property, but the court below finds that its valuation was honestly and fairly made; and there is only one item, the value of the chartered privileges, which is at all liable to any legal objection. But if that were deducted, the remaining amount would be so near to the aggregate capital that no implication could be raised against the entire good faith of the parties to the transaction.

In May, 1874, the Company increased its stock, as it was authorized to do by its charter, to $1,000,000 or 10,000 shares of $100 each. This increase was made pursuant to an agreement with one Howes, by which the Company was to give him 2,000 shares of the increased stock for certain lands purchased from him. Of the balance of the increased shares, 4,000 were divided among the holders of the original stock upon the return and delivery to the Company of the original certificates; they thus receiving four shares of the increased capital stock for one of the original shares returned. The other 4,000 shares were retained by the Company. The land purchased was subject to three mortgages, of which the plaintiff held the third; and the agreement was that, under the first mortgage, a sale should be made of the property, and that mortgages for a like amount should be given to the parties according to their several and respective amounts, and in their respective positions and priorities.

The plaintiff was to be placed by the Company, after the release of his mortgage, in the same position. Accordingly he made a deed to it of all his interest and title under the mortgage held by him, the trustee joining with him, in which deed the agreement was recited. The Company thereupon gave him its mortgage upon the same and other property, which was payable in installments. The plaintiff also received at the same time an accepted draft of Howes' on the Company for $1,000. When the first installment on the mortgage became due, [347] the Company being unable to pay it, he took its draft for the amount, $3,000, payable in December following. It is upon these drafts that the judgment was recovered in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, which is the foundation of the present suit. It is in evidence that the plaintiff was fully aware, at the time, of the increase in the stock of the Company, and of its object. Six months afterwards the increase was canceled, the outstanding shares were called in, and the capital stock reduced to its original limit of $100,000. Nothing was done after the increase to enlarge the liabilities of the Company. The draft of Howes was passed to the plaintiff and received by him at the time the agreement was carried out upon which the increase of the stock was made; and the draft for $3,000 was for an installment upon the mortgage then executed. The plaintiff had placed no reliance upon the supposed paid-up capital of the Company on the increased shares, and therefore has no cause of complaint by reason of their subsequent recall. Had a new indebtedness been created by the Company after the issue of the stock and before its recall, a different question would have arisen. The creditor in that case, relying on the faith of the stock being fully paid, might have insisted upon its full payment. But no such new indebtedness was created, and we think, therefore, that the stockholders cannot be called upon, at the suit of the plaintiff, to pay in the amount of the stock, which, though issued, was soon afterwards recalled and canceled.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 436–445.)

International and criminal law—indictment in state court—defendant kidnaped in Peru—plea of violation of extradition treaty—error lies to this court—no relief—treaty does not guaranty asylum—remedy against trespasser—defense of forcible transfer into jurisdiction is matter for state court.

*1. A plea to an indictment in a state court, that the defendant has been brought from a foreign country to this country by proceedings which are a violation of a treaty between that country and the United States, and which are forbidden by that treaty, raises a question, if the right asserted by the plea is denied, on which this court can review, by writ of error, the judgment of the state court.

2. But where the prisoner has been kidnaped in the foreign country, and brought by force, against his will, within the jurisdiction of the State whose law he has violated, with no reference to the extradition treaty, though one existed, and no proceeding or attempt to proceed under the treaty, this court can give no relief, for these facts do not establish any right under the Constitution, or laws, or treaties of the United States.

3. The treaties of extradition to which the United States are parties do not guaranty a fugitive from the justice of one of the countries an asylum in the other. They do not give such person any greater or more sacred right of asylum than he had before. They only make provision that for certain crimes he shall be deprived of that asylum and surrendered to justice, and they prescribe the mode in which this shall be done.

4. The trespass of a kidnaper, unauthorized by either of the governments, and not professing to act under authority of either, is not a case provided for in the treaty, and the remedy is by a proceeding against him by the government whose law he violates, or by the party injured.

5. How far such forcible transfer of the defendant, so as to bring him within the jurisdiction of the State where the offense was committed, may be set up against the right to try him, is the province of the state court to decide, and presents no question in which this court can review its decision.

Argued April 26, 1886. Decided Dec. 6. 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. Stuart Beattie and Robert Hervey, for plaintiff in error:

When the General Government has provided, by a positive law, the mode and conditions upon which the authorities of the State shall reach into a foreign country to procure the presence of an accused person in its courts, can the conditions of that positive law be evaded, and the State obtain the benefit of such evasion?

This treaty is a law to be enforced by the courts,—not simply an international compact, to be obeyed or waived at pleasure by the contracting parties. Every treaty is a law "whenever it operates of itself without the aid of legislative provisions."

Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 314 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 435); Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 700; Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. Ct. App. 627, 635; State v. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio, 278; U. S. v. Watts, 14 Fed. Rep. 130; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 481.

There is no rule of comity or international law regarding foreign extradition, so far as the United States is concerned.

U. S. v. Watts, supra; 6 Ops. Attys. Gen. 481.

The rule that an offender against the justice of his country gets no rights by flight, has no application to a claim of "right of asylum," acquired by reason of a federal treaty with a foreign country. Such right of asylum exists by virtue of the treaty, and not by reason of the flight. It is a personal right which the accused may set up in the courts of this country to bar a trial which would evade or obstruct it. The rights of the State over the accused are controlled by the terms of the treaty. See the authorities first above cited.

Under the treaty, a fugitive cannot, under any circumstances, be taken out of Peru, to be tried in the United States, for any other crimes than those named.

Blandford v. State, State v. Vanderpool, and U. S. v. Watts, supra.

Messrs. Geo. Hunt, Atty-Gen. of Illinois, P. S. Grosscup and Leonard Swett, for defendants in error:

It is well settled that the jurisdiction of the trial court cannot be affected by the circumstances of the capture.

Ex parte Scott, 9 Barn. & C. 446; State v. Smith, 1 Bailey (S. C.) Law, 283; State v. Brewster, 7 Vt. 118; Dow's Case, 18 Pa. 37; State v. Ross, 21 Iowa, 467; U. S. v. Caldwell, 8 Blatchf. 131; U. S. v. Lawrence, 13 Blatchf. 295; Adriance v. Lagrave, 59 N. Y. 110; Ex parte Coupland, 26 Tex. 388.

The treaty contains no implied stipulation that a fugitive shall not be put to trial for any offense unless his capture has been effected under the authority and forms of the treaty. It is a contract solely between nations, and does not confer upon the fugitive any right of immunity which is enforceable by the judiciary.

See Head-Money Cases, 112 U. S. 598 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 803); State v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50 (18: 721); Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1 (12: 581); Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. 38 (14: 316); Cherokee Nation v. Ga. 5 Pet. 1 (8: 25).

No question under the treaty arises in this case. If the captors of the fugitive acted outside of its authority, they were at most only guilty of a tort upon his personal rights. By the treaty the United States does not guarantee that its private citizens will not be guilty of offenses against the municipal law of Peru. Neither does the United States promise that the arm of our law shall not be laid upon its offenders until the private wrongs of the offender have all been righted.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court. [437]

This case is brought here by a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. The plaintiff in error, Frederick M. Ker, was indicted, tried and convicted in the Criminal Court of Cook County, in that State, for larceny. The indictment also included charges of embezzlement. During the proceedings connected with the trial the defendant presented a plea in abatement, which, on demurrer, was overruled; and the defendant refusing to plead further, a plea of not guilty was entered for him, according to the statute of that State, by order of the court, on which the trial and conviction took place. [438]

The substance of the plea in abatement, which is a very long one, is that the defendant, being in the City of Lima, in Peru, after the offenses were charged to have been committed, was in fact kidnaped and brought to this country against his will. His statement is that, application having been made by the parties who were injured, Governor Hamilton, of Illinois, made his requisition, in writing, to the Secretary of State of the United States, for a warrant requesting the extradition of the defendant, by the Executive of the Republic of Peru, from that country to Cook County; that, on the first day of March, 1883, the President of the United States issued his warrant, in due form, directed to Henry G. Julian, as messenger, to receive the defendant from the authorities of Peru, upon a charge of larceny, in compliance with the Treaty between the United States and Peru on that subject; that the said Julian, having the necessary papers with him, arrived in Lima, but, without presenting them to any officer of the Peruvian Government, or making any demand on that government for the surrender of Ker, forcibly and with violence arrested him, placed him on board the United States vessel Essex, in the Harbor of Callao, kept him a close prisoner until the arrival of that vessel at Honolulu, where, after some detention, he was transferred in the same forcible manner on board another vessel; to wit, The City of Sydney, in which he was carried a prisoner to San Francisco, in the State of California. The plea then states that, before his arrival in that city, Governor Hamilton had made a requisition on the Governor of California, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, for the delivery up of the defendant, as a fugitive from justice, who had escaped to that State, on account of the same offenses charged in the requisition on Peru and in the indictment in this case. This requisition arrived, as the plea states, and was presented to the Governor of California, who made his order for the surrender of the defendant to the person appointed by the Governor of Illinois; namely, one Frank Warner, on the 25th day of June, 1883. The defendant arrived in the City of San Francisco on the 9th day of July thereafter, and was immediately placed in [439] the custody of Warner, under the order of the Governor of California, and, still a prisoner, was transferred by him to Cook County, where the process of the criminal court was served upon him, and he was held to answer the indictment already mentioned.

The plea is very full of averments that the defendant protested, and was refused any opportunity whatever, from the time of his arrest in Lima until he was delivered over to the authorities of Cook County, of communicating with any person or seeking any advice or assistance in regard to procuring his release by legal process or otherwise; and he alleges that this proceeding is a violation of the provisions of the Treaty between the United States and Peru, negotiated in 1870, which was finally ratified by the two governments and proclaimed by the President of the United States, July 27, 1874. 18 Stat. at L. pt. 8, p. 719.

The judgment of the Criminal Court of Cook County, Illinois, was carried by writ of error to the Supreme Court of that State, and there affirmed, to which judgment the present writ of error is directed. The assignments of error made here are as follows:

"First. That said Supreme Court of Illinois erred in affirming the judgment of said Criminal Court of Cook County, sustaining the demurrer to plaintiff in error's plea to the jurisdiction of said criminal court.

"Second. That said Supreme Court of Illinois erred in its judgment aforesaid, in failing to enforce the full faith and credit of the Federal Treaty with the Republic of Peru, invoked by plaintiff in error in his said plea to the jurisdiction of said criminal court."

The grounds upon which the jurisdiction of this court is invoked may be said to be three, though from the briefs and arguments of counsel it is doubtful whether, in point of fact, more than one is relied upon. It is contended in several places in the brief that the proceedings in the arrest in Peru, and the extradition and delivery to the authorities of Cook County, were not "due process of law," and we may suppose, [440] although it is not so alleged, that this reference is to that clause of article XIV of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States which declares that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property "without due process of law." The "due process of law" here guarantied is complied with when the party is regularly indicted by the proper grand jury in the state court, has a trial according to the forms and modes prescribed for such trials, and when, in that trial and proceedings, he is deprived of no rights to which he is lawfully entitled. We do not intend to say that there may not be proceedings previous to the trial, in regard to which the prisoner could invoke in some manner the provisions of this clause of the Constitution; but for mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into the custody of the law, we do not think he is entitled to say that he should not be tried at all for the crime with which he is charged in a regular indictment. He may be arrested for a very heinous offense by persons without any warrant, or without any previous complaint, and brought before a proper officer, and this may be in some sense said to be "without due process of law." But it would hardly be claimed that after the case had been investigated, and the defendant held by the proper authorities to answer for the crime, he could plead that he was first arrested "without due process of law." So here, when found within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois and liable to answer for a crime against the laws of that State, unless there was some positive provision of the Constitution or of the laws of this country violated in bringing him into court, it is not easy to see how he can say that he is there "without due process of law," within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

So, also, the objection is made that the proceedings between the authorities of the State of Illinois and those of the State of California were not in accordance with the Act of Congress on that subject, and especially that, at the time the papers and warrants were issued from the Governors of California and Illinois, the defendant was not within the State of California and was not there a fugitive from justice. This argument is not much pressed by counsel, and was [441] scarcely noticed in the Supreme Court of Illinois; but the effort here is to connect it as a part of the continued trespass and violation of law which accompanied the transfer from Peru to Illinois. It is sufficient to say, in regard to that part of this case, that when the Governor of one State voluntarily surrenders a fugitive from the justice of another State to answer for his alleged offenses, it is hardly a proper subject of inquiry on the trial of the case to examine into the details of the proceedings by which the demand was made by the one State and the manner in which it was responded to by the other. The case does not stand, when the party is in court and required to plead to an indictment, as it would have stood upon a writ of habeas corpus in California, or in any of the States through which he was carried in the progress of his extradition, to test the authority by which he was held; and we can see in the mere fact that the papers under which he was taken into custody in California were prepared and ready for him on his arrival from Peru, no sufficient reason for an abatement of the indictment against him in Cook County, or why he should be discharged from custody without a trial.

But the main proposition insisted on by counsel for plaintiff in error in this court is that by virtue of the Treaty of Extradition with Peru the defendant acquired by his residence in that country a right of asylum; a right to be free from molestation for the crime committed in Illinois; a positive right in him that he should only be forcibly removed from Peru to the State of Illinois in accordance with the provisions of the treaty; and that this right is one which he can assert in the courts of the United States in all cases, whether the removal took place under proceedings sanctioned by the treaty, or under proceedings which were in total disregard of that treaty amounting to an unlawful and unauthorized kidnaping.

This view of the subject is presented in various forms and repeated in various shapes, in the argument of counsel. The fact that this question was raised in the Supreme Court of Illinois may be said to confer jurisdiction on this court, because, in making this claim, the defendant asserted a right under a Treaty of the United States, and, whether the assertion was well founded or not, this court has jurisdiction [442] to decide it; and we proceed to inquire into it.

There is no language in this treaty, or in any other treaty made by this country on the subject of extradition, of which we are aware, which says in terms that a party fleeing from the United States to escape punishment for crime becomes thereby entitled to an asylum in the country to which he has fled; indeed, the absurdity of such a proposition would at once prevent the making of a treaty of that kind. It will not be for a moment contended that the Government of Peru could not have ordered Ker out of the country on his arrival, or at any period of his residence there. If this could be done, what becomes of his right of asylum?

Nor can it be doubted that the Government of Peru could of its own accord, without any demand from the United States, have surrendered Ker to an agent of the State of Illinois, and that such surrender would have been valid within the dominions of Peru. It is idle, therefore, to claim that, either by express terms or by implication, there is given to a fugitive from justice in one of these countries any right to remain and reside in the other; and if the right of asylum means anything it must mean this. The right of the Government of Peru voluntarily to give a party in Ker's condition an asylum in that country is quite a different thing from the right in him to demand and insist upon security in such an asylum. The treaty, so far as it regulates the right of asylum at all, is intended to limit this right in the case of one who is proved to be a criminal fleeing from justice, so that, on proper demand and proceedings had therein, the government of the country of the asylum shall deliver him up to the country where the crime was committed. And to this extent, and to this alone, the treaty does regulate or impose a restriction upon the right of the government of the country of the asylum to protect the criminal from removal therefrom.

In the case before us, the plea shows that although Julian went to Peru with the necessary papers to procure the extradition of Ker under the treaty, those papers remained in his pocket and were never brought to light in Peru; that no steps were taken under them; [443] and that Julian, in seizing upon the person of Ker and carrying him out of the territory of Peru into the United States, did not act nor profess to act under the treaty. In fact, that treaty was not called into operation, was not relied upon, was not made the pretext of arrest, and the facts show that it was a clear case of kidnaping within the dominions of Peru, without any pretense of authority under the treaty or from the Government of the United States.

In the case of United States v. Rauscher, [post, 425] just decided, and considered with this, the effect of extradition proceedings under a treaty was very fully considered; and it was there held that, when a party was duly surrendered, by proper proceedings, under the Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, he came to this country clothed with the protection which the nature of such proceedings and the true construction of the treaty gave him. One of the rights with which he was thus clothed, both in regard to himself and in good faith to the country which had sent him here, was that he should be tried for no other offense than the one for which he was delivered under the extradition proceedings. If Ker had been brought to this country by proceedings under the Treaty of 1870–74 with Peru, it seems probable, from the statement of the case in the record, that he might have successfully pleaded that he was extradited for larceny and convicted by the verdict of a jury of embezzlement; for the statement in the plea is that the demand made by the President of the United States, if it had been put in operation, was for an extradition for larceny, although some forms of embezzlement are mentioned in the treaty as subjects of extradition. But it is quite a different case when the plaintiff in error comes to this country in the manner in which he was brought here, clothed with no rights which a proceeding under the treaty could have given him, and no duty which this country owes to Peru or to him under the treaty.

We think it very clear, therefore, that in invoking the jurisdiction of this court, upon the ground that the prisoner was denied a right conferred upon him by a treaty of the United States, he has failed to establish the existence of any such right.

The question of how far his forcible seizure [444] in another country, and transfer by violence, force or fraud to this country, could be made available to resist trial in the state court, for the offense now charged upon him is one which we do not feel called upon to decide, for in that transaction we do not see that the Constitution, or laws, or treaties, of the United States guarantee him any protection. There are authorities of the highest respectability which hold that such forcible abduction is no sufficient reason why the party should not answer when brought within the jurisdiction of the court which has the right to try him for such an offense, and presents no valid objection to his trial in such court. Among the authorities which support the proposition are the following: Ex parte Scott, 9 Barn. & C. 446 (1829); Lopes & Sattler's Cases, 1 Dearsly & B. C. C. 525; State v. Smith, 1 Bailey (S. C.) Law, 283 (1829); State v. Brewster, 7 Vt. 118 (1835); Dow's Case, 18 Pa. 37 (1851); State v. Ross, 21 Iowa, 467 (1866); The Richmond v. U. S. 9 Cranch, 103.

However this may be, the decision of that question is as much within the province of the state court as a question of common law, or of the law of nations, of which that court is bound to take notice, as it is of the courts of the United States. And though we might or might not differ with the Illinois court on that subject, it is one in which we have no right to review their decision.

It must be remembered that this view of the subject does not leave the prisoner or the Government of Peru without remedy for his unauthorized seizure within its territory. Even this treaty with that country provides for the extradition of persons charged with kidnaping, and on demand from Peru, Julian, the party who is guilty of it, could be surrendered and tried in its courts for this violation of its laws. The party himself would probably not be without redress, for he could sue Julian in an action of trespass and false imprisonment, and the facts set out in the plea would without doubt sustain the action. Whether he could [445] recover a sum sufficient to justify the action would probably depend upon moral aspects of the case, which we cannot here consider.

We must therefore hold that, so far as any question in which this court can revise the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois is presented to us, the judgment must be affirmed.

[407] UNITED STATES, Plff.,
v.
WILLIAM RAUSCHER.

Extradition—in absence of treaty, rests on comity, not obligation—negotiation for, must be by Federal Government—Ashburton Treaty—extradited person can be tried only for crime specified in demand for surrender.

*1. Apart from the provisions of treaties on the subject, there exists no well defined obligation on one independent nation to deliver to another fugitives from its justice; and though such delivery has often been made, it was upon the principle of comity. The right to demand it has not been recognized as among the duties of one government to another which rest upon established principles of international law.

2. In any question of this kind which can arise between this country and a foreign nation, the extradition must be negotiated through the Federal Government, and not by that of a State, though the demand may be for a crime committed against the law of that State.

With most of the civilized nations of the world with which we have much intercourse, this matter is regulated by treaties, and the question we are now to decide arises under the Treaty of 1842 between Great Britain and the United States, commonly called the Ashburton Treaty.

The defendant in this case, being charged with murder on board an American vessel on the high seas, fled to England, and was demanded of the government of that country, and surrendered on this charge. The Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in which he was tried, did not proceed against him for murder, but for a minor offense not included in the treaty of extradition; and the judges of that court have certified to this court for its judgment the question whether this could be done.

This court holds:

3. That a treaty to which the United States is a party is a law of the land, of which all courts, state and national, are to take judicial notice, and by the provisions of which they are to be governed, so far as they are capable of judicial enforcement.

4. That, on a sound construction of the treaty under which the defendant was delivered to this country, and under the proceedings by which this was done, and Acts of Congress on that subject (Revised Statutes, sections 5272, 5275), he cannot lawfully be tried for any offense other than murder.

5. The treaty, the Acts of Congress, and the proceedings by which he was extradited, clothe him with the right to exemption from trial for any other offense, until he has had an opportunity to return to the country from which he was taken for the purpose alone of trial for the offense specified in the demand for his surrender. The national honor also requires that good faith shall be kept with the country which surrendered him.

6. The circumstance that the party was convicted of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment, on the same evidence which was produced before the committing magistrate in England, in the extradition proceedings for murder, does not change the principle.

Messrs. A. J. Dittenhoefer and David Gerber, for defendant.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court: [409]

This case comes before us on a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges holding the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, arising after verdict of guilty and before judgment, on a motion in arrest of judgment.

The prisoner, William Rauscher, was indicted by a grand jury, for that, on the 9th day of October, 1884, on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of any particular State of the United States, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction thereof, he, the said William Rauscher, being then and there second mate of the ship J. F. Chapman, unlawfully made an assault upon Janssen, one of the crew of the vessel of which he was an officer, and unlawfully inflicted upon said Janssen cruel and unusual punishment. This indictment was found under section 5347 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The statement of the division of opinion between the judges is in the following language:

"This cause coming on to be heard at this term, before judgment upon the verdict, on a motion in arrest of judgment, and also on a motion for a new trial before the two judges above mentioned, at such hearing the following questions occurred:

"First. The prisoner having been extradited upon a charge of murder on the high seas of one Janssen, under section 5339 U. S. R. S., had the Circuit Court of the Southern District of New York jurisdiction to put him to trial upon an indictment under section 5347, U. S. R. S., charging him with cruel and unusual punishment of the same man, he being one of the crew of an American vessel of which the defendant was an officer, and such punishment consisting of the identical acts proved in the extradition proceedings?

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

"Second. Did or not the prisoner, under the extradition treaty with Great Britain, having been surrendered upon a charge of murder, acquire a right to be exempt from prosecution upon the charge set forth in the indictment, without being first afforded an opportunity to return to Great Britain?

"Third. Was it error on the part of the trial judge to overrule a plea to the jurisdiction of [410] the court to try the indictment under section 5347 of the United States Revised Statutes, charging the accused with cruel and unusual punishment of one Janssen, one of the crew of a vessel of which accused was an officer, it having been established upon said plea that the accused was extradited under the Extradition Treaty with Great Britain, upon the charge of murder of the same Janssen, under section 5339 of the United States Revised Statutes?

"Fourth. Was it error on the part of the trial judge to refuse to direct a verdict of acquittal, after it had been proven that the accused was extradited under the Extradition Treaty with Great Britain, upon the charge of murder, it also appearing that in the proceedings preliminary to the warrant of extradition the same act was investigated, and the same witnesses examined as at the trial?

"In respect to each of which questions the judges aforesaid were divided in opinion.

"Wherefore, at the same term, at the request of the United States Attorney, they have caused the points above stated to be certified under the seal of this court, together with a copy of the indictment and an abstract of the record, to the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision according to law.

"WM. J. WALLACE.
"CHAS. L. BENEDICT."

The Treaty with Great Britain, under which the defendant was surrendered by that government to ours upon a charge of murder, is that of August 9, 1842, styled "A Treaty to Settle and Define the Boundaries Between the Territories of the United States and the Possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the Final Suppression of the African Slave Trade and for the Giving up of Criminals, Fugitive from Justice, in Certain Cases." Stat. at L. Vol. 8, p. 576.

With the exception of this caption, the tenth article of the treaty contains all that relates to the subject of extradition of criminals. That article is here copied, as follows:

"It is agreed that the United States and Her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to [411] justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, or shall be found, within the territories of the other: provided that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offense had there been committed: and the respective judges and other magistrates of the two Governments shall have power, jurisdiction, and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive or person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if, on such hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty of the examining judge or magistrate to certify the same to the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of such fugitive."

Not only has the general subject of the extradition of persons charged with crime in one country, who have fled to and sought refuge in another, been matter of much consideration of late years by the executive departments and statesmen of the governments of the civilized portion of the world, by various publicists and writers on international law, and by specialists on that subject, as well as by the courts and judicial tribunals of different countries, but the precise questions arising under this treaty, as presented by the certificate of the judges in this case, have recently been very much discussed in this country and in Great Britain.

It is only in modern times that the nations of the earth have imposed upon themselves the obligation of delivering these fugitives from justice to the States where their crimes were committed, for trial and punishment. This has been done generally by treaties made by one independent government with another. Prior to these treaties, and apart from them, it may be stated as the general result of the writers upon international law that there was no well [412] defined obligation on one country to deliver up such fugitives to another, and though such delivery was often made, it was upon the principle of comity, and within the discretion of the government whose action was invoked; and it has never been recognized as among those obligations of one government towards another which rest upon established principles of international law.

Whether in the United States, in the absence of any treaty on the subject with a foreign nation from whose justice a fugitive may be found in one of the States, and in the absence of any Act of Congress upon the subject, a State can, through its own judiciary or Executive, surrender him for trial to such foreign nation is a question which has been under consideration by the courts of this country without any very conclusive result.

In the case of Daniel Washburn, 4 Johns. Ch. 106, who was arrested on a charge of theft committed in Canada, and brought before Chancellor Kent upon a writ of habeas corpus, that distinguished jurist held that, irrespective of all treaties, it was the duty of a State to surrender fugitive criminals. The doctrine of this obligation was presented with great ability by that learned jurist; but shortly afterwards Chief Justice Tilghman, in the case of Short v. Deacon, 10 S. & R. 125, in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, held the contrary opinion: that the delivery up of a fugitive was an affair of the executive branch of the National Government, to which the demand of the foreign power must be addressed; that judges could not legally deliver up, nor could they command the Executive to do so; and that no magistrate in Pennsylvania had the right to cause a person to be arrested in order to afford the President of the United States an opportunity to deliver him up, because the President had already declared he would not do so.

In the case of Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. 540 [39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 579], on a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Vermont, it appears that application had been made to the President for the extradition of Holmes, a naturalized citizen of the United States, who was charged with having committed murder in [413] Lower Canada. There being then no extradition treaty between the two governments, the President declined to act, through an alleged want of power. Holmes, having been arrested under authority from Governor Jennison, of Vermont, obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the supreme court of that State, and the sheriff returned that he was detained under an order of the Governor, which commanded the sheriff to deliver him up to the authorities of Lower Canada; and the supreme court of the State held the return sufficient. On the writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States two questions were presented: first, whether a writ of error would lie in such case from that court to the supreme court of the State; and second, whether the judgment of the latter court was right. The eight judges who heard the case in this court were equally divided in opinion on the first of these questions, and therefore no authoritative decision of the principal question could be made. A very able and learned opinion in favor of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and against the right attempted to be exercised by the Governor of Vermont, was delivered by Chief Justice Taney, with whom concurred Justices Story, McLean and Wayne. Justices Thompson, Barbour and Catron delivered separate opinions, denying the power of the Supreme Court of the United States to revise the judgment of the Supreme Court of Vermont. These latter, with whom concurred Justice Baldwin, did not express any clear opinion upon the power of the authorities of the State of Vermont, either executive or judicial, to deliver Holmes to the Government of Canada; but, upon return of the case to the supreme court of that State, it seems that that court was satisfied, by the arguments of the chief justice and those who concurred with him, of the error of its position, and Holmes was discharged. In the final disposition of the case the court uses the following language:

"I am authorized by my brethren, says the chief justice, "to say, that, on an examination of this case, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, they think, if the [414] return had been as it now is, a majority of that court would have decided that Holmes was entitled to his discharge, and that the opinion of a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States was also adverse to the exercise of the power in question by any of the separate States of the Union. The judgment of the court therefore is that Holmes be discharged from his imprisonment." Ex parte Holmes, 12 Vt. 631.

The Court of Appeals of New York, in the case of People v Curtis, 50 N. Y. 321, also decided that an Act of the Legislature of that State authorizing the rendition to foreign States of fugitives from justice was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. This was in 1872.

The question has not since arisen so as to be decided by this court, but there can be little doubt of the soundness of the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, that the power exercised by the Governor of Vermont is a part of the foreign intercourse of this country which has undoubtedly been conferred upon the Federal Government; and that it is clearly included in the treaty-making power and the corresponding power of appointing and receiving ambassadors and other public ministers. There is no necessity for the States to enter upon the relations with foreign nations which are necessarily implied in the extradition of fugitives from justice found within the limits of the State, as there is none why they should in their own name make demand upon foreign nations for the surrender of such fugitives.

At this time of day, and after the repeated examinations which have been made by this court into the powers of the Federal Government to deal with all such international questions exclusively, it can hardly be admitted that, even in the absence of treaties or Acts of Congress on the subject, the extradition of a fugitive from justice can become the subject of negotiation between a State of this Union and a foreign government.

Fortunately, this question, with others which might arise in the absence of treaties or Acts of Congress on the subject, is now of very little importance, since, with nearly all the nations of the world with whom our relations are such that fugitives from justice may be found within their dominions or within ours, we have treaties which govern the rights and conduct of the parties in such cases. These treaties are also supplemented by Acts of Congress, and both [415] are in their nature exclusive.

The case we have under consideration arises under one of these treaties made between the United States and Great Britain, the country with which, on account of our intimate relations, the cases requiring extradition are likely to be most numerous. This Treaty of 1842 is supplemented by the Acts of Congress of August 12, 1848, 9 Stat. at L. 302, and March 3, 1869, 15 Stat. at L. 337, the provisions of which are embodied in sections 5270, 5272 and 5275 of the Revised Statutes, under Title LXVI, "Extradition."

The treaty itself, in reference to the very matter suggested in the questions certified by the judges of the circuit court, has been made the subject of diplomatic negotiation between the Executive Department of this country and the Government of Great Britain in the cases of Winslow and Lawrence. Winslow, who was charged with forgery in the United States, had taken refuge in England, and, on demand being made for his extradition, the foreign office of that country required a preliminary pledge from our Government that it would not try him for any other offense than the forgery for which he was demanded. To this Mr. Fish, the Secretary of State, did not accede, and was informed that the reason of the demand on the part of the British Government was that one Lawrence, not long previously extradited under the same treaty, had been prosecuted in the courts of this country for a different offense from that for which he had been demanded from Great Britain, and for the trial of which he was delivered up by that government. Mr. Fish defended the right of the government or State in which the offense was committed to try a person extradited under this treaty for any other criminal offense, as well as for the one for which the extradition had been demanded; while Lord Derby, at the head of the foreign office in England, construed the treaty as requiring the government which had demanded the extradition of an offender against its laws for a prescribed offense, mentioned in the treaty and in the demand for his extradition, to try him for that offense and for no other. The correspondence is an able one upon both [416] sides, and presents the question which we are now required to decide, as to the construction of the treaty and the effect of the Acts of Congress already cited, and of a Statute of Great Britain of 1870 on the same subject. The negotiations between the two governments, however, on that subject were inconclusive in any other sense than that Winslow was not delivered up and Lawrence was never actually brought to judgment for any other offense than that for which his extradition was demanded.

The question was also discussed in the House of Lords, and Lord Derby stated and defended his views of the construction of the treaty with marked ability, while he conceded that the Act of Parliament on that subject, which declared that the person extradited could be tried for no other offense than that for which he had been demanded, had no obligatory force upon the United States as one of the parties to the treaty. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1876-7, p. 204-307.

The subject was also very fully discussed by Mr. William Beach Lawrence, a very learned authority on matters of international law, living in this country, in several published articles. Albany Law Journal, Vol. 14, p. 85; Vol. 15, p. 224; Vol. 16, p. 361. In these the author, with his usual ability, maintains the proposition that a person delivered up under this treaty on a demand charging him with a specific offense, mentioned in it, can only be tried by the country to which he is delivered for that specific offense, and is entitled, unless found guilty of that, to be restored in safety to the country of his asylum at the time of his extradition.

A very able article arising out of the same public discussion at that time; to wit, 1876, is found in the American Law Review, said to have been written by Judge Lowell, of the United States Court at Boston, in which, after an examination of the authorities upon the general rule, independent of treaties, as found in the continental writers on international law, he says, that rule is that the person whose extradition has been granted cannot be prosecuted and tried except for the crime for which his extradition has been obtained; and, entering upon the question of the construction of the Treaty of 1842, he gives to it the same effect in regard to that matter. 10 Am. Law Review, 1875-6, p. 617.

[417] Mr. David Dudley Field, in his draft of an outline for an international code, published about the same time, adopts the same principle. Field's International Code, § 287, p. 122. It is understood that the rule which he lays down represents as well what he understands to be existing law, as also what he supposes it should be.

A very learned and careful work published in this country by Mr. Spear, in 1884, after considering all the correspondence between our Government and Great Britain upon the subject, the debate in the House of Lords, the articles of Mr. Lawrence and Judge Lowell, as well as the treatise of Mr. Clarke, an English writer, with a very exhaustive examination of all the decisions in this country relating to this matter, arrives at the same conclusion. This examination by Mr. Spear is so full and careful that it leaves nothing to be desired in the way of presentation of authorities.

The only English work on the subject of extradition we have been able to find which discusses this subject is a small manual by Edward Clarke of Lincoln's Inn, published in 1867. He adopts the same view of the construction of this treaty and of the general principles of international law upon the subject which we have just indicated.

Turning to seek in judicial decisions for authority upon the subject, as might be anticipated, we meet with nothing in the English courts of much value, for the reason that treaties made by the Crown of Great Britain with other nations are not in those courts considered as part of the law of the land; but the rights and the duties growing out of those treaties are looked upon in that country as matters confided wholly for their execution and enforcement to the executive branch of the government. Speaking of the Ashburton Treaty of 1842, which we are now construing, Mr. Clarke says, that "In England the common law being held not to permit the surrender of a criminal, this provision could not come into effect without an Act of Parliament, but in the United States a treaty is as binding as an Act of Congress." Clarke, Extradition, 38.

This difference between the judicial powers of the courts of Great Britain and of this country in regard to treaties is thus alluded to by Chief Justice Marshall, in the Supreme Court of the [418] United States:

"A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, not a legislative Act. It does not generally effect, of itself, the object to be accomplished, especially so far as its operation is infraterritorial, but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument. In the United States a different principle is established. Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an Act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court." Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314 [27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 415, 435].

This whole subject is fully considered in the Head-Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580 [28: 798], in which the effect of a treaty as a part of the law of the land, as distinguished from its aspect as a mere contract between independent nations, is expressed in the following language:

"A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress. But a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country. An illustration of this character is found in treaties which regulate the mutual rights of citizens and subjects of the contracting nations in regard to [419] rights of property by descent or inheritance, when the individuals concerned are aliens. The Constitution of the United States places such provisions as these in the same category as other laws of Congress, by its declaration that 'This Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.' A treaty, then, is a law of the land, as an Act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute." See also Chew Heong v. U. S. 112 U. S. 536, 540, 565 [28: 770, 771, 780].

The Treaty of 1842 being, therefore, the supreme law of the land, of which the courts are bound to take judicial notice, and to enforce in any appropriate proceeding the rights of persons growing out of that treaty, we proceed to inquire, in the first place, so far as pertinent to the questions certified by the circuit judges, into the true construction of the treaty. We have already seen that, according to the doctrine of publicists and writers on international law, the country receiving the offender against its laws from another country had no right to proceed against him for any other offense than that for which he had been delivered up. This is a principle which commends itself as an appropriate adjunct to the discretionary exercise of the power of rendition, because it can hardly be supposed that a government which was under no treaty obligation, nor any absolute obligation of public duty, to seize a person who had found an asylum within its bosom and turn him over to another country for trial would be [420] willing to do this, unless a case was made of some specific offense of a character which justified the government in depriving the party of his asylum. It is unreasonable that the country of the asylum should be expected to deliver up such person to be dealt with by the demanding government, without any limitation, implied or otherwise, upon its prosecution of the party. In exercising its discretion, it might be very willing to deliver up offenders against such laws as were essential to the protection of life, liberty and person, while it would not be willing to do this on account of minor misdemeanors or of a certain class of political offenses in which it would have no interest or sympathy. Accordingly, it has been the policy of all governments to grant an asylum to persons who have fled from their homes on account of political disturbances, and who might be there amenable to laws framed with regard to such subjects, and to the personal allegiance of the party. In many of the treaties of extradition between the civilized nations of the world, there is an express exclusion of the right to demand the extradition of offenders against such laws, and in none of them is this class of offenses mentioned as being the foundation of extradition proceedings. Indeed, the enumeration of offenses in most of these treaties, and especially in the treaty now under consideration, is so specific, and marked by such a clear line in regard to the magnitude and importance of those offenses, that it is impossible to give any other interpretation to it than that of the exclusion of the right of extradition for any others.

It is, therefore, very clear that this treaty did not intend to depart in this respect from the recognized public law which had prevailed in the absence of treaties, and that it was not intended that this treaty should be used for any other purpose than to secure the trial of the person extradited for one of the offenses enumerated in the treaty. This is not only apparent from the general principle that the specific enumeration of certain matters and things implies the exclusion of all others, but the entire face of the treaty, including the processes by which it is to be carried into effect, confirms this view of the subject. It is unreasonable to suppose that any demand for rendition framed upon a general representation to the government of the asylum, (if we may use such an expression) that the party for whom the demand was made was guilty of some violation of the laws of the country which demanded him, without specifying any particular offense with which he was charged, and even without specifying an offense mentioned in the treaty, would receive any serious attention; and yet such is the effect of the construc- [421] tion that the party is properly liable to trial for any other offense than that for which he was demanded, and which is described in the treaty. There would, under that view of the subject, seem to be no need of a description of a specific offense in making the demand. But, so far from this being admissible, the treaty not only provides that the party shall be charged with one of the crimes mentioned; to wit, murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, or the utterance of forged paper, but that evidence shall be produced to the judge or magistrate of the country of which such demand is made, of the commission of such an offense, and that this evidence shall be such as according to the law of that country would justify the apprehension and commitment for trial of the person so charged. If the proceedings under which the party is arrested in a country where he is peaceably and quietly living, and to the protection of whose laws he is entitled, are to have no influence in limiting the prosecution in the country where the offense is charged to have been committed, there is very little use for this particularity in charging a specific offense, requiring that offense to be one mentioned in the treaty, as well as sufficient evidence of the party's guilt to put him upon trial for it. Nor can it be said that, in the exercise of such a delicate power under a treaty so well guarded in every particular, its provisions are obligatory alone on the State which makes the surrender of the fugitive, and that that fugitive passes into the hands of the country which charges him with the offense, free from all the positive requirements and just implications of the treaty under which the transfer of his person takes place. A moment before he is under the protection of a government which has afforded him an asylum from which he can only be taken under a very limited form of procedure, and a moment after he is found in the possession of another sovereignty by virtue of that proceeding, but devested of all the rights which he had the moment before, and of all the rights which the law governing that proceeding was intended to secure.

[422] If upon the face of this treaty it could be seen that its sole object was to secure the transfer of an individual from the jurisdiction of one sovereignty to that of another, the argument might be sound; but as this right of transfer, the right to demand it, the obligation to grant it, the proceedings under which it takes place, all show that it is for a limited and defined purpose that the transfer is made, it is impossible to conceive of the exercise of jurisdiction in such a case for any other purpose than that mentioned in the treaty, and ascertained by the proceedings under which the party is extradited, without an implication of fraud upon the rights of the party extradited and of bad faith to the country which permitted his extradition. No such view of solemn public treaties between the great nations of the earth can be sustained by a tribunal called upon to give judicial construction to them.

The opposite view has been attempted to be maintained in this country, upon the ground that there is no express limitation in the treaty of the right of the country in which the offense was committed to try the person for the crime alone for which he was extradited, and that once being within the jurisdiction of that country, no matter by what contrivance or fraud, or by what pretense of establishing a charge provided for by the extradition treaty he may have been brought within the jurisdiction, he is, when here, liable to be tried for any offense against the laws as though arrested here originally. This proposition of the absence of express restriction in the treaty of the right to try him for other offenses than that for which he was extradited, is met by the manifest scope and object of the treaty itself. The caption of the treaty, already quoted, declaring that its purpose is to settle the boundary line between the two governments; to provide for the final suppression of the African slave trade; adds, "and for the giving up of criminals, fugitives from justice, in certain cases." The treaty, then, requires, as we have already said, that there shall be given up, upon requisitions respectively made by the two governments, all persons charged with any of the seven crimes enumerated; and the provisions giving a party an examination before a proper tribunal, in which, before he shall be delivered up on this demand, it must be shown that the offense for which he is demanded is one of those enumerated and that the proof is sufficient to satisfy the court or magistrate before [423] whom this examination takes place that he is guilty, and such as the law of the State of the asylum requires to establish such guilt, leave no reason to doubt that the fair purpose of the treaty is that the person shall be delivered up to be tried for that offense and for no other.

If there should remain any doubt upon this construction of the treaty itself, the language of two Acts of Congress, heretofore cited, incorporated in the Revised Statutes, must set this question at rest. It is there declared (Rev. Stat. § 5272), the two preceding sections having provided for a demand upon this country and for the inquiry into the guilt of the party, that "It shall be lawful for the Secretary of State, under his hand and seal of office, to order the person so committed to be delivered to such person or persons as shall be authorized in the name and on behalf of such foreign government, to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be so accused, and such person shall be delivered up accordingly."

For the protection of persons brought into this country by extradition proceedings from a foreign country, section 5275 of the Revised Statutes provides:

"Whenever any person is delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safe keeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence, until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter, and may employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe keeping and protection of the accused."

The obvious meaning of these two statutes, which have reference to all treaties of extradition made by the United States, is that the [424] party shall not be delivered up by this government to be tried for any other offense than that charged in the extradition proceedings; and that, when brought into this country upon similar proceedings, he shall not be arrested or tried for any other offense than that with which he was charged in those proceedings, until he shall have had a reasonable time to return unmolested to the country from which he was brought. This is undoubtedly a congressional construction of the purpose and meaning of extradition treaties such as the one we have under consideration, and whether it is or not it is conclusive upon the judiciary of the right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country into this under such proceedings

That right, as we understand it, is that he shall be tried only for the offense with which he is charged in the extradition proceedings and for which he was delivered up; and that if not tried for that, or after trial and acquittal, he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country before he is arrested upon the charge of any other crime committed previous to his extradition.

This precise question has been frequently considered by courts of the highest respectability in this country. One of the earliest cases is that of the United States v. Caldwell, 8 Blatchf. 131. Caldwell was extradited from Canada, in 1870, under the Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, charged with forgery. He was not tried for this offense, however, but was tried and convicted for bribing an officer of the United States—an offense not designated in that treaty. In the Circuit Court of the United States, held by Judge Benedict, Caldwell called the attention of the court to this fact, and claimed that under the treaty he could not be tried for any offense committed prior to his extradition other than the one charged in the proceedings. To this plea the Government interposed a demurrer, which was sustained, and the prisoner was tried, convicted and punished for the bribery. Judge Benedict said that "While abuse of extradition proceedings, and want of good faith in resorting to them, doubtless constitute a good cause of complaint between the two governments, such complaints [425] do not form a proper subject of investigation in the courts, however much those tribunals might regret that they should have been permitted to arise. * * * But whether extradited in good faith or not, the prisoner, in point of fact, is within the jurisdiction of the court, charged with a crime therein committed; and I am at a loss for even a plausible reason for holding, upon such a plea as the present, that the court is without jurisdiction to try him. * * * And I cannot say that the fact that the defendant was brought within the jurisdiction by virtue of a warrant of extradition for the crime of forgery affords him a legal exemption from prosecution for other crimes by him committed."

The next case, tried before the same court, was that of United States v. Lawrence, 13 Blatchf. 295. Lawrence was extradited from Ireland and brought into this country under the Treaty of 1842 on a charge of a single and specific forgery. He was indicted and put upon his trial for other forgeries than that specified in the extradition proceedings. To his trial for any other forgery than that he objected, by proper pleadings, on the ground that under the Treaty with Great Britain he could not be so tried for other forgeries. Judge Benedict held that he could be so tried; and he was tried and a verdict of guilty was rendered. It appears, however, but not very clearly from any report of the case, that, though tried and convicted, and having pleaded guilty to the other offenses of forgery, he was admitted to bail and no judgment was ever pronounced. Judge Benedict, adverting to the case of United States v. Caldwell, and to a decision of the Court of Appeals of New York in Adriance v. Lagrave, 59 N. Y. 110, proceeded to say:

"This ground of defense is therefore dismissed, with the remark that an offender against the justice of his country can acquire no rights by defrauding that justice. Between him and the justice he has offended no rights accrue to the offender by flight. He remains at all times, and everywhere, liable to be called to answer to the law for his violations thereof, provided he comes within the reach of its arm."

And in addition to the proposition urged in the Caldwell case, that a question of that character arising on the treaty is exclusively for [426] the consideration of the Executive Departments of the respective governments, he proceeds to say:

"It is true that it (the Act of Congress) assumes, as well it may, that the offender will be tried for the offense upon which his surrender is asked; but there are no words indicating that he is to be protected from trial for all other offenses. The absence of any provision indicating an intention to protect from prosecution for other offenses, in a statute having no other object than the protection of extradited offenders, is sufficient to deprive of all force the suggestion that the Act of 1869, as a legislative Act, gives to the Treaty of 1842 the construction contended for by the accused." There are perhaps two or three other cases in which the circuit or district judges of the United States have followed these decisions rendered by Judge Benedict.

On the other hand, Judge Hoffman, of the District Court of California, in the case of United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370, decided that the defendant, having been surrendered under the Extradition Treaty of 1842 by Great Britain, could not be tried for other offenses than those enumerated in that treaty, and supported this view with a very learned and able opinion. Judge Deady, of the District Court of Oregon, in Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421, 431, February 4, 1886, held, in regard to the Treaty of 1842, that for a government to detain a person extradited under that treaty for any other charge than the one for which he had been surrendered "would be not only an infraction of the contract between the parties to the treaty, but also a violation of the supreme law of this land in a matter directly involving his personal rights. A right of person or property, secured or recognized by treaty may be set up as a defense to a prosecution in disregard of either, with the same force and effect as if such right was secured by an Act of Congress."

But perhaps the most important decisions on this question are to be found in the highest courts of the States.

The case of Adriance v. Lagrave [supra], has been cited as supporting the doctrine held by Judge Benedict, and undoubtedly the language of the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Church, for the court in that case adopts the [427] reasoning of Judge Benedict's opinion. Considering the high character of that court, it may be proper to make an observation or two on that case. First. It seems that while Lagrave was held for trial in this country under extradition proceedings, by which he was removed from France under the Treaty of 1843 with that nation, being out on bail, he was arrested under a writ in a civil suit for debt, which issued from one of the courts of the State of New York. He made application by a writ of habeas corpus to be released from this arrest, on the ground that he was protected from it by the terms of the treaty under which he was surrendered, which, in that respect, are similar to those of the Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain. The difference between serving process in a civil action brought by a private party, whether arrest be an incident to that process or not, and the indictment and prosecution of a person similarly situated for a crime not mentioned in the treaty of extradition under which the defendant was by force brought to this country, is too obvious to need comment. And while it is unnecessary to decide now whether he could be so served with process in civil proceedings, it does not follow that he would be equally liable to arrest, trial and conviction for a crime, and especially a crime not enumerated in the extradition treaty and committed before his removal. Second. The case of Adriance v. Lagrave was decided in the supreme court of the State by an order discharging Lagrave from arrest under the writ, and the writ was vacated. This judgment was the unanimous opinion of the court, in which sat three eminent judges of that State; to wit, Daniels, Davis and Brady. In the court of appeals this judgment was reversed by a divided court, Judges Folger and Grover dissenting.

While this is believed to be the only decision in the highest court of a State adopting that view of the law, there are three or four cases decided by appellate courts of other States holding a directly opposite doctrine.

The first of these is Commonwealth v. Hawes, 13 Bush (Ky.), 697. Hawes was demanded from the Dominion of Canada under the Treaty [428] of 1842 on four indictments charging him with as many acts of forgery, and was delivered up on three of them. He was brought to trial on two of these indictments in the courts of Kentucky and acquitted, while the other two were dismissed on motion of the attorney for the Commonwealth. There were, however, other indictments pending against him, charging him with embezzlement, and on one of these a motion was made to bring him to trial. Upon this motion the question was raised whether, under the circumstances in regard to the extradition, he could be tried for that offense. Judge Jackson, before whom the case was pending in the Kenton County Criminal Court, decided that he was bound to take judicial notice of the Treaty of 1842 between the United States and Great Britain, and that the defendant could not be tried for any offense for which he was not extradited, although he was within the power of the court, as the treaty was the supreme law of the land. By the terms of that treaty he held that Hawes could be tried for no other offense, because that treaty provides only for extradition in certain cases and under certain circumstances of proof, and that the right of asylum is to be held sacred as to anything for which the party was not and could not be extradited. He adds:

"I do not mean to say that he [Hawes] may not hereafter be tried; but what I mean to say is that, in the face of the treaty herein referred to, he is not to be tried until there is a reasonable time given him to return to the asylum from which he was taken."

The case was carried to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in which the whole matter was fully discussed, the opinion of the court, a very able one, being delivered by Chief Justice Lindsay, in 1878. The substance of the opinion is thus stated in the syllabus:

"1. Extradited criminals cannot be tried for offenses not named in the treaty, or for offenses not named in the warrant of extradition. A prisoner extradited from the Dominion of Canada under article 10 of the Treaty of 1842, between the United States and Great Britain, cannot be proceeded against or tried in this State for any other offenses than those mentioned in the treaty, and for which he was extradited, [429] without first being afforded an opportunity to return to Canada; and, after being acquitted on trials for the offenses for which he was extradited, he cannot be lawfully held in custody to answer a charge for which he could not be put on trial."

"3. The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought asylum upon its soil, depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from, and is measured and restricted by, the provisions, express or implied, of the treaty."

In 1881 a case involving the same question came before the Texas Court of Appeals (Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. Ct. of App. 627), in which the same principles were asserted as in that of Hawes. The case seems to have been very well considered, and the authorities up to that date were fully examined.

In 1883 the same question came before the Supreme Court of Ohio, in State v. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St. 273. Vanderpool and Jones, having been delivered up under the Treaty of 1842 by the Dominion of Canada for offenses specified in that treaty, were tried, convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for the crimes for which they were extradited. They were afterwards indicted for other offenses, to which they pleaded in abatement that by reason of the facts already stated they could not be tried for these latter offenses until a reasonable time had elapsed after the expiration of their sentences for the crimes of which they had been convicted. The Supreme Court of Ohio, to which the case came on appeal from the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, sustained this view; and this was done upon the same general reasoning, already stated, as to the construction to be placed upon the Ashburton Treaty, of the obligations of that treaty as a law of the land, and of the rights conferred upon the party who was arrested and extradited under its provisions.

Upon a review of these decisions of the federal and state courts, to which may be added the opinions of the distinguished writers which we have cited in the earlier part of this opinion, [430 we feel authorized to state that the weight of authority and of sound principle are in favor of the proposition that a person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty can only be tried for one of the offenses described in that treaty, and for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition, until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings.

Two other observations remain to be made.

One of these is that the operation of this principle of the recognition of the rights of prisoners under such circumstances by the courts before whom they are brought for trial, relieves the relations between the Executive Department of the United States Government and the courts of a State before whom such case may be pending, of a tension which has more than once become very delicate and very troublesome. Of course, the interference of the executive branch of the Federal Government, when it may have been called upon by the nation which has delivered up a person to be tried for an offense against the laws of a State, with the proceedings of a state court in such case, is likely to be resented by such court; and yet, if the only mode of enforcing the obligations of the treaty is through the action of the respective national governments, it would seem that the government appealed to ought to have the right to see that the treaty is faithfully observed, and the rights of parties under it protected. In Great Britain the control of such matters would undoubtedly be recognized by any court to be in the Crown; but in this country such a proposition is, to say the least, not unaccompanied by serious embarrassments. The principle we have here laid down removes this difficulty; for under the doctrine that the treaty is the supreme law of the land, and is to be observed by all the courts, state and national, "anything in the laws of the States to the contrary notwithstanding," if the state court should fail to give due effect to the rights of the party under the treaty, a remedy is found in the judicial branch of the Federal Government, which [431] has been fully recognized. This remedy is by a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the state court which may have committed such an error. The case being thus removed into that court, the just effect and operation of the treaty upon the rights asserted by the prisoner would be there decided. If the party, however, is under arrest and desires a more speedy remedy in order to secure his release, a writ of habeas corpus from one of the federal judges or federal courts, issued on the ground that he is restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or a law or a treaty of the United States, will bring him before a federal tribunal, where the truth of that allegation can be inquired into, and, if well founded, he will be discharged. Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 241, 251 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 868, 871]. State courts also could issue such a writ, and thus the judicial remedy is complete, when the jurisdiction of the court is admitted. This is a complete answer to the proposition that the rights of persons extradited under the treaty cannot be enforced by the judicial branch of the government, and that they can only appeal to the executive branches of the treaty governments for redress.

The other observation we have to make regards an argument presented in this particular case; namely, that the prisoner was convicted on the same testimony which was produced before the magistrate who ordered his extradition. Although it is thus stated in the brief, the record affords no sufficient evidence of it. What is found on that subject in the fourth question certified to this court is as follows:

"Was it error on the part of the trial judge to refuse to direct a verdict of acquittal, after it had been proven that the accused was extradited under the Extradition Treaty with Great Britain, upon the charge of murder, it also appearing that in the proceedings preliminary to the warrant of extradition the same act was investigated, and the same witnesses examined, as at the trial?",

It might be a sufficient answer to this argument to say that this does not prove that the evidence was the same upon the two trials. Although the act charged may have been the same and the witnesses may have been the same, yet the evidence elicited on the last trial may have been very different from that obtained on the first. While the identity of facts investigated in the two trials is charged a little more specifically in the first question, we are of opinion that no importance should be attached to this matter, even if it were found that the party was convicted of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment on the seaman on the same evidence precisely upon which the committing magistrate in Great Britain delivered him up under a charge of murder. It may be very true that evidence which satisfied that officer that the prisoner was guilty of the crime of murder would also establish that he had inflicted cruel and unusual punishment on the person for whose murder he was charged; but as the treaty only justified his delivery on the ground that he was proved to be guilty of murder, before the committing magistrate, it does not follow at all that such magistrate would have delivered him on a charge, founded upon precisely the same evidence, of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment, an offense for which the treaty made no provision, and which was of a very unimportant character when compared with that of murder. If the party could be convicted on an indictment for inflicting cruel and unusual punishment where the grand jury would not have found an indictment for murder, the treaty could always be evaded by making a demand on account of the higher offense defined in the treaty, and then only seeking a trial and conviction for the minor offense not found in the treaty. We do not think the circumstance that the same evidence might be sufficient to convict for the minor offense which was produced before the committing magistrate to support the graver charge justifies this departure from the principles of the treaty.

This fourth question may also properly be treated as immaterial, for the question is, Should the trial judge have directed a verdict of acquittal? As all the matters set up by the defendant are in the nature of pleas in abatement, going rather to the question of trial on that indictment at that time, and not denying that at some future time, when the defendant may have been properly brought within the jurisdiction of the court, or rightfully found within [433] such jurisdiction, he may be then tried, it did not involve an issue on the question of guilty or not guilty on which the court, if it proceeded to try that question at all, could direct either an acquittal or a conviction. Under the views we have taken of the case the jurisdiction of the court to try such an offense, if the party himself was properly within its jurisdiction, is not denied; but the facts relied upon go to show that while the court did have jurisdiction to find the indictment, as well as of the questions involved in such indictment, it did not have jurisdiction of the person at that time, so as to subject him to trial. The question therefore is immaterial.

The result of these considerations is that the first of the questions certified to us is answered in the negative; the second and third are answered in the affirmative; and it is ordered to be so certified to the judges of the Circuit Court.

Mr. Justice Gray, concurring:

I concur in the decision of the court, upon the single ground that by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1869, chap. 141, § 1 (embodied in § 5275 of the Revised Statutes), providing measures by which any person, delivered up by a foreign government for the purpose of being tried here for a crime of which he has been accused, may be secured against lawless violence "until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter," the political department of the government has clearly manifested its will, in the form of an express law (of which any person prosecuted in any court within the United States has the right to claim the protection), that the accused shall be tried only for the crime specified in the warrant of extradition, and shall be allowed a reasonable time to depart out of the United States, before he can be arrested or detained for another offense.

Upon the broader question whether, independently of any Act of Congress, and in the absence of any affirmative restriction in the treaty, a man surrendered for one crime should [434] be tried for another, I express no opinion, because not satisfied that that is a question of law, within the cognizance of the judicial tribunals, as contradistinguished from a question of international comity and usage, within the domain of statesmanship and diplomacy.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the decision of this case. A fugitive from justice has no absolute right of asylum in a country to which he flees, and if he can be got back within the jurisdiction of the country whose laws he has violated, he may be proceeded with precisely the same as if he had not fled, unless there is something in the laws of the country where he is to be tried, or in the way in which he was got back, to prevent. I do not understand this to be denied. All, therefore, depends in this case on the treaty with Great Britain under which this extradition was effected, and section 5275 of the Revised Statutes. I concede that the treaty is as much a part of the law of the United States as is a statute; and if there is anything in it which forbids a trial for any other offense than that for which the extradition was made, the accused may use it as a defense to a prosecution on any other charge until a reasonable time has elapsed after his release from custody on account of the crime for which he was sent back. But I have been unable to find any such provision. The treaty requires a delivery up to justice, on demand, of those accused of certain crimes, but says nothing about what shall be done with them after the delivery has been made. It might have provided that they should not be tried for any other offenses than those for which they were surrendered, but it has not. Consequently, as it seems to me, the accused has acquired no new rights under the treaty. He fled from the justice of the country whose laws he violated, and has been got back. The treaty under which he was surrendered has granted him no immunity, and therefore it has not provided him with any new defense. This seems to have been the view taken by the English Government during the time of the controversy growing out of the demand made for the extradition of Winslow; for, in the debate in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor (Cairnes), while supporting the English view of the matter, and referring to the cases which had been cited against it, said: "In that class of cases * * * the prisoners, who had been surrendered on one charge, and who were being tried upon another, themselves attempted to raise the defense that they could not be tried for an offense different from that for which they had been surrendered. Such cases certainly have no application whatever to the present question, because nothing can be [435] more clear than that a prisoner himself has no right to raise such a defense. Even in France, where * * * the law and practice of extradition goes far beyond that which prevails in this country and in the United States, a prisoner is not permitted to set up such a defense, for the clear reason that he is within the jurisdiction of the court, which has the authority to try him for the offense of which he is charged, and that whether he ought to be tried for an offense other than that for which he has been surrendered is a matter of diplomacy between the two countries, and not a question between the prisoner and the court before which he is being tried." For. Rel. of the U. S. 1876, 291.

This is, I think, the true rule, and it is in full accord with the principles applied by this court in The Richmond, 9 Cranch, 102 [13 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 670], where it was insisted upon by way of defense that a vessel proceeded against for a violation of the Nonintercourse Act had been seized within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain. As to this Chief Justice Marshall said, in delivering the opinion of the court: "The seizure of an American vessel within the territorial jurisdiction of a foreign power is certainly an offense against that power, which must be adjusted between the two governments. This court can take no cognizance of it; and the majority of the court is of opinion that the law does not connect that trespass, if it be one, with the subsequent seizure by the civil authority, under the process of the district court, so as to annul the proceedings of that court against the vessel." If either country should use its privileges under the treaty to obtain a surrender of a fugitive on the pretense of trying him for an offense for which extradition could be claimed, so as to try him [436] for one for which it could not, it might furnish a just cause of complaint on the part of the country which had been deceived, but it would be a matter entirely for adjustment between the two countries, and which could in no way inure to the benefit of the accused except through the instrumentality of the government that had been induced to give him up.

As to section 5275 of the Revised Statutes, I have only to say, that, in my opinion, it neither adds to the rights of the accused nor changes the effect of the treaty as a part of the law of the United States. The accused was surrendered by Great Britain to the United States, and the United States are alone responsible to that country for whatever may be done with him in consequence of his surrender. He was delivered into the possession of the United States, and, in my opinion, that possession may at any time be regained by the United States, under this statute, from the State or its authorities, so long as the accused remains in custody, if it should be necessary in order to enable them to keep their faith with Great Britain in respect to the surrender.

I do not care to elaborate the argument on either of these questions. My only purpose is to state generally the grounds of my dissent.

SAMUEL W. FORDYCE, Assignee of WALTER A. MOORE, AND WALTER A. MOORE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 469–473.)

Jurisdiction—circuit court without, when an indispensable defendant is adverse in interest to the plaintiffs and is a citizen of the same State and there is no separable controversy—costs—equal division of—improper removal of cause.

1. Where, at the time of the commencement of an action in a circuit court, or its removal thereto, one of the defendants is an indispensable party adverse in interest to the plaintiffs and is a citizen of the same State, and there is no separable controversy between the plaintiffs and another defendant, who is a citizen of a different State, the court is without jurisdiction.

2. Upon a reversal for want of jurisdiction in the circuit court, this court may make such order in respect to the costs of the appeal as justice and right shall seem to require.

3. The plaintiffs having improperly brought a suit in the court below, and the defendants having improperly removed another suit thereto, without objection by either party, upon the reversal of a decree entered after the consolidation of said suits, this court orders that the costs be equally divided.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry Hitchcock, for appellants.

Messrs. Eben W. Kimball and Geo. W. Murphy, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

From the record in this case it appears that on the 10th of January, 1881, Walter A. Moore, a citizen of Arkansas, conveyed to George G. Latta, a citizen of the same State, certain property in the City of Hot Springs, in trust to secure the payment of three notes for the sum of $2,488.46 each, payable to the order of Charles G. Peper, under the name of Charles G. Peper & Co., a citizen of Missouri, with power of sale in case of nonpayment. After the execution of this conveyance Moore became insolvent, and assigned his property to Samuel W. Fordyce, a citizen of Arkansas, for the benefit of his creditors. On the 11th of June, 1881, Fordyce as such assignee, at the instance of the creditors of Moore and in their behalf, began a suit in equity in the Circuit [470] Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas against Peper and Latta, the object and purpose of which was to prevent a sale of the property under the deed to Latta, and for an account of certain transactions between Peper and Moore connected with the notes which had been secured, with a view to the cancellation of the debt or at least its payment after the exact amount due should be determined. In the bill it appeared that both Fordyce and Latta were citizens of Arkansas, and that Peper was a citizen of Missouri. To this bill Peper and Latta filed a joint answer.

Afterwards, on the 31st of October, 1881, Fordyce, as assignee, and Moore began another suit against Peper and Latta in the Circuit Court of Garland County, Arkansas, the object of which was also to enjoin Peper and Latta from selling the property under the deed to Latta, and to obtain a cancellation of the conveyance. Immediately on the filing of this bill, a preliminary injunction was granted as prayed. On the same day, Peper and Latta filed a petition for the removal of this last suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, on the ground that "There is a controversy in this suit between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined between them." In their petition it was stated in express terms that Latta, Fordyce, and Moore were all citizens of Arkansas, and Peper a citizen of Missouri. This cause was entered in due form in the Circuit Court of the United States on the 14th of November, 1881, and on the 21st of the same month Peper and Latta filed in that court a joint answer to the bill which had been filed in the state court, and on which the injunction had been granted. On the 20th of December, 1881, the two causes thus in the Circuit Court of the United States were there consolidated on motion of Fordyce, and an order made "that the two causes be tried as one suit under the title" of the cause originally begun in that court.

On the 10th of June, 1882, Peper and Latta filed a cross bill in which they prayed a foreclosure and sale of the trust property. To this cross bill an answer was filed by Fordyce and Moore, setting up substantially the same de- [471] fenses as were shown in the bill of Fordyce in the Circuit Court of the United States, and to this a replication was filed by Peper and Latta. Testimony was taken, and on the final hearing of the cause a decree was entered dismissing the cross bill and directing a cancellation of the deed of trust. From that decree Peper and Latta took this appeal.

The first objection now made to the decree is, that the circuit court had no jurisdiction, either of the suit originally begun in that court or of that removed from the state court. If the jurisdiction does not appear on the face of the record in some form, the decree is erroneous and must be reversed. That was decided at the present term in Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Rhoads [ante, 380], to which reference is made for the authorities.

The jurisdiction in this case depends alone on the citizenship of the parties; and in the suits as originally begun, and on their consolidation in the circuit court, Latta, one of the defendants, is, and was at the commencement of the actions, a citizen of the same State with the plaintiffs. This is fatal to the jurisdiction, because Latta was an indispensable party adverse in interest to the plaintiffs, and there was no separable controversy between the plaintiffs and Peper which would authorize the removal of the suit begun in the state court on that account. This was expressly decided in Thayer v. Life Association, 112 U. S. 717 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 864], a case which cannot be distinguished from this. It follows, therefore, that the decree must be reversed.

[472] It only remains to consider the question of costs, for in Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379 [28:462], and Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 229 [28:714], it was held that, upon a reversal for want of jurisdiction in the circuit court, this court may make such order in respect to the costs of the appeal as justice and right shall seem to require. Here the error is attributable equally to both the parties. Fordyce sued originally in the circuit court, when, upon the face of his bill, it appeared there was no jurisdiction. Without discontinuing that suit he sued again in the state court upon what was substantially the same cause of action and to obtain substantially the same relief. This suit Peper and Latta caused to be removed to the circuit court, and in their petition set forth a state of facts which showed that the case was not removable. The cause was then entered in the circuit court, and an answer and a cross bill filed by Peper and Latta without any attempt on the part of Fordyce or Moore to have the suit remanded, and without even calling the attention of the court to the question of jurisdiction. On the contrary, after the answer and before the cross bill, Fordyce moved for and obtained an order that the two cases—that which he had brought in the Circuit Court of the United States and that which Peper and Latta had removed there—be heard as one under the title of his own suit in that court The cases then proceeded, without objection by either party, until after a final decree below and an appeal by Peper and Latta to this court. Under these circumstances, we order that the costs of this court be divided equally between the parties, each paying half.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed for want of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill filed originally in that court by Fordyce against Peper and Latta, without prejudice, and to remand the suit removed from the state court, each party to pay his own costs in the Circuit Court.

Removal of causes—security.

Subsection 3 of section 639, R. S., providing for the removal of causes from state courts, on the ground of prejudice and local influence, was not repealed by the Act of 1875. That part of said section, 639, R. S., which provides for the security to be given upon removal of a cause, also remains in force, it being necessary to carry said subsection 3 into effect.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Hugh L. Bond, Jr., and John K. Cowen, for plaintiff in error:

This court has repeatedly decided that the provisions of section 3, of the Act of 1875, do not govern the removal of suits on the ground of prejudice and local influence, under subsection 3, of section 639 R. S., so far as the time for filing the petition for removal is concerned.

Bible Society v. Grove, 101 U. S. 610 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 847); King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395 (27:60); Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 73 (28:927).

The two cases last above cited decided expressly that a suit between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State, wherein the latter has filed an affidavit of prejudice and local influence is not "any suit mentioned" in section 2 of the Act of 1875. And hence its removal is not governed by section 3 of that Act. It is submitted that the effect of the Act of 1875 was to strike out subsections 1 and 2 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, but to leave the remainder of that section in full force, so as to provide a complete system of proceeding for the removal of suits, on the ground of prejudice and local influence. There are two distinct systems of proceeding for the removal of causes. There may be a removal under one system, or under the other system; but there can be no such thing as a removal partly under the Act of 1875 and partly under section 639.

Messrs. Gibson Atherton and J. A. Flory, for defendant in error:

This is a proceeding in error to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of Bates v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., reported in full in 39 Ohio, 157.

We claim that the court of common pleas was right in refusing to certify the cause to the United States Court. The petition to remove was filed too late under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1875. U. S. Statutes, 1874 and 1875, p. 470.

Babbitt v. Clark, 103 U. S. 606 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 507); Pullman P. C. Co. v. Speck, 113 U. S. 84 (28:925); Gregory v. Hartley, 113 U. S. 742 (28:1150).

The Railroad Company attempted to make the application under paragraph 3 of section 639, Rev. Stat. p. 113, and frame their petition and bond under that section. The whole of section 639 was repealed by the Act of March 3, 1875.

Burdock v. Hale, U. S. Ct. D. of Ind. I. L. and E. Rep. No. 10, 246; Clipinger's Admr. v. N. V. Ins. 2 Cin. L. Bulletin, 218; Danville R. R. Co. Case, 7 Chic. Legal News, 241; Chandler v. Coe, 22 Am. Rep. 437; Smith's Constitutional Construction, §§ 786, 787; Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 617 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 437); U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 (78 U. S. 20:153); 7 Am. Dec. 99, note; Loraine Plank R. Co. v. Cotton, 12 Ohio St. 263; King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 396 (27:60).

Counsel say that part 3 of section 639 was not repealed by the Act of March 3; that the inconsistency between the two is not sufficient to repeal the former. But the law is that when a new statute enacts a thing to be done differently from the same thing required by a former law, the first thereby becomes repealed without any direct expression of such intention.

Moore v. Vance, 1 Ohio, 10.

It seems to us, there is no doubt but that it was the intention of Congress, in passing the Act of March 3, 1875, to repeal all of the class of cases provided for in section 639.

First. Take the title of the Act of March 3, 1875.

Second. Then the language of the first section, which provides "That the circuit court shall have original cognizance of all suits of a civil nature, at common law, or in equity."

Third. Then the second section, which provides "that any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity," may be removed.

Fourth. Then the language of the third section, which provides that the person "entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the second section of this Act," the language of which, with section 1, is the same as that of section 2 of article 3 of the United States Constitution, under and by virtue of which the United States Courts can take or obtain jurisdiction.

Fifth. Then looking at the other provision of the Act of 1875, with its broad and comprehensive language, and that it provides a single straight and uniform mode of procedure so as not to allow experiments in the State (See Miller, J., in Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Speck, supra). Then the fact that the local prejudice resulting from the war, that gave rise to the Act of 1867, had ceased to any longer exist.

From all of the above facts, there seems to us to be no doubt but that it was the intention of Congress in passing the Act of March 3, 1875, to consolidate and codify all the law upon the subject relating to this class of cases, provided for in sections 2 and 3 of the United States Constitution, "between citizens of different States," into one single section, with one mode of procedure applying to all.

But if this third paragraph was not superseded by the Act of 1875, this case was not removable under that paragraph, because the petition was not filed before the trial of the case. The Revised Statutes, paragraph 3, provided that the petition for removal should be filed before "the trial" of the cause. This case was put at issue by the demurrer, under section 260, Ohio Code, and "A trial is a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or of fact, in an action or proceeding."

Ohio Code, § 262, S. and C. Stat. 1020.

So that this case was finally tried and decided and final judgment rendered before the petition for removal was filed, and the petition for removal does not aver the case had not been tried, while the record shows it had been once tried.

But, say the counsel for the Railroad Company, where the judgment of the court has been set aside and a new trial granted the case is removable, and cite the case of the Insurance Company v. Dunn, 19 Wall. 214 (86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 68). That case was decided under the Act of March 2, 1867, which required the petition for removal to be filed "at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit," while in the Revised Statutes the word trial is transposed from after the word "final" and placed before it, so as to make it conform to the Act of 1866.

This change was not made for nothing. The case of Insurance Co. v. Dunn had already been decided, of which it is presumed Congress had full knowledge before it enacted the Revised Statutes. "It is apparent that this change was not the result of accident, but was deliberately made to secure uniformity upon the subject, in view of the conflicting decisions between the federal and state courts in the following cases:

Ackerly v. Vilas, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 284; Johnson v. Monell, Woolworth, 390; Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 20 Ohio St. 175, and same case 19 Wall. 214, supra; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 192; Whittier v. Ins. Co. 20 Am. Rep. 187.

This change in the wording of the statutes appears to have been made apparently to get around the construction given to the Act of 1867 in the 19 Wallace report; for if Congress, having full knowledge of that decision, had intended to follow the Act of 1867, it would have worded it the same. The change was apparently made to do away with the injustice resulting from the Act of 1867, under the construction given it by the 19 Wallace report, as is well illustrated by the case at bar. The change in the language of the Acts of the Revised Statutes and of March 3, 1875, were made so as to bring the law back to the same state in which it had been since the foundation of our National Government, and under which the rights of parties had been long since settled by judicial decisions.

Whittier v. Hartford Ins. Co. 20 Am. Rep. 187; King v. Cornell, supra.

If a removal can be made under the Revised Statutes, the conditions of the bond must be those required by the Act of March 3, 1875.

Torry v. Locomotive Works, 14 Blatchf. C. C. Rep. 260; 20 Am. Law Reg. p. 38; Burdock v. Hale, 8 Chic. L. News, 192; Bates v. R. R. Co. 39 Ohio St. 157; Webber v. Bishop, 13 Fed. Rep. 49; McMurdy v. Con. G. L. Ins. Co. 9 Chic. L. News, 324; Farmers L. and Tr. Co. v. C. P. and S. R. R. Co. 12 Chic. L. N. 65.

The right to remove a suit from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States is statutory; and to effect a transfer of jurisdiction all the requirements of the statutes must be followed.

Per Waite, Ch. J., in Babbitt v. Clark, 103 U. S. 610 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 508); Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 474 (25: 599); Gregory v. Hartley, supra; Ins. Co. v. Pechner, 95 U. S. 183 (24: 427); Amory v. Amory, 95 U. S. 186 (24: 428); Merchants Nat. Bank v. Brown, 4 Woods, 263.

There was no justification, or evidence given to the court that the sureties on the bond were sufficient; and in the absence of a finding of the court, or showing to the court by affidavit or other evidence shown by a bill of exceptions setting forth the evidence, this court is bound to presume they were not good and sufficient sureties, if it is necessary, in order to sustain the judgment or order of the court of common pleas. It is said that this may be and was waived. We admit it might be waived, and if the court had ordered the removal, it would be presumed that the qualifications were made or waived to sustain the order of removal, but we know of no authority where it is held that a court of errors will presume such a fact, or hold that it was waived for the purposes of reversing an order or judgment.

Dallas v. Ferneau, 25 Ohio St. 635.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Licking County, Ohio, on the first of July, 1875, by George Bates, a citizen of Ohio, against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, a Maryland corporation, and having its principal office in that State, to recover damages for personal injuries. The Railroad Company filed a general demurrer to the petition, on the 20th of September, 1876, and on the 7th of April, 1877, this demurrer was sustained and judgment entered in favor of the Company.

[465] On the 7th of July, 1877, this judgment was reversed by the district court of the county, and the cause remanded to the common pleas for further proceedings. When the case got back the Railroad Company filed a petition for removal to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, under subsection 3 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, on the ground of prejudice and local influence. The petition was in proper form, and it was accompanied by the necessary affidavit, but the security was such as was prescribed by section 639 of the Revised Statutes, and not such as was required by section 3 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137; 18 Stat. at L. pt. 3, 470. The Act of 1875 requires security for "All costs that may be awarded by the said circuit court, if the said court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto." This is not found in section 639.

The petition for removal was denied by the court of common pleas, December 22, 1877, and thereupon the Railroad Company answered, and the parties went to trial May 23, 1878, when a judgment was rendered against the Company. The case was taken then, on petition in error, to the district court of the county, because, among others, the court erred in denying the petition for removal. On the 28th of February, 1880, the district court reversed the judgment for this error, and the case was then taken to the supreme court of the State, where the judgment of the district court was reversed, and that of the common pleas affirmed, on the 15th of May, 1883; that court holding that the security was defective, because it was not such as the Act of 1875 required. To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought.

Subsections 1 and 2 of section 639 were repealed by the Act of 1875; Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 823]; King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395, 398 [27: 60, 61]; Holland v. Chambers, 110 U. S. 59 [28: 70]; Ayers v. Watson, 113 U. S. 594 [28: 1093]; but subsection 3 was not. Bible Society v. Grove, 101 U. S. 610 [25: 847]; Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 78, 80 [28: 927, 929]. Under subsection 3 the petition for removal may be filed at any time before the final trial or hearing. Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. 214 [86 U. S. 22: 68]; Vannevar v. Bryant, 21 Wall. 41 [88 U. S. 22: 476]; Yulee v. Vose, 99 U. S. 545 [25: 356]; Railroad Co. v. McKinley, 99 U. S. 147 [25: 272]. This petition was filed after a new trial had actually been granted, and while the cause was pending in the trial court for that purpose. It was, therefore, in time, and no objection is made to its form.

As subsection 3 has not been repealed, so much of the remainder of section 639 as is necessary to carry the provisions of that subsection into effect remains in force, unless something else has been put in its place. It is not contended that anything of this kind has been done, unless it be by the operation of section 3 of the Act of 1875; but that section by its very terms is only applicable to removals under section 2 of the same Act. The language is "That whenever either party, or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section," that is to say, section 2 of the Act of 1875, "shall desire to remove such suit," he shall petition and give security in the manner and form therein prescribed. Clearly, then, this section relates only to removals provided for in that Act; and as subsection 3 of section 639 remains in force, because the cases there [468] provided for are not included among those mentioned in the Act of 1875, it follows that the form and mode of proceeding to secure a removal under the subsection will be sufficient if they conform to the requirements of the other parts of the section. That section as it now stands unrepealed is complete in itself, and furnishes its own machinery to effect a removal of all cases which come within its operation. The security is as much governed by the remainder of the section as the time for filing the petition; and as to that, it was distinctly held in Hess v. Reynolds, supra, that the petition was in time if presented before the final trial, even though it was after the term at which the cause could have been first tried, which would be too late if section 3 of the Act of 1875 was applicable to this class of cases. As to this the court said in that case: "We are of opinion that this clause of section 639 remains, and is complete in itself, furnishing its own peculiar cause of removal, and prescribing, for reasons appropriate to it, the time within which it must be done."

It is true this suit is between citizens of different States, and as such it is mentioned in section 2 of the Act of 1875; but the fair meaning of section 3 is that the suit must be one that is removable, simply for the reason that it is one of a class such as is mentioned in section 2. Some cases in the circuit courts have been ruled the other way, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio was put largely on their authority; but they were all decided before Hess v. Reynolds, supra, in this court, and that case, as we think, substantially covers this.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

v.
EDWARD P. FERRY.

Jurisdiction—appeals from Supreme Courts of the Territories and District of Columbia—construction of Act of March 3, 1885—affidavits of value.

1. The Act of March 3, 1885, limits appeals to this court from the Supreme Courts of the Territories and the District of Columbia, with certain exceptions, to cases in which the matter in dispute, at the date of final judgment or decree, exceeds $5,000.
2. The patent included in said exceptions is a patent for an invention or discovery, not for land.

Submitted Nov. 23, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. J. G. Sutherland and Arthur Brown, for appellee, in support of motion.

Mr. John A. Marshall, for appellant, contra.

This appeal was taken since the Act of March 3, 1885, chap. 355, 23 Stat. at L. 443, went into effect. That statute, by section 1, limits appeals to this court from the Supreme Courts of the Territories and from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to cases where the value of the matter in dispute exceeds $5,000, except, by section 2, the validity of a patent or copyright is involved, or the validity of a treaty or a statute, or an authority exercised under the United States is drawn in question. The value here referred to is the value at the time of the final judgment or decree, not at the time of the appeal or writ of error. Nothing whatever appears on the face of the record proper to show the value of the matter in dispute. The judgment was rendered July 22, 1886, and an appeal allowed the same day in open court. Affidavits of value were filed in the court below after this allowance, and these affidavits were sent here with the transcript. Other affidavits have been filed in this court since the case was docketed, and, on consideration of the whole, we are satisfied that the value is not sufficient to give us jurisdiction. The appellant himself puts the value of the land alone at only $4,000, and the fair inference, from all the affidavits taken together, is that the improvements on the land are worth much less than $1,000. A large number of witnesses, who seem to be well qualified to judge of the value, put it at from $3,000 to $3,500, including all improvements.

The patent referred to in the second section of the Act is a patent for an invention or discovery, not a patent for land.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

FREDERICK KRAMER, Assignee of ISAAC COHN, a Bankrupt, Appt.,
v.
ISAAC COHN AND MARK S. COHN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 355–357.)

Bankruptcy—fraudulent withholding assets—bill by assignee against bankrupt and another—equity jurisdiction.

A bill in equity, filed by an assignee in bankruptcy against the bankrupt and another, charging that the proceeds of property fraudulently concealed by said bankrupt had been invested in the stock in trade in a business carried on by him in the name of the other defendant, is held to have been properly dismissed, generally, as to the second defendant and without prejudice to an action at law against the bankrupt, there being no proof to connect the second defendant with the fraud.

Submitted Nov. 12, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Morris M. Cohn, for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Clendening and M. H. Sandels, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of [356] the court:

This bill in equity was filed by the assignee in bankruptcy of Isaac Cohn, against him and Mark S. Cohn, alleging that Isaac Cohn, before the adjudication of bankruptcy, and with intent to defraud his creditors, concealed his property and sold it for a large sum of money, and, after obtaining his discharge in bankruptcy, invested that money in a stock of goods, with which he had since carried on business in the name of the other defendant; that this stock in fact consisted of the property so kept back from his creditors, with the increase thereof, and that the other defendant had little, if any, interest therein; and praying for an answer, an injunction, a receiver, an account; and, upon failure to answer and account, for a decree vesting in the plaintiff the title in the stock; and for further relief.

The defendants answered separately upon oath, denying these allegations, and alleging that the business was carried on by Isaac Cohn as clerk of the other defendant, and was wholly owned by the latter.

At the hearing upon pleadings and proofs, the court was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover against Isaac Cohn, for money and assets fraudulently withheld by him from his assignee in bankruptcy, the sum of $6,500, but that the plaintiff had failed to connect the other defendant with the fraudulent withholding of assets; and therefore entered a decree against Isaac Cohn for that sum and costs, but as to the other defendant dismissed the bill with costs.

The plaintiff and Isaac Cohn each filed a petition for a rehearing. The plaintiff's petition was denied. But upon the petition of Isaac Cohn it was ordered that as to him, "it appearing to the court that it is without jurisdiction in this case," the former decree be set aside and the bill be dismissed with costs and without prejudice. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

[357] No reason is shown for sustaining the appeal. So far as the plaintiff's claim was against Isaac Cohn personally, an action at law to recover the value of the property fraudulently concealed and sold by him would afford a full, adequate and complete remedy. The only pretense for resorting to equity was the allegation that the proceeds of that property had been invested in the stock in goods of a business carried on by him in the name of the other defendant, whereby it was sought to affect the latter and the goods with a trust in favor of the creditors of Isaac, and of the plaintiff as representing them. But the proof wholly failed to support that allegation, and showed that the plaintiff had no right of action, except to recover pecuniary damages against Isaac alone. It thus appeared that the plaintiff never had any claim within the cognizance of a court of equity; and the bill was rightly dismissed generally as to the second defendant, and without prejudice to an action at law against the first defendant. Dowell v. Mitchell, 105 U. S. 430 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1142], Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 347 [post, 451], just decided.

[477] UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

JOHN PAUL JONES, Admr. of the Estate of GEORGE MCDOUGALL, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 477–480.)

Jurisdiction of appeals from court of claims—when not affected by appropriation to pay judgment.

1. This court has jurisdiction of appeals from the court of claims.

2. Such jurisdiction is not affected by an appropriation to pay a judgment appealed from, where the appropriation is not applicable, before the expiration of the right of appeal.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims.
On motion to dismiss. Denied.

The grounds for the motion are given in the opinion.

Mr. John Paul Jones, administrator, in support of motion.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellant, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The grounds of this motion are:

1. That under the law as it now stands no appeal lies from a judgment of the court of claims to this court; and,

2. That since the appeal was taken Congress has appropriated the amount necessary to pay the judgment.

The case of Gordon v. U. S. 2 Wall. 561 [69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 921], holding that no appeal would lie from a judgment of the court of claims to this court, was announced March 10, 1865. The cause was originally submitted on [478] the 18th of December, 1863, and on the 10th of April, 1864, it was ordered for argument on the second day of the next term. Chief Justice Taney died October 12, 1864, and the case was not reargued under the special order of the previous term until January 3, 1865. Consequently, the opinion published as an appendix to 117 U. S. 697, must have been prepared by him before the decision was actually made. The records of the court show that in announcing the judgment Chief Justice Chase said: "We think that the authority given to the head of an Executive Department by necessary implication in the 14th section of the amended Court of Claims Act, to revise all the decisions of that court requiring payment of money, denies to it the judicial power, from the exercise of which alone appeals can be taken to this court. The reasons which necessitate this conclusion may be more fully announced hereafter. At present, we restrict ourselves to this general statement, and to the direction that the cause be dismissed for want of jurisdiction." This differs somewhat from the case as reported by Mr. Wallace*, and shows precisely the ground of the opinion; to wit, the special provisions of section 14. That section was as follows:

"Sec. 14. That no money shall be paid out of the treasury for any claim passed on by the court of claims till after an appropriation therefor shall have been estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury."

At the next session of Congress after this decision the objectionable section was repealed by the Act of March 17, 1866, chap. 19, 14 Stat. at L. 9; and the court of claims was directed to transmit, at the end of every term, a copy of its decisions to the heads of departments and certain other officers specially mentioned. From that time until the presentation of this motion it has never been doubted that appeals would lie. Indeed, immediately after the repealing Act went into effect, and before the adjournment of the term then being held, a set of rules regulating such appeals was promulgated by this court, and it is safe to say that there has never been a term since in which many cases of the kind have not been heard and decided without objection from anyone. At December Term, 1866, in De Groot v. U. S. [479] 5 Wall. 427 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 702], the new rules were referred to and explained; and at the next term, in December, 1867, in U. S. v. Alire, 6 Wall. 577 [73 U. S. 18: 948], a case which could not be entertained on a general appeal was sent back in order that a special appeal might be allowed of which this court could take jurisdiction. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Nelson, who was with the majority when Gordon's Case was decided, after referring to that case as denying the jurisdiction of this court "on account of the power of the Executive Department over its judgment by the fourteenth section of the Act of 1868," said "that section had been repealed by the first section of the Act of March 17, 1866." So, too, in U. S. v. O'Grady, 22 Wall. 641 [89 U.S. 22: 772], Mr. Justice Clifford, who also concurred in the judgment in Gordon's Case, said, for the court: "The supreme court declined to take jurisdiction of such appeals chiefly for the reason that the Act practically subjected the judgments of the supreme court rendered in such cases to the re-examination and revision of the Secretary of the Treasury;" but he added, "Subsequently Congress repealed the provision conferring that authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and since that time no doubt has been entertained that it is proper that the supreme court should exercise jurisdiction of appeals in such cases." This case was decided at October Term, 1874, and afterwards, at October Term, 1879, in Langford v. U. S. 101 U. S. 344 [25: 1012], Mr. Justice Miller, who dissented from the judgment in Gordon's Case, after referring to that case and the grounds of its decision, said: "An Act of Congress removing this objectionable feature having been passed the year after that decision, this appellate power of this court has been exercised ever since." It is manifest, therefore, not only that the jurisdiction was originally denied solely on the ground of the objectionable 14th section, but that, with this section repealed, nothing has ever been supposed until now to stand in the way of our taking cognizance of such cases.

Reference is now made in argument to section [480] 236 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that all claims and demands against the United States shall be settled and adjusted in the Department of the Treasury, and it is claimed that this is the equivalent of the objectionable 14th section as a bar to our jurisdiction. This section of the Revised Statutes is not new law. It was first enacted as section 2 of the Act of March 3, 1817, chap. 45, 3 Stat. at L. 344, and it has been in force ever since. It evidently relates to an entirely different class of duties from that to which the payment of the judgments of the court of claims belongs. As to such judgments, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay them out of "any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation" to him "of a copy of said judgment, certified" according to law. Rev. Stat. § 1089. Of course this applies as well to special appropriations made for the satisfaction of the particular judgment. Under this statute the Secretary has no power whatever to go behind the judgment in his examination.

Reference is also made to an Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 149, 18 Stat. at L. 481, which provides for "deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor;" but this gives the accounting officers of the Government no authority to re-examine the judgment. It only provides a way of payment and satisfaction if the creditor shall, at the time of the presentation of his judgment, be a debtor of the United States for anything except what is included in the judgment, which is conclusive as to everything it embraces.

It is unnecessary to pursue this branch of the case further. We are entirely satisfied that, as the law now stands, appeals do lie to this court from the judgments of the court of claims in the exercise of its general jurisdiction.

As to the second ground of the motion, it is sufficient to say that it is expressly provided, in the Act making the appropriation referred to, "That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid before the right of appeal shall have expired." Stat. 1885–1886, 283. As this appeal was taken in time, the appropriation is not applicable to the payment of the judgment, at least until the case has been disposed of here.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

Jurisdiction—burden of showing, on plaintiff in error—practice—affidavits of value.

1. The burden of showing jurisdiction is on the plaintiff in error; and if he fails to show by a fair preponderance of testimony that the value of the property in dispute exceeds $5,000, a motion to dismiss will be granted.

2. Where the record does not show the value of the property in dispute, it is good practice to grant leave to file affidavits as to such value.

Submitted Nov. 15, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The case appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Lewis A. Groff, C. S. Montgomery and M. H. Sessions, for defendant in error, in support of motion.

Messrs. C. O. Whedon and J. C. Crocker, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

Our jurisdiction in this case depends on the value of the matter in dispute. Final judgment was entered in the action May 24, 1884. At that time there was nothing in the record to show the value. On the 16th of September, 1884, on motion, leave was given the defendant in the court below to file affidavits of value that day, and the plaintiff to file counter affidavits in twenty days. This was good practice, and, if oftener adopted, would save trouble to parties and to us. Under this leave, and others of a similar character, which were afterwards granted, a considerable number of affidavits were filed by both parties. The affidavits were contradictory, some having a tendency to prove that the value was more than $5,000, and others that it was less. On the 5th of May, 1885, the district judge, without formally deciding the question of value, allowed a writ of error, thus sending the case here on [383] the affidavits, free from any decision whatever by the court below as to their effect. In this respect the case differs from Gage v. Pumpelly, 108 U. S. 164 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 668], where the appeal was allowed by the court in session after considering the affidavits, and from Zeigler v. Hopkins, 117 U. S. 683 [29: 1019], where the value was found as one of the facts in the case.

The burden of showing jurisdiction is on the plaintiff in error. He must establish as a fact by a fair preponderance of testimony that the value of the property in dispute exceeds $5,000. This he has not done. Two witnesses swear that the property is worth more than $6,000, and eight that it is worth $5,000, "or more." These are for the plaintiff in error, but there are eight on the other side who say it is worth only from about $3,000 to about $3,500, and the certificate of the county clerk shows that it was valued for taxation in 1884 at only $700. Under these circumstances, we think the decided preponderance of the evidence is against our jurisdiction, and the motion to dismiss is therefore granted.

Dismissed.

ROBERT NEWTON, Appt.,

v.

FURST AND BRADLEY MANUFACTURING COMPANY, CONRAD FURST, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 373-385.)

Patent for improvement in gang-plows—reissue including new elements in combination, invalid.

1. In view of the state of the art at the date of the invention covered by letters patent No. 56812, for an improvement in gang-plows, the patentee's claims must be limited to his specific devices, said patent not extending to any device by which the plow may be lifted by the power of the team through a break or friction clutch.

2. Where no mistake or inadvertence is shown, a reissue which includes additional elements in the combination claimed cannot be sustained.

3. The first claim of reissued letters patent No. 8986, a reissue of said letters patent No. 56812, is held to be invalid.

Argued Dec. 8, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. L. L. Coburn, for appellant.

The withdrawal of one ingredient in a patented combination, and the substitution of another which was well known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute, is a mere formal alteration of the combination, which does not constitute any defense to the charge of infringement.

A combination claim is infringed when all of the elements of the claim are used, either in the form shown in the patent, or in the form of old and well known mechanical equivalents, whether substituted in place of all or part of them.

Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. 553, 556 (78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 42); American Whip Co. v. Lombard, 4 Cliff. 505; Fuller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 288 (24 : 103); Water Meter Co. v. Desper, 101 U. S. 332 (25 : 1024).

The first claim of the reissue is within the scope of the claim of the original patent and is legally identical with it.

Gage v. Herring, 107 U. S. 640 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 601); Reed v. Chase, 25 Fed. Rep. 95.

Messrs. L. L. Bond and E. A. West, for appellees:

If the later combination is new, or one element thereof is new, it is not an infringement.

Gould v. Rees, 15 Wall. 187 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 39); Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall, 516 (78 U. S. 20: 33); Eames v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. 78 (68 U. S. 17: 547); Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. 336 (41 U. S. 10 : 985); Fuller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 288 (24: 103).

If the elements are not combined, connected and arranged in the same manner, there is no infringement.

Singer v. Walmsley, 1 Fish. 558; Brooks v. Fiske, 15 How. 212 (56 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 665).

By combining old parts, a patentee cannot prevent others from recombining them.

Hailes v. Van Wormer, 20 Wall. 371 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 249); Fuller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 288, 296 (24 : 103, 106).

Only the originator of a new art or an entire machine is entitled to a broad application of equivalents.

R. R. Co. v. Sayles, 97 U. S. 556 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1054); McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. 402 (15 : 930).

The reissue falls clearly within the rule stated in Miller v. Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 783).

Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354 (28 : 665); Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96 (29 : 350).

The reissue is void because obtained after appellants obtained their patents; intervening rights being involved.

Clements v. Odorless, etc. Co. 109 U. S. 641 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1060); Turner, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Dover Stamping Co. 111 U. S. 319 (28 : 442); Brown v. Davis, 116 U. S. 237 (29 : 659).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [374]

This is a suit in equity brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois by Robert Newton against the Furst and Bradley Manufacturing Company and others, to recover for the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 8986, granted to the plaintiff, December 2, 1879, on an application, filed October 15, 1879, for an improvement in gang-plows (the original patent, No. 56812, having been granted to F. S. Davenport as inventor, October 9, 1866).

The specification and claims of the original, and those of the reissue, and the drawings of the reissue, are as follows, the parts in each which are not found in the other being in italic:

Original.

"Be it known that I, F. S. Davenport, of Jerseyville, Jersey County, and State of Illinois, have invented a new and improved gang plow; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear, and exact description thereof, which will enable others skilled in the art to make and use the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, forming part of this specification, in which—

Reissue.

"Be it known that I, F. S. Davenport, of Jerseyville, Jersey County, and State of Illinois, have invented a new and improved wheel plow; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear, and exact description thereof, which will enable others skilled in the art to make and use the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, forming part of this specification.

The object of my invention is to provide improved means for utilizing the draft of the team in raising a plow from the ground; and to this end my invention consists, first, in the combination, with a swing axle and ground or carrying wheel, of friction clutch mechanism and means for engaging and disengaging the latter with the ground or carrying wheel, said parts being constructed and adapted to raise the plow by locking the swing axle to the carrying wheel by friction clutch engagement, and raise the plow beam by the draft or power of the team; second, in the combination, with a ground wheel, a swing axle, and a plow beam connected to the latter, of clutch mechanism connected to the axle and adapted by engagement with the wheel to utilize the draft of the team in turning the swing axle into upright position, and thereby raise the plow beam; third, in the combination, with a ground wheel, a swing axle, and a plow beam connected to the latter, of a friction clutch connected to the axle and adapted, by contact with the wheel, to turn the axle into upright position, and thereby raise the plow beam by the aid of the draft of the team.

of the same, partly in section as indicated by the line x x, figure 1; figure 3, a transverse vertical section of the same, taken in the line y y, figure 1. Similar letters of reference indicate like parts.

This machine consists of a frame, A, made of two parallel beams or bars, a a, braced together near the front and back pieces, b b. From each of these beams or bars depends a plow, B. To the front cross piece is bolted an iron standard, C, strengthened by an iron stay, D, running down to the back cross piece. To the top of the standard, C, is attached a spring seat, E, the whole supported upon two wheels, F F, each turning upon an iron axle, c, attached to a hinged board, G.

It will be observed that one of the axles, c, is attached to the front or upper side of the hinged board, G, and the other to the back or under side, in such a manner that when it is turned down in a horizontal position to lower the plows to the ground, the wheel that runs in the furrow will be as much lower than the other as the depth of the furrow may require. The axle that carries the wheel that runs in the furrow is so formed that it may be removed from the back of the hinged board and bolted to the front so that the machine may run level when there is no furrow for the wheel to run in, as is the case when preparing the ground for cotton seed.

The hinged board G is attached to the plow frame by two iron hinges, H H', the one H on the side of the long beam forming an arm or lever, I, to which is attached a chain, J, which passes over a wheel, K, and is made fast to the plow

This machine consists of a frame, A, made of two parallel beams or bars, a a, braced together near the front and back pieces, b b. From each of these beams or bars depends a plow, B. To the front cross piece is bolted an iron standard, C, strengthened by an iron stay, D, running down to the back cross piece. To the top of the standard, C, is attached a spring seat, E, the whole supported upon two wheels, F F, each turning upon a journal, c, of a swing axle, G.

It will be observed that one of the journals, c, is attached to the front or upper side of the swing axle, G, and the other to the back or under side, in such a manner that when it is turned down in a horizontal position to lower the plows to the ground, the wheel that runs in the furrow will be as much lower than the other as the depth of the furrow may require. The journal that carries the wheel that runs in the furrow is so formed that it may be removed from the back of the swing axle and be secured to the front, so that the machine may run level when there is no furrow for the wheel to run in, as is the case when preparing the ground for cotton seed.

The swing axle G is attached to the plow frame by two iron hinges, H H', the one H on the side of the long beam forming an arm or lever, I, to which is attached a chain, J, which passes over a wheel, K, and is made fast to the plow frame. The wheel K turns upon a stud in the end of a lever, L, this lever being bolted to the foot board M, which is hinged to the plow frame in the same manner and at the same place as the axle board G. To the opposite end of the foot board is bolted a bracket or stop, d, against which rests an arm, e, by which the hinged board G is operated, the arm e being held in the vertical position by a latch, N, which is lifted by placing the foot on the back part of it.

[379] Now, it will be seen that to lower the plows to the ground it is only necessary to bring down the arm e till a block, f, which is bolted to its side, rests upon a roller, g, of a lever, O, which is secured in the required position by a notched quadrant, N. It will be observed, that, as the lever O is moved forward from notch to notch, the plows will cut deeper and deeper, and the reverse as it is drawn back. By these details the driver has entire control of the depth of the furrow without moving from his seat or stopping the machine.

Through a mortise in the top of the arm e passes a small iron lever, P, to which is attached a rod, Q, connecting it with a brake, R, which acts upon one of the wheels F, the brake R working upon a pin fixed in a block of wood or an iron plate fastened to the front side of the hinged board G. The object of this brake is to facilitate the operation of lifting the plows out of the ground when the machine is moving forward; for, by applying but a little force to the lever P the brake is pressed sufficiently hard to the wheel to turn the hinged board to the vertical position.

[380] The draft pole or tongue C^{t} is fastened to the under side of the foot board M by two bolts, a^{t}, a number of holes being made, so that the tongue may be moved to the right or left to give the required land to the plows. The back holes b^{t} are made oblong, so that it can be slanted when needed. The tongue may, if necessary, be used on either side of the draft line, and the double tree attached to the foot board independent of the tongue. This arrangement is chiefly for the convenience of using three horses abreast.

When the hinged board G is turned down in the horizontal position the lever or arm I gives the chain J, which is attached to it, considerable slack, allowing the frame. The wheel K turns upon a stud in the end of a lever, L, this lever being bolted to the foot board M, which is hinged to the plow frame in the same manner and at the same place as the axle G. To the opposite end of the foot board is bolted a bracket or stop, d, against which rests an arm, e, by which the swing axle G is operated, the arm e being held in the vertical position by a latch, N, which is lifted by placing the foot on the back part of it.

Now, it will be seen that to lower the plow to the ground it is only necessary to bring down the arm e till a block, f, which is bolted to its side, rests upon a stop, g, of a lever, O, which is secured in the required position by a notched quadrant, N. It will be observed that, as the lever O is moved forward from notch to notch, the plows will cut deeper and deeper, and the reverse as it is drawn back. By these details the driver has entire control of the depth of the furrow without moving from his seat or stopping the machine.

Through a mortise in the top of arm e passes a small iron lever, P, to which is attached a rod, Q, connecting it with a brake, R, which acts upon one of the wheels F, the brake R working upon a pin fixed in a block of wood or an iron plate fastened to the front side of the swing axle G. The object of this brake is to facilitate the operation of lifting the plows out of the ground when the machine is moving forward, for by applying but a little force to the lever P the brake is pressed sufficiently hard to the wheel to turn the swing axle to the vertical position.

The draft pole or tongue C^{x} is fastened to the under side of the foot board M by two bolts, a^{x}, a number of holes being made, so that the tongue may be moved to the right or left to give the required land to the plows. The back holes b^{x} are made as oblong slots, so that the tongue can be slanted when needed. The tongue may, if necessary, be used on either side of the draft line, and the double tree attached to the foot board independent of the tongue. This arrangement is chiefly for the convenience of using three horses abreast.

When the swing axle G is turned down in the horizontal position the lever or arm I gives the chain J, which is attached to it, considerable slack, tongue to move up and down without influencing the plows, constituting what is commonly called 'a limber tongue.'

In regard to raising the plows out of the ground, it will be observed that the front part of the machine is lifted nearly two thirds of its course before the lever I tightens the chain and commences to lift the back part. This contrivance produces an easy motion, without causing either jerk or strain upon the horses or the machine.

The hind plow can be raised or lowered independent of the other, the standard B' sliding in an iron block, O^{t}, and operated by a lever, A^{t}, extending forward to the front of the seat, and secured in the required position by notches in the side of the seat standard, as shown in figure 3.

I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent:

1. The lever P, rod Q, and brake R, arranged and operated as and for the purpose described.

2. The hinged board G, in connection with the reversible axles, substantially as and for the purpose described.

3. The lever O and quadrant N, for regulating the depth of the furrow, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

4. Lifting the hind part of the machine by means of the lever or arm I, in connection with the chain J, wheel K, and lever L, these parts operating together, substantially as and for the purpose described.

5. Hinging the foot board M to the plow frame, as described.

6. Securing the tongue or draft pole to the foot board M, in the manner and for the purpose described.

7. The sliding plow standard B', guide block O^{t}, lever A^{t}, and notched seat standard C, when used together and in connection with the other parts.

8. Connecting the lever L with the tongue or draft pole by fastening it to the foot board, the whole operating together, substantially as and for the purpose set forth." allowing the tongue to move up and down without influencing the plows, constituting what is commonly called a 'limber tongue.'

In regard to raising the plows out of the ground, it will be observed that the front part of the machine is lifted nearly two thirds of its course before the lever I tightens the chain and commences to lift the back part. This contrivance produces an easy motion without causing either [381] jerk or strain upon the horses or the machine.

The hind plow can be raised or lowered independent of the other, the standard B' sliding in an iron block, O^{x}, and operated by a lever, A^{x}, extending forward to the front of the seat, and secured in the required position by notches in the side of the seat standard, as shown in figure 3.

Having fully described my invention, what I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent is:

1. In a wheel plow, the combination, with a swing axle and ground or carrying wheel, of friction-clutch mechanism, and means for engaging and disengaging the latter with the ground or carrying wheel, said parts being constructed and adapted to raise the plow beam by locking the swing axle to the carrying wheel by friction-clutch engagement, and raise the plow beam by the draft or power of the team, substantially as set forth.

2. In a wheel plow, the combination with a ground wheel, a swing axle, and a plow beam connected to the latter, of clutch mechanism connected to the axle, and adapted by engagement with the wheel to utilize [382] the draft of the team in turning the swing axle into upright position, and thereby raise the plow beam, substantially as set forth.

3. In a wheel plow, the combination, with a ground wheel, a swing axle, and a plow beam connected to the latter, of a friction clutch connected to the axle, and adapted, by contact with the wheel, to turn the axle into upright position, and thereby raise the plow beam by aid of the draft of the team, substantially as set forth."

The answer sets up, among other defenses, noninfringement; and that the reissued patent is invalid because not for the same invention as the original. On a hearing on proofs, the circuit court entered a decree, which finds that the equities are with the defendants, and that they do not infringe on the rights of the plaintiff, and dismisses the bill. The plaintiff has appealed to this court.

By the opinion of the circuit court in this case (11 Biss. 405), it appears that the defenses of noninfringement and of the invalidity of the reissue were sustained. Infringement is not asserted in this court as to any claim of the reissue but the first.

In regard to the subject matter of that claim, the specification of the reissue states that the invention consists "in the combination, with a swing axle and ground or carrying wheel, of friction-clutch mechanism, and means for engaging and disengaging the latter with the ground or carrying wheel, said parts being constructed and adapted to raise the plow by locking the swing axle to the carrying wheel by friction-clutch engagement, and raise the plow beam by the draft or power of the team." The first claim of the reissue uses the same language, [383] with the prefix of the words "In a wheel plow," and the addition, at the end, of the words "substantially as set forth."

The other alterations made in the specification are, that "gang plow" is changed into "wheel plow;" "iron axle" into "journal;" and "hinged board" into "swing axle."

The first claim of the original patent is for a combination of the lever P with the rod Q and the brake R. When force is applied to the lever P, motion is communicated through the rod Q to the brake R, which brake acts on the periphery of one of the two supporting or carrying wheels F, the axle of which, c, is attached to a hinged board G, and by the action of the brake the hinged board is changed from a horizontal position to a vertical position, and the effect is to facilitate the operation of lifting the plows out of the ground. The first claim of the original patent covers only the combination of the three specific devices—the lever P, the rod Q, and the brake R. The first claim of the reissue calls the brake R "friction-clutch mechanism," and calls the lever P and the rod Q "means for engaging and disengaging the latter with the ground or carrying wheel," and then claims the combination of four things—(1) friction-clutch mechanism; (2) means for engaging and disengaging it with the ground or carrying wheel; (3) a swing axle; (4) a ground or carrying wheel.

The hinged board G of the plaintiff's original patent is ten or twelve inches wide, and at each end of it is a spindle for one of the two ground or carrying wheels to run on, the spindles being in line with one edge of the hinged board. The forward ends of the plow beams are attached by joints to what is the back edge of the hinged board while that board is horizontal, so that when it comes to be vertical by the action of the brake and the forward movement of the team, the forward ends of the plow beams are raised in height a distance equal to the width of the hinged board, lifting the plows.

The defendants' machine is thus described in the opinion of the circuit court, and the description is conceded by the counsel for the plaintiff to be a fair one: "The defendants' machine is a wheel or sulky plow, with a bent [384] or cranked iron axle, upon which the plow-beams are pivoted at about two thirds of the distance from the forward end to the coulter, so that the plow is nearly balanced upon the axle or crank, and the arrangement of the mechanism is such that when the plow is running or operating in the ground, the crank part is in a horizontal position; and when it is desired to raise the plows out of the ground, the crank is turned upward towards a vertical position, whereby the forward ends of the beam are raised until the point of the plow runs out of the ground. After the forward end of the beam has risen to a certain point, it strikes a stop, so that, when the crank has assumed a vertical position, the plow is balanced across the crank part of the axle, thus sustaining the plow at the height above the ground of the crank when in a vertical position. This turning of the crank axle so as to lift the plow is accomplished by a friction band or brake, which is made to engage with an inner extension of the hub of one of the carrying wheels, so that, as the wheel moves forward, it causes the crank axle to turn upwards from a horizontal to a vertical position."

The circuit court was of opinion that if the state of the art was such as to entitle Davenport to a broad claim for any device by which the plow is lifted by the power of the team through a brake or friction clutch, the defendants' machine would infringe. But the court found that, prior to Davenport, devices had been used in agricultural implements for utilizing by means of a brake the motion of the carrying wheel, through a crank axle, in raising operative parts of the machine from the ground, which devices were so alike in structure and so analogous in use to those of Davenport, as to require his claims to be limited to his specific devices. In view of those prior devices the court held that the defendants' friction band could not be regarded as the same means for engaging and disengaging the carrying wheel and the axle as the brake of Davenport; and that the defendants' crank axle was not the plaintiff's hinged board. In these views we concur.

The reissue was applied for more than thirteen years after the original was granted, and after the defendants had begun to make machines of the pattern now complained of. [385] The original patent did not make a swing axle and a carrying wheel elements in the combination of the first claim of that patent. The reissue was evidently taken to cover the defendants' machine, which did not infringe the first claim of the original patent, because it did not have the Davenport brake R. No mistake or inadvertence is shown. The plaintiff, in his testimony as a witness, assigns as a reason for the reissue that he thought there "was a mistake and a deficiency in the patent;" that he did not consider that other manufacturers respected it; that he considered it deficient because it applied the friction brake to the periphery of the wheel; and that he believed the patent was entitled to cover different friction-clutch devices, so as to be a better protection against infringers.

Without pursuing the subject further, we are of opinion that, within numerous decisions of this court, the reissued patent is invalid, as respects its first claim.

Decree affirmed.

Jurisdiction—certificate of division of opinion—requisites of.

Under the Acts of Congress authorizing questions arising on a trial or hearing before two judges in the circuit court, and on which they are divided in opinion, to be certified to this court for decision, each question certified must be one of law purely, must be a distinct point or proposition, clearly stated, and not the whole case, and not the question whether upon the evidence the judgment should be for one party or the other.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Dismissed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

The original action was debt on section 5198 of the Revised Statutes, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, against a national banking association established within that district to recover twice the amount of interest, at the rate of 358] 9 per cent, received by the defendant upon the discount of certain promissory notes. Section 5197 prohibits any such association from receiving upon such a discount a higher rate of interest than is allowed by the laws of the State in which the bank is established, except that where by the laws of the State "a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws," the rate so limited is allowed. The answer denied that the defendant owed the sums demanded, or had violated any provision of the National Banking Act.

The record showed that at the trial certain oral testimony, therein stated, was offered by the plaintiffs in support of their allegations, was objected to by the defendant, the objection was overruled, and the defendant took exceptions. The record also showed that the defendant, for the purpose of proving that at the time of the discounts in question there were banks of issue, organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, allowed to receive interest on discounts at as high a rate as that received by the defendant, offered in evidence charters from the Legislature of Pennsylvania of a number of banks (the titles of which were given), some of which were thereby expressly authorized to receive interest at such rates as might be agreed upon by the parties; and also offered in evidence a number of other bank charters, in connection with evidence that some of the banks issued notes of circulation, commonly called bank notes, without special authorization of law, in order "to show that incorporated banks and banking companies in Pennsylvania issued notes of circulation, commonly called bank notes, under their respective general corporate powers, and not by virtue of any special authorization of law to issue such notes; and to show that incorporated banks and banking companies in Pennsylvania, not specially prohibited from issuing such notes, are banks of issue within the meaning of the Act of Congress, by virtue of their incorporation and organization as banks or banking companies, and without any special authorization of law to issue such notes;" and the evidence so offered by the defendant was objected to by the plaintiffs, and admitted subject to their exception.

The record further showed that a verdict was [359] returned for the plaintiffs, and that the circuit judge and the district judge signed a certificate that they were opposed in opinion upon the following questions arising at the trial:

"First. Whether under the evidence the defendant was legally authorized to take, receive, reserve and charge on the loans or discounts made for the plaintiffs upon the notes, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt, offered and received in evidence on the part of the plaintiffs, at the rate of interest charged by the defendant and paid by the plaintiffs, as shown in evidence; to wit, at the rate of 9 per centum per annum.

"Second. Whether under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania a rate of interest or discount was limited for banks of issue, organized under state laws, at a rate equal to or exceeding that charged by the defendant to the plaintiffs, and whether the defendant was, under the evidence and the Acts of Congress, allowed to take, receive, reserve and charge the rate so limited for the discounts made for the plaintiffs; to wit, at the rate of 9 per centum per annum.

"Third. Whether the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 'that there are no banks, nor have there been any such banks in Pennsylvania, authorized to take and receive interest at a greater rate than 6 per cent,' is binding and conclusive upon the judgment of the courts of the United States in determining the construction and effect in Pennsylvania of the Acts of Congress commonly called the Currency Acts, and especially sections 5197 and 5198 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

"Fourth. Whether upon the whole evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover."

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the sum of $2,150.88, and the defendant sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming, what does not appear in the record, that the evidence stated in the bills of exceptions was all the evidence introduced at the trial and referred to in the certificate of division, that certificate is clearly insufficient to support the jurisdiction of this court.

Under the Acts of Congress, authorizing questions arising on a trial or hearing before two judges in the circuit court, and upon which they are divided in opinion, to be certified to this court for decision, it has always been held that each question certified must be one of law, and not of fact, nor of mixed law and fact; and that it must be a distinct point or proposition, clearly stated, and not the whole case, nor the question whether upon the evidence the judgment should be for one party or for the other. Saunders v. Gould, 4 Pet. 392 [29 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 897]; U. S. v. Bailey, 9 Pet. 267 [9: 124]; Weeth v. New Eng. Mortgage Co. 106 U. S. 605 [27: 100]; Cal. etc. Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 609, 615–617 [28: 1106, 1108]; Waterville v. Van Slyke, 116 U. S. 699–704 [29: 772, 774].

Tested by these rules, the first and second questions certified, each being whether "under the evidence" the defendant was authorized to receive interest at a certain rate, as well as the fourth question, "whether upon the whole evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover," are not questions which this court is required or authorized to answer.

The third question is equally irregular and insufficient. Instead of being clearly and distinctly stated, it is quite obscure and ambiguous, for it does not show whether the supposed decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, "that there are no banks, nor have there been any such banks in Pennsylvania, authorized to take and receive interest at a greater rate than 6 per cent," was based upon matter of law, or matter of fact, or both. The latest reported decision of that court, to which the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error referred to explain this question, affirmed a ruling of a lower [361] court that, "in fact and in law, there is no bank of issue in Pennsylvania, authorized to charge a rate of interest in excess of the legal rate;" and said nothing upon the question whether there ever had been any such banks. Lebanon Nat. Bank v. Karmany, 98 Pa. 65, 73.

Neither the amount of the judgment below, nor the certificate of division, being sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, it necessarily follows, as was held in Weeth v. New Eng. Mortgage Co. and Waterville v. Van Slyke, above cited, that the Writ of error must be dismissed.

[388] JACOB JOHNSON AND JAMES B. CARTER, Owners of the Tug Boat PARKER, AND HENRY A. CHRISTY, Piffs. in Err.,

v.

CHICAGO AND PACIFIC ELEVATOR COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 388–401.)

Admiralty jurisdiction—tort must be consummated on navigable water, to confer—Illinois Statute, "Attachment of Water Craft"—liability of surety—denial of hearing to part owner—State may confer lien on vessels when.

1. The injury done by the jib boom of a schooner striking against an elevator situated on the bank of the Chicago River, through the negligent towing of such schooner, does not constitute a maritime tort of which a District Court of the United States as a court of admiralty would have jurisdiction.

2. The remedy for such wrong is wholly at common law and may be pursued in a state court according to the provisions of a state statute, although such statute gives a lien on the vessel.

3. The objection that judgment was entered against the surety on the bond on which the vessel was released, without any service of process or notice, was properly overruled,—the statute forming a part of the bond which he executed, and that statute providing for judgment against the surety in case the plaintiff should be found entitled to recover.

4. The objection by a party claiming to be part owner of the tug, and who filed a petition to be made a defendant, that he had been denied a hearing, was also properly overruled, the tug having been released from the lien on the filing of the bond.

Argued and submitted Nov. 30, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Henry W. Magee, for plaintiffs in error:

The "Attachment of Water Craft" Act is invalid in attempting to create and enforce a lien in rem against a vessel engaged in domestic commerce upon the navigable waters of the United States of America, above twenty tons burthen, duly enrolled and licensed. Exclusive jurisdiction for that purpose is in the District Court of the United States.

Sec. 2, art. III, Const. U. S.; subd. 8, § 563, Title XIII, Rev. Stat. U.S. "The Judiciary;" The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 451); The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411 (Id. 18 : 397); The Belfast, 7 Wall. 646 (74 U. S. 19: 272); The Eddy, 5 Wall. 481 (72 U. S. 18: 486); The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 567 (88 U. S. 22 : 657); Weston v. Morse, 40 Wis. 459; Re Josephine, 89 N. Y. 22, and cases cited in Bump's Federal Procedure, p. 70.

The Legislature had not the power to confer upon the circuit courts jurisdiction to enforce a lien on vessels duly enrolled and licensed by the United States, by proceedings in rem, according to the procedure of admiralty courts.

The rendition of a judgment against Henry A. Christy, surety on the attachment bond, without any suit, issue, trial, hearing, presence, or representation by attorney or otherwise, amounted to a deprivation of property without process of law.

Art. V, Amendments, Const. U. S.

The denial to James B. Carter, part owner, of the right to interplead and defend was a violation of that provision of the Constitution of the United States providing that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Art. V, Const. U. S.

The provisions of the Act entitled "Attachment of Water Craft" of the State of Illinois amount to a "regulation of commerce," which gives to the ports of Illinois a state admiralty proceeding, enforceable in its courts alone, and in violation of that provision in the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over that of another."

Subd. 6, § 8, art. 1, Const. U. S.

American admiralty has jurisdiction of all cases of "maritime liens."

Ben. Adm. § 261; Henry, Adm. 27.

Mr. Robert Rae, for defendant in error:

On the 22d of September, 1881, the Chicago and Pacific Elevator Company, an Illinois corporation, filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, setting forth that on the 29th of August, 1881, it was the proprietor of a warehouse on the land, in Cook County, near the bank of the Chicago River, which had stored in it a quantity of shelled corn; that on that day Jacob Johnson, a resident of Chicago, in said county, was the owner of the tug boat Parker, of above five tons burthen, used and intended to be used in navigating the waters and the canals of Illinois, and having its home port in Illinois; that The Parker on that day was towing a schooner, attached to her by a hawser, in the Chicago River, in said county, the schooner being under the control of the officers of the tug; and that the tug and the schooner were so negligently managed, and the schooner was so negligently towed by those having control of the tug that the jib boom of the schooner went through the wall of the warehouse, whereby a large quantity of the corn ran out and was lost in the river, causing a damage of $394.38 to the petitioner. The petition prayed for a writ of attachment against Johnson, to be issued to the sheriff, commanding him to attach the tug and to summon the defendant to appear; and for a decree subjecting the tug to a lien for such damages.

On the giving of the required bond on behalf of the petitioner, a writ of attachment was issued on the same day to the sheriff, commanding him to attach the tug and to summon Johnson to appear on the 17th of October. The return of the sheriff stated that he had attached all the right, title and interest of Johnson in and to the tug, and had served the writ on Johnson personally, on the same day.

A bond was given on the same day, executed by Johnson as owner of the tug, as principal, and Henry A. Cristy as surety, conditioned to pay all money which should be adjudged by the court in the suit to be due to the petitioner. Thereupon a writ was issued to the sheriff, commanding him to return the attached property to Johnson, which was done.

On the 17th of October, Johnson filed a paper called a "demurrer and exceptions," setting up, among other things, that the court had no jurisdiction to create or enforce a lien on the tug. On the 21st of October, the plaintiff entered a motion that the default of the defendant be taken for want of an affidavit of merits. On October 31, after the denial of a motion by the defendant for leave to file an affidavit of merits, the court entered of record the default of the defendant for the want of such an affidavit, and a judgment "that the plaintiff ought to recover of the defendant its damages by reason of the premises." At the same time the defendant entered a motion to vacate the default, insisting on the want of jurisdiction in the court.

On the same day, James B. Carter, alleging that he was, when the attachment was levied, and still continued to be, a part owner of the tug, filed a motion that he be made a defendant, and be permitted to defend against the petition.

On the 5th of November, the motion of Johnson to vacate the default against him was overruled; and the motion of Carter was denied. Thereupon Johnson filed a motion to dismiss the petition for want of jurisdiction in the court to enforce the lien claimed, because the tug was a steam vessel of above 20 tons burthen, duly enrolled and licensed in conformity to Title 50 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and was engaged in the business of domestic commerce and navigation on the navigable waters of the United States, and that exclusive jurisdiction to enforce a lien in rem on the tug was in the District Courts of the United States. This motion was denied.

Proper bills of exceptions were allowed to the foregoing rulings.

On the 30th of January, 1882, the damages were assessed by a jury at $300; and a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against Johnson and Christy, for $300 and costs, on the 11th of February, 1882. They excepted, and they and Carter appealed to the Appellate Court for the First District of Illinois. That court, in July, 1882, affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County, and an appeal was taken by the same parties to the Supreme Court of Illinois. Among the assignments of error in that court were these: That Carter was not allowed to defend; that the judgment was entered against Christy without notice or process; that the inferior courts had no jurisdiction to enforce the lien on a vessel engaged in domestic commerce between the States; that the Statute of Illinois violated the Constitution of the United States; and that the exclusive jurisdiction in the premises was in a court of the United States.

The statute under which the proceedings in this suit took place is chapter 12 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, entitled "Attachment of Water Craft," which went into effect July 1, 1874, Rev. Stat. Ill. 1881, p. 159. The Act (§ 1) gives a lien on all water craft of above five tons burthen, "used or intended to be used in navigating the waters or canals of this State, or used in trade and commerce between ports and places within this State, or having their home port in this State. * * * Fifth. For all damages arising from injuries done to persons or property by such water craft, whether the same are aboard said vessel or not, where the same shall have occurred through the negligence or misconduct of the owner, agent, master, or employé thereon." The following other sections of the Act are material:

"Sec. 4. The person claiming to have a lien under the provisions of this Act may file with the clerk of any court of record of competent jurisdiction, in the county where any such water craft may be found, a petition setting forth the nature of his claim, the amount due after allowing all payments and just offsets, the name of the water craft, and the name and residence of each owner known to the petitioner; and when any owner or his place of residence is not known to the petitioner he shall so state, and that he has made inquiry and is unable to ascertain the same; which petition shall be verified by affidavit of the petitioner or his agent or attorney. If the claim is upon an account or instrument in writing, a copy of the same shall be attached to the petition.

Sec. 5. The petitioner, or his agent or attorney, shall also file with such petition a bond, payable to the owner of the craft to be attached, or, if unknown, to the unknown owners thereof, in at least double the amount of the claim, with security to be approved by the clerk, conditioned that the petitioner shall prosecute his suit with effect, or, in case of failure therein, will pay all costs and damages which the owner or other person interested in such water craft may sustain in consequence of the wrongful suing out of such attachment, which bond may be sued by any owner or person interested, in the same manner as if it had been given to such a person by his proper name. Only such persons shall be required to join in such suit as have a joint interest; others may allege breaches and have assessment of damages, as in other cases of suits on penal bonds.

Sec. 6. Upon the filing of such petition and bond as aforesaid, the clerk shall issue a writ of attachment against the owners of such water craft, directed to the sheriff of this county, commanding him to attach such water craft, which writ shall be tested and returnable as other writs of attachments. Such owners may be designated by their reputed names, by surnames, and joint defendants by their separate or partnership names, or by such names, styles, or titles as they are usually known. If the name of any owner is unknown, he may be designated as unknown owner.

State of Illinois, } ss:
——County, }

The People of the State of Illinois, to the Sheriff of —— County, Greeting:

Whereas ——(name of the petitioner) hath complained that owners of the——(name of the vessel) are justly indebted to him in the [sum of] —— dollars (amount due), for which he claims a lien upon said vessel, and has given bond with security as required by law: We, therefore, command you that you attach the said —— (name of vessel) her tackle, apparel and furniture, to satisfy such demand and costs, and all such demands as shall be exhibited against such vessel according to law, and having attached the same you summon —— (here insert the names of owners of such vessel) owners of such vessel to be and appear before the —— Court of —— at its next term to be holden at the court house in said county, on the ——day of ——, then and there to answer what may be objected against them and the said——(name of vessel). And have you then and there this writ, with a return thereon in what manner you have executed the same.

Witness: —— clerk of —— Court, and the seal thereof, this —— day of ——, A. D. 18—.

——, Clerk.

Sec. 8. The sheriff or other officer to whom such writ shall be directed shall forthwith execute the same by reading the same to such defendants, and attaching the vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and shall keep the same until disposed of as hereinafter provided. Such sheriff or other officer shall also, on or before the return day in such writ, or at any time after the service thereof, upon the request of the petitioner, make a return to said court, stating therein particularly his doings in the premises, and shall make, subscribe and annex thereto a just and true inventory of all the property so attached.

Sec. 9. Whenever any such writ shall be issued and served, no other attachment shall issue against the said water craft, unless the first attachment is discharged, or the vessel is bonded.

Sec. 10. Upon return being made to such writ, unless the vessel has been bonded, as hereinafter provided, the clerk shall immediately cause notice to be given in the same manner as required in other cases of attachment. The notice shall contain, in addition to that required in other cases of attachment, a notice to all persons to intervene for their interests on a day certain, or that said claim will be heard ex parte.

Sec. 11. Any person having a lien upon or any interest in the water craft attached may intervene to protect such interest, by filing a petition as hereinbefore provided, entitled an intervening petition; and any person interested may be made a defendant at the request of himself, or any party to the suit, and may defend any petition by filing an answer as hereinafter provided, and giving security satisfactory to the court to pay any costs arising from such defense; and upon the filing of any intervening petition, a summons as hereinbefore provided shall issue; and if the same shall be returned not served, notice by publication may be given as aforesaid; and several intervening petitioners may be united with each other, or the original, in one notice.

Sec. 12. Any person intervening to enforce any lien or claims adverse to the owners of the craft attached shall, at the time of filing his petition, file with the clerk a bond as in the case of the original attachment.

Sec. 13. Intervening petitions may be filed at any time before the vessel is bonded, as provided in section fifteen (15); or, if the same is not so bonded, before order for distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the craft. And the same proceeding shall thereupon be had as in the case of claims filed before sale."

"Sec. 15. The owner, or his agent or attorney, or any other person interested in such water craft, desiring the return of the property attached, having first given notice to the petitioner, his agent or attorney, of his intention to bond the same, may, at any time before judgment, file with the clerk of the court in which the suit is pending, a bond to the parties having previously filed petitions against such craft, in a penalty at least double the aggregate of all sums alleged to be due the several petitioners, with security to be approved by the clerk, conditioned that the obligors will pay all moneys adjudged to be due such claimants, with costs of suit." [395]

"Sec. 17. Upon receiving a bond or deposit, as provided in either of the foregoing sections, it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue an order of restitution, directing the officer who attached the water craft to deliver the same to the person from whose possession the same was taken; and said water craft shall thenceforth be discharged from all the liens secured by bond or deposit, unless the court or judge thereof, upon motion, shall order the same again into custody on account of the insufficiency or insolvency of the surety."

"Sec. 21. If, upon the trial, judgment shall pass for the petitioner, and the water craft has been discharged from custody as herein provided, said judgment or decree shall be rendered against the principal and sureties in the bond; Provided, That in no case shall the judgment exceed the penalty of the bond, and the subsequent proceedings shall be the same as now provided by law in personal actions in the courts of record in this State. If the release has been upon deposit, the judgment shall be paid out of said deposit."

The Supreme Court of Illinois affirmed the judgment of the Appellate Court of the First District. Johnson v. Chic. & P. Elevator Co. 105 Ill. 462. To review the judgment of the supreme court, Johnson, Carter, and Christy have brought a writ of error.

[396] It is assigned here for error (1) that the state court had no jurisdiction to enforce a lien in rem on a vessel above 20 tons burthen, engaged in domestic commerce among the States, and duly enrolled and licensed in conformity with Title 50 of the Revised Statutes; (2) that the state statute is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, because it purports to give to a state court admiralty jurisdiction to en-

[397] force a maritime lien in rem; (3) that judgment was given against Christy without notice to him or due process of law; (4) that Carter, a part owner of the tug, was denied a hearing.

Under the decisions of this court in The Plymouth, 3 Wall. 20 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 125] and in Ex parte Phœnix Ins. Co. 118 U. S. 610 [ante, 274] at the present term, it must be held that the cause of action in this case was not a maritime tort of which a District Court of the United States, as a court of admiralty, would have jurisdiction; and that the remedy belonged wholly to a court of common law; the substance and consummation of the wrong having taken place on land, and not on navigable water, and the cause of action not having been complete on such water. This being so, no reason exists why the remedy for the wrong should not be pursued in the state court, according to the statutory method prescribed by the law of the State, even though that law gives a lien on the vessel. The cases in which state statutes have been held void by this court, to the extent in which they authorized suits in rem against vessels, because they gave to the state courts admiralty jurisdiction, were only cases where the causes of action were cognizable in the admiralty. Necessarily, no other cases could be embraced. The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411 [71 U. S. 18: 397]; The Hine v. Trevor, Id. 555 [Id. 18: 451]; The Belfast, 7 Id. 624 [19: 266].

In the present case, the suit is a suit in personam. The petition states that the plaintiff "complains of Jacob Johnson," "and makes him defendant herein;" and that the plaintiff has demanded the amount of his damage from the defendant, but the latter refuses to pay it. The petition prays that the tug may be attached and the defendant be summoned. The writ of attachment recites that the plaintiff has complained that Johnson is indebted to it in $394.38, for which it claims a lien on the tug. The writ commands the sheriff to attach the tug and to summon Johnson to appear before the court on a day named. Attachment was made of "all the right, title and interest" of Johnson in and to the tug, and at the same time the writ was served on him by being read to him. The releasing bond executed by Johnson and Christy recites the action as being one for damages alleged to be due to the plaintiff [398] from Johnson. From the time of the issuing of the writ of restitution, on the same day the petition was filed, the tug disappears from the proceedings, the bond having taken her place. The judgment was one in personam against Johnson and Christy, as required by section 21 of the statute, in a case where the attached vessel has been discharged from custody. That section also provides that the proceedings subsequent to the judgment "Shall be the same as now provided by law in personal actions in the courts of record in this State."

So far, therefore, as this suit is concerned, the action, in the shape in which it comes before this court, is a suit in personam, with an attachment as security, the attachment being based on a lien given by the state statute, and a bond having been, by the act of the defendant, substituted for the thing attached.

In Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583 [61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 1028], this court upheld the validity of the seizure of a vessel under a process of foreign attachment issuing from a state court of Pennsylvania, in pursuance of a statute of that State, as against a subsequent attempt to seize her under process in admiralty. In the course of the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell, it is said: "The process of foreign attachment has been for a long time in use in Pennsylvania, and its operation is well defined, by statute as well as judicial precedents. * * * The habit of courts of common law has been to deal with ships as personal property, subject in the main, like other personal property, to municipal authority, and liable to their remedial process of attachment and execution; and the titles to them, or contracts and torts relating to them, are cognizable in those courts."

The subsequent case of Leon v. Galceran, 11 Wall. 185 [78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 74], is very much like the one now before us. There, by a Statute of Louisiana, a mariner had a lien or privilege on his vessel for his wages, and he brought a suit in personam therefor in a court of the State, and had the vessel sequestered. She was released on a bond given by her owner, and by Leon as surety, for the return of the vessel on final judgment. Judgment being rendered against the owner in personam, and the vessel not being returned, the [399] mariner sued the surety, on the bond, in the same court, and had judgment for the amount fixed by the original judgment. On a writ of error from this court, sued out by Leon, it was urged for him, that, under the authority of The Moses Taylor, and The Hine v. Trevor, the state court had no jurisdiction to enforce the lien by a seizure before judgment. On the other side, it was urged that the suit was a common-law remedy, within the clause in section 9 of the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 77 (now embodied in section 711, subdivision 3, of the Revised Statutes) which, after granting to the District Courts of the United States "exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," saves "to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." This court held that the action in personam in the state court was a proper one, because it was a common-law remedy, which the common law was competent to give, although the state law gave a lien on the vessel in the case, similar to a lien under the maritime law, and it was made enforceable by a writ of sequestration in advance, to hold the vessel as a security to respond to a judgment, if recovered against her owner, as a defendant; that the suit was not a proceeding in rem, nor was the writ of sequestration; that the bond given on the release of the vessel became the substitute for her; that the common law is as competent as the admiralty to give a remedy in all cases where the suit is in personam against the owner of the property; and that these views were not inconsistent with any expressed in The Moses Taylor, in The Hine v. Trevor, or in The Belfast.

The case of Pennywit v. Eaton, 15 Wall. 382 [82 U. S. 21: 114], is a similar one.

There being no lien on the tug, by the maritime law, for the injury on land inflicted in this case, the State could create such a lien therefor as it deemed expedient, and could enact reasonable rules for its enforcement, not amounting to a regulation of commerce. Liens under state statutes, enforceable by attachment, in suits in personam, are of every-day occurrence, and may even extend to liens on vessels [400] when the proceedings to enforce them do not amount to admiralty proceedings in rem, or otherwise conflict with the Constitution of the United States. There is no more valid objection to the attachment proceeding to enforce the lien in a suit in personam, by holding the vessel by mesne process to be subjected to execution on the personal judgment when recovered, than there is in subjecting her to seizure on the execution. Both are incidents of a common-law remedy, which a court of common law is competent to give. This disposes of the objection that the vessel being engaged in commerce among the States, and enrolled and licensed therefor, no lien on her could be enforced by attachment in the state court. The proceeding to enforce the lien, in this case, was not such a regulation of commerce among the States as to be invalid, because an interference with the exclusive authority of Congress to regulate such commerce, any more than regulations by a State of the rates of wharfage for vessels, and of remedies to recover wharfage, not amounting to a duty of tonnage, are such an interference, because the vessels are engaged in interstate commerce. Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577, 582 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 417, 420]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559 [26: 1169]; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [27: 584].

Nor is the Act of Illinois, so far as this case is concerned, obnoxious to the objection that it is a regulation of commerce which gives preference to the ports of Illinois over those of another State, within the inhibition of subdivision 6 of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States. As was said in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 135 [24: 77, 87]: "This provision operates only as a limitation of the powers of Congress, and in no respect affects the States in the regulation of their domestic affairs." See, also, Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U. S. 455, 467 [ante, 287].

Whether proceedings under the Illinois Statute, different from those had in this case, may or may not be obnoxious to some of the objections raised, is a question which must be left to be determined when it properly arises.

As to the objection made by Christy to the judgment against him, the Supreme Court of Illinois overruled it on the ground that, as the bond was given with the statute existing, the [401] statute formed part of the bond; and the surety virtually consented that judgment might go against him on the bond, under section 21, if the plaintiff should be entitled to judgment against Johnson, citing Whitehurst v. Coleen, 53 Ill. 247, and Hennies v. People, 70 Ill. 100. This was a correct ruling. Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 535 [83 U. S. 21: 292]; Moore v. Huntington, 17 Wall. 417, 422 [84 U. S. 21: 642, 643].

As to the objection made by Carter, that he was denied a hearing, the Supreme Court of Illinois overruled it on the ground that, on the giving of the release bond, the tug was discharged from the lien unless ordered again into custody, and the subsequent judgment could only be against Johnson and Christy, in personam. This was a sound view.

Judgment affirmed.

BENJAMIN F. BUZARD AND MOSES HILLARD, Appts., v. ROBERT A. HOUSTON. [347]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 347-355.)

Equity jurisdiction—bill dismissed—adequate remedy at law.

1. It is the established doctrine of this court that "Whenever a court of law is competent to take cognizance of a right, and has power to proceed to a judgment which affords a plain, adequate and complete remedy, without the aid of a court of equity, the plaintiff must proceed at law, because the defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury." A suit in equity to enforce a legal right can therefore only be brought when the court can give more complete and effectual relief, in kind or in degree, on the equity side than on the common-law side.

2. A bill in equity, filed for the purpose of having annulled an assignment of a contract for the sale of cattle and for the reinstatement of a contract between the complainants and defendant, for which the assignment had been substituted, the bill alleging fraudulent representations by the defendant and praying for discovery, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Argued and submitted Nov. 2, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas. Reversed and dismissed.

[348] Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a bill in equity, filed November 28, 1881, by Buzard and Hillard, citizens of Missouri, against Houston, a citizen of Texas, the material allegations of which were as follows:

That the plaintiffs were partners in the business of pasturing and breeding cattle upon a tract of land owned by them in the State of Texas, and on October 14, 1881, negotiated a purchase from the defendants of fifteen hundred cows and fifty bulls, to be delivered at Lampasas in that State in May, 1882, at the price of $15.50 a head, one half payable upon the signing of the contract, and the other half upon delivery of the cattle; that the terms of their agreement were stated in a memorandum of that date, signed by the parties, and intended as the basis of a more formal contract to be afterwards executed; and that the plaintiffs at once paid to the defendant $500 in part performance.

That on October 31, 1881, the parties resumed negotiations, and met to complete the contract; that the defendant then proposed that, in lieu of the contract with him for the cattle mentioned in the memorandum, the plaintiffs should take from him an assignment of a similar contract in writing, dated August 18, 1881, and set forth in the bill, by which one Mosty agreed to deliver to the defendant an equal number of [349] similar cattle, at the same time and place, at the price of $14 a head.

That the defendant then stated that he had paid the sum of $15,000 on the contract with Mosty; and asked that in case of his assigning that contract to the plaintiffs, they should pay him that sum, and also the difference of $1.50 a head in the prices mentioned in the two contracts, but finally proposed to deduct from this twenty-five cents a head.

That, as an inducement to the plaintiffs to make the exchange of contracts, the defendant represented to them that Mosty was good and solvent, and able to perform his contract; that he was better than the defendant, and then had on his ranch twelve hundred head of the cattle; and that there was no doubt of the performance of this contract, because one McAnulty was a partner with Mosty in its performance—of all which the plaintiffs knew nothing, except that they knew that McAnulty was a man of wealth, and fully able as well as willing to perform his contracts.

That on November 1, 1881, the plaintiffs, believing and relying on the defendant's representations aforesaid, accepted his proposition, and paid the sum of $14,500, making, with the sum of $500 already paid, the amount of $15,000, which he alleged he had paid to Mosty on his contract; and executed and delivered to the defendant their obligation to pay him, on the performance by Mosty of that contract, an additional sum of $1,837.50, being the profit on the contract with Mosty in the sale to the plaintiffs, less the deduction of twenty-five cents a head; and returned to him his original contract with them, and in lieu thereof received from him his contract with Mosty and his assignment thereof to the plaintiffs, indorsed thereon, and set out in the bill, containing a provision that he should not be responsible in case of any failure of performance by Mosty.

That the aforesaid representations of the defendant were absolutely untrue, deceitful and fraudulent, and were known by the defendant to be false, and the plaintiffs did not know and had no means of knowing that they were untrue; that those representations were intended by the defendant to deceive the plaintiffs, and [350] did deceive them to their great injury; to wit, to the extent of the amount of $15,000 paid by them to him, and to the further extent of $10,000, for the expenses necessary to obtain other cattle, and for the loss of the increase of such cattle for the next year by reason of the impossibility of obtaining them in the exhausted condition of the market; and that Mosty at the time of the assignment was absolutely insolvent and had no property subject to be taken by his creditors, and his contract was utterly worthless, as the defendant then knew.

The bill then stated that the plaintiffs brought into court the contract between the defendant and Mosty, that it might be delivered up to the defendant; and also the assignment thereof by the defendant to the plaintiffs, that it might be canceled.

The bill prayed for a discovery; for a rescission and cancellation of the assignment of the contract with Mosty, and also of the plaintiffs' obligation to pay to the defendant the sum of $1,837.50; for the repayment to the plaintiffs of the excess of money received by the defendant from them beyond the amount which they were to pay him under the original contract; for a reinstatement and confirmation of that contract, and its enforcement upon such terms as the court might deem just and proper; or, if that could not be done, that the defendant be compelled to restore to the plaintiffs the sums of $500 and $14,500 received from them, and also to pay them the sum of $10,000 for damages which they had sustained by reason of the defendant's fraudulently obtaining the surrender of the original contract, and by reason of the other injuries resulting to them therefrom; and for further relief.

The defendant demurred to the bill, assigning as a cause of demurrer that the bill showed that the plaintiffs' only cause of action, if any, was for the sums of money paid by them on the contract, and for damages for breach of the contract for which they had an adequate and complete remedy at law. The circuit court overruled the demurrer.

The defendant then answered fully under oath, denying that he made any of the representations alleged, and repeating the defense taken by demurrer; the plaintiffs filed a gen- [351] eral replication; conflicting testimony was taken; at a hearing upon pleadings and proofs, the bill was dismissed with costs, and the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. H. E. Barnard, for appellants:

This cause was instituted for the purpose of canceling one contract and reinstating another, and readjusting certain payments, on the ground of fraud and misrepresentations; and the demurrer interposed by defendant to the jurisdiction of this court is unfounded.

The chancery rule in England is settled that equity has an undoubted jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud and misrepresentation.

Atk. 301, 1 Eng. Lead. Cas. 773, 4th Am. ed.

The same rule governs in the national courts of the United States whenever there is not a plain and adequate legal remedy at law to relieve against the same fraud or misrepresentations.

See note to section 875, Pomeroy, Eq. Jur.

An examination of the following cases will convince the mind that defendant's demurrer is not well taken.

Equity will relieve against fraud, although perhaps the party perpetrating the fraud, keeping within the limits of the strict law, so as to be sustained by the law courts, had committed some unconscientious act or breach of good faith and had thereby obtained an undue advantage over another, which advantage even though legal equity would not suffer him to retain.

At law it is a necessary part of this conception that the act or omission itself, by which the undue advantage is obtained, should be willful, in other words, should be knowingly and intentionally done by the party; but it is not essential in equity that there should be a knowledge of, and an intention to obtain, the undue advantage which results.

2 Pom., Eq. Jur. § 873.

Mr. James F. Miller, for appellee:

The complainants in this case have a remedy at law, if any at all, in an action on the case in the nature of deceit; and should not seek a rescission of the contract in a court of equity.

The sixteenth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. at L. p. 82, provides: "That suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law."

The bill here is based solely upon the allegations that the complainants were induced to take an assignment of the Mosty contract by the false, deceitful and fraudulent representations of defendant. It alleges that the representations were not only false in fact, but were known to be false by the defendant when he made them. Consequently it makes a case of actual fraud; that is, fraud arising from circumstances of imposition.

Boyce's Exrs. v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210 (28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 655); Parker v. Cotton Co. 2 Black, 545 (67 U. S. 17: 813).

In the practical administration of their equitable powers, the national judiciary have constantly affirmed and steadily adhered to the doctrine in its negative form, that the equitable jurisdiction does not exist, and will not be exercised in any case or under any circumstances, where there is a certain, adequate and complete remedy at law.

If the fraudulent allegations are true, the bill makes a clear case for an action for deceit; and the judgment in such an action would be as fully adequate as can be the remedy by decree here.

A familiar illustration of the right to bring a common-law action for fraudulent representation, as furnished by text writers, is an action brought for falsely representing a third party to be solvent, and thereby inducing the plaintiff to part with his money.

Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 92; Bispham, Eq. p. 253. See Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190 (29: 132).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

In the Judiciary Act of 1789, by which the first Congress established the judicial courts of the United States and defined their jurisdiction, it is enacted that "Suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law." Act of Sep. 24, 1789, chap. 20, § 16, 1 Stat. at L. 82; Rev. Stat. § 723. Five days later, on September 29, 1789, the same Congress proposed to the Legislatures of the several States the article afterwards ratified as the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution, which declares that "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." 1 Stat. at L. 21, 98.

The effect of the provision of the Judiciary Act, as often stated by this court, is that "Whenever a court of law is competent to take cognizance of a right, and has power to proceed to a judgment which affords a plain, adequate and complete remedy, without the aid of a court of equity, the plaintiff must proceed at law, because the defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury." Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. 271, 278 [60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 633, 635]; Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 621 [80 U. S. 20: 501, 503]: Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373, 375 [82 U. S. 21: 174, 175]; Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, 470 [90 U. S. 23: 70, 71]; Root v. Railway Co. 105 U. S. 189, 212 [26: 975, 983]; Killian v. Ebbinghaus, 110 U. S. 568, 573 [28: 246, 248]. In a very recent case th court said: "This enactment certainly means something; and if only declaratory of what was always the law, it must, at least, have been intended to emphasize the rule, and to impress it upon the attention of the courts." N. Y. Guaranty Co. v. Memphis Water Co. 107 U. S. 205, 214 [27: 484, 487]. [353]

Accordingly, a suit in equity to enforce a legal right can be brought only when the court can give more complete and effectual relief, in kind or in degree, on the equity side than on the common-law side; as, for instance, by compelling a specific performance, or the removal of a cloud on the title to real estate; or preventing an injury for which damages are not recoverable at law, as in Watson v. Sutherland, 5 Wall. 74 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 580]; or where an agreement procured by fraud, is of a continuing nature, and its rescission will prevent a multiplicity of suits, as in Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 215 [28 U. S. 7: 655, 657], and in Jones v. Bolles, 9 Wall. 364, 369 [76 U. S. 19: 784, 786].

In cases of fraud or mistake, as under any other head of chancery jurisdiction, a court of the United States will not sustain a bill in equity to obtain only a decree for the payment of money by way of damages, when the like amount can be recovered at law in an action sounding in tort or for money had and received. Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 500 [27: 238, 243]; Ambler v. Choteau, 107 U. S. 586 [27: 822]; Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190 [29: 132].

In England, indeed, the court of chancery, in cases of fraud, has sometimes maintained bills in equity to recover the same damages which might be recovered in an action for money had and received. But the reason for this, as clearly brought out by Lords Justices Knight, Bruce and Turner in Slim v. Croucher, 1 D. F. & J. 518, 527, 528, was that such cases were within the ancient and original jurisdiction in chancery, before any court of law had acquired jurisdiction of them, and that the assumption of jurisdiction by the courts of law, by gradually extending their powers, did not displace the earlier jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Upon any other ground, such bills could not be maintained. Clifford v. Brooke, 13 Ves. 131; Thompson v. Barclay, 9 Law Jour. Ch. 215, 218. And we have not been referred to any instance in which an English court of equity has maintained a bill in such a case as that now before us. In Newham v. May, 18 Price, 749, [353] Chief Baron Alexander said: "It is not in every case of fraud that relief is to be administered by a court of equity. In the case, for instance, of a fraudulent warranty on the sale of a horse, or any fraud upon the sale of a chattel, no one, I apprehend, ever thought of filing a bill in equity."

The present bill states a case for which an action of deceit could be maintained at law, and would afford full, adequate and complete remedy. The original agreement for the sale of a number of cattle, and not of any cattle in particular, does not belong to the class of contracts of which equity would decree specific performance. If the plaintiffs should be ordered to be reinstated in all their rights under that agreement, and permitted now to tender performance thereof on their part, the only relief which they could have in this suit would be a decree for damages to be assessed by the same rules as in an action at law. The similar contract with Mosty and the assignment thereof to the plaintiffs are in the plaintiff's own possession, and no judicial rescission of the assignment is needed. If the exchange of the contracts was procured by the fraud alleged, it would be no more binding upon the plaintiffs at law than in equity; and in an action of deceit the plaintiffs might treat the assignment of the contract with Mosty as void, and, upon delivering up that contract to the defendant, recover full damages for the nonperformance of the original agreement. No relief is sought against Mosty, and he is not made a party to the bill. The obligation executed by the plaintiffs to the defendant is not negotiable, so that there is no need of an injunction. A judgment for pecuniary damages would adjust and determine all the rights of the parties, and is the only redress to which the plaintiffs, if they prove their allegations, are entitled. There is therefore no ground upon which the bill can be maintained. Insurance Co. v. Bailey, [supra], and other cases above cited.

The comparative weight due to conflicting testimony, such as was introduced in this case, can be much better determined by seeing and hearing the witnesses than upon written depositions or a printed record.

This case does not require us to enter upon a [354] consideration of the question, under what circumstances a bill showing no ground for equitable relief, and praying for discovery as incidental only to the relief sought, is open to a demurrer to the whole bill, or may, if discovery is obtained, be retained for the purposes of granting full relief, within the rule often stated in the books, but as to the proper limits of which the authorities are conflicting. It is enough to say that the case clearly falls within the statement of Chief Justice Marshall: "But this rule cannot be abused by being employed as a mere pretext for bringing causes, proper for a court of law, into a court of equity. If the answer of the defendant discloses nothing, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession, unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules, limiting the jurisdiction of courts, require that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law." Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69, 89 [11 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 271, 279]. See also Horsburg v. Baker, 1 Pet. 232, 236 [26 U. S. 7: 125, 127]; Brown v. Swann, 10 Pet. 497, 503 [35 U. S. 9: 508, 511].

The decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill generally might be considered a bar to an action at law, and it is therefore, in accordance with the precedents in Rogers v. Durant, 106 U. S. 644 [27: 303] and the cases there cited, Ordered that the decree be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction, and without prejudice to an action at law.

Mr. Justice Bradley, dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment in this case so far as it directs the bill to be dismissed by the court below for want of equitable jurisdiction. The complainant had been induced to give up a contract for cattle made to him by the defendant, and to accept in lieu of it an assignment from the defendant of a contract which he had from a third person who was insolvent, and whose insolvency was not known by the complainant, but was known by the defendant, though he asserted that the third person was entirely responsible. The bill seeks to abrogate and set aside the assignment and to restore to [355] complainant his original contract, on account of the fraud and misrepresentation practiced upon him. Having been induced to pay $15,000 in the transaction, and suffered a large amount of damages, he adds to the relief sought a prayer to have his damages assessed and decreed. This is the case made by the bill. I think it is clearly within the scope of equity jurisdiction, both on account of the fraud, and from the nature of the relief asked by the complainant; namely, the cancellation of an agreement, and the reinstatement of a contract which he had been fraudulently induced to cancel. If the bill had prayed nothing else, it seems to me clear that it would have presented a case for equity. A court of law could not give adequate relief. The existence of the assignment and the cancellation of the first agreement would embarrass the plaintiff in an action at law. It is different from the case of a lost note or bond. Fraud is charged, and documents exist which in equity ought not to exist. I think the complainant is entitled to have the fraudulent transaction wiped out, and to be restored to his original status.

NORTHAMPTON NATIONAL BANK.

Evidence to charge bank for securities stolen while on deposit—national bank may receive special deposits.

1. In an action against the Northampton National Bank by a special depositor to recover the value of securities stolen while deposited with the Bank, the action being based, (1) on the alleged negligence of the defendant in the original loss of the bonds; and (2) on the alleged negligence of the defendant in the execution of a supposed contract looking to their recovery; held, the first ground of the action being abandoned, (a) that there was no sufficient evidence to show the alleged contract between the plaintiff and the defendant under which the defendant was to act for the plaintiff in the negotiations for the recovery of the bonds; and (b) that there was no evidence to show lack of diligence on the part of the defendant in its efforts to recover the stolen property.

2. There being no evidence to charge the defendant the jury was properly instructed to return a verdict for defendant.

Argued Nov. 24, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. George H. Adams, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. G. Peckham and Eliphalet Williams Tyler, for defendant in error:

Hinckley's position, his knowledge and his action, was similar to that of the man mentioned in the following citation (Atlantic State Bank v. Savery, 82 N. Y. 307): "If the knowledge of a director is acquired in his official capacity the bank is presumed to have it; but if it is acquired as any private person might acquire it the bank is not chargeable. Leonard comes within the latter condition. The information which he had was not committed to him as a director, nor did he acquire it while engaged in its business. It did not belong to the plaintiff, and there can be no presumption that it was communicated to it. In behalf of the bank he did not act concerning the note or its purchase."

Alleghany C. W. v. Moore, 95 Pa. 408; E. Ang. R. R. Co. v. Eastern Co. R. Co. 21 L. J. N. S. C. P. 23; Chem. Bank v. Kohner, 8 Daly, 532; Ang. and Ames. Corp. § 309; Bright v. M. C. Asso. 33 La. Ann. 56.

While the later decisions make a bank liable for many acts of the cashier or president, or other executive officials, yet the rule is still to some extent observed that the acts should be within the scope of the general and customary authority of such officers. And it has not been held that a mere director has such executive power or such capacity to bind a bank, whether inside or outside of the bank's usual business. Directors usually have no function to perform for the bank, except to meet as a board, and as a board to ratify or disaffirm acts or propositions of the executive officials.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action at law originally commenced by the plaintiff in error in the Superior Court of the City of New York, and removed by the defendant into the circuit court. The complaint alleged that, on the 26th day of January, 1876, the plaintiff was the owner of eight first-mortgage bonds of the Pacific Railroad Company of Missouri, for $1,000 each, with coupons attached, which at that time were in the custody of the defendant for safe keeping under an agreement by which the defendant agreed to keep the same safely and deliver them to her upon demand, but that on that day the defendant's Bank was broken into by burglars and a large amount of property taken by them therefrom, amounting in value to over $1,600,000, consisting chiefly of bonds, stocks, and other similar securities, with some money, the property in part of the Bank and of others, and including the plaintiff's bonds and coupons; and it is averred that the said loss by robbery occurred in consequence of a want of due care on the part of the defendant. [362]

It is further alleged by the plaintiff that shortly after the said loss, "the plaintiff was intending and was about to enter in good faith upon negotiations and to take measures for the recovery of her said bonds and coupons from whomsoever then possessed the same; that thereafter, and about the time last mentioned, the defendant represented to the plaintiff that the defendant was about to take measures for the recovery of the property so taken, and expected to recover all of said property in bulk, or the greater part thereof, from the persons taking the same as aforesaid, by means of rewards and other measures, and was undertaking, or about to undertake, negotiations with said person or persons, to the plaintiff unknown, for accomplishing the same; and the defendant then further represented that it expected to receive such restoration if it was allowed to act therein in behalf of the plaintiff and in behalf of other depositors and losers who were in the same position as the plaintiff; and the defendant further represented that it, the said defendant, was in a better position to negotiate for the restoration of said property as aforesaid, and could accomplish the same at less expense, than if the plaintiff and other individuals, owners and losers of said property, were to act in that respect independently. [363]

"That thereupon, and at or about the time last stated, the defendant requested the plaintiff to permit and authorize the defendant to act for her and in her behalf in the respects mentioned, and in such negotiations, for the recovery of her said bonds and coupons, with the bonds, stocks, securities, and other property of the defendant and other owners and losers of property as aforesaid; and further requested the plaintiff not to undertake negotiations with, or offer rewards or other inducements, to the persons who had taken or were in possession of said bonds or other property as aforesaid, for the return of the same.

"That thereupon, and relying upon such representations and all of them, the plaintiff complied with such requests of defendant, and did not undertake negotiations with or offer rewards or other inducements to such persons as aforesaid for the return of her said bonds and coupons, and permitted and authorized the defendant to act for her and in her behalf in the respects mentioned, and as requested in such and any negotiations for the recovery of her said bonds and coupons, with the bonds, stocks, securities, and other property of the defendant and other owners and losers of said property as aforesaid.

[364] "That thereupon the said defendant undertook to act in behalf of the plaintiff in the respects mentioned, and took certain proceedings and entered into certain negotiations with the persons who had taken said property or possessed the same as aforesaid, for the recovery of the same; that some time during the years 1879 and 1880, the defendant, acting as aforesaid, recovered and received from said persons the greater part of said stolen property, taken, as aforesaid, on the 26th day of January, 1876, including a large amount of the separate property of the defendant, amounting in all, in face or par value, to about $1,500,000; and thereupon the defendant settled and compounded with said persons for all claims arising or growing out of such taking or robbery as aforesaid.

"That the difference between the amount of property so recovered and the amount of property taken or stolen on January 26, 1876, as aforesaid, and all the property so taken and not recovered, was by the defendant allowed and agreed to be retained by and released to the said persons as a consideration or reward for the restoration of the remainder as aforesaid. That among the securities and property so allowed and agreed to be retained and so released by the defendant were the eight bonds of the plaintiff and all the coupons thereto belonging. That the plaintiff was not informed at the time, by the defendant, of the terms of said agreement or arrangement between the defendant and said persons, but all the proceedings of the defendant in those respects and for the restoration of such property were concealed from the plaintiff, and she has never consented to the action of the defendant therein.

"That by means of plaintiff's said property, together with other considerations, and by the total sacrifice of the plaintiff's said property, the defendant was enabled to recover, and did recover as aforesaid, a large amount of its own property and the property of its other depositors, and has reimbursed itself for the greater part of its losses in said robbery and for the expenses which the defendant incurred in respect to the matters herein mentioned.

"That the defendant, not regarding its promises and undertakings, did not take due care of the plaintiff's interest as aforesaid, but, on the contrary, sacrificed the same for its own advantage, and so negligently and carelessly conducted itself with respect to the plaintiff's said property and interest, and took so little care thereof, that, by and through the mere neglect and improper conduct of the defendant and its servants, and by the willful neglect of plaintiff's said interests, so committed to its charge, the plaintiff has wholly lost her said property," for the value of which she accordingly asks judgment. [365]

To this the defendant answered, admitting that securities to the amount in par value of about $1,600,000, belonging in part to the defendant and partly to its officers and other persons, were stolen from its vaults by armed burglars in January, 1876, and that among said securities were the bonds claimed by the plaintiff as plaintiff's property. The answer alleges that the bonds of the plaintiff, prior to the burglary, were held by the defendant in its vaults as a favor to the plaintiff, by permission of one of the defendant's officers, without the consent or agreement of the defendant, and were not on deposit with the defendant for any reward or consideration to the defendant, but were left on the special agreement made with the plaintiff, that the bonds should remain at the risk of the plaintiff, and the defendant should in no case be responsible therefor; and alleges that it had no corporate power to make any contract or agreement, either with reference to the safe keeping of the said bonds, or any such contract as that alleged in the complaint for their recovery, and that no such contract was in fact ever made, all the allegations of the complaint in that respect being denied. The answer further alleges that the defendant, "while having no duty or obligation to the plaintiff in the premises, nevertheless did use good faith and due care in all the transactions mentioned in the complaint, and the defendant committed no breach of trust, and was guilty of no breach of trust, fraud, carelessness or negligence whatever in any or all of said matters; but, on the contrary, defendant alleges that, at its own expense, defendant enabled plaintiff to recover four of the eight bonds, for the value of which plaintiff here sues defendant;" and that the plaintiff's failure to recover back the remaining four of the eight bonds was caused solely by the carelessness and negligence of the agents employed by the plaintiff and not by the defendant. [366]

By a pleading subsequently filed, and called a replication, the plaintiff admitted that since the commencement of the action she had recovered four of the bonds mentioned in the complaint by means of an action of replevin against one Henry G. Pearson, then the postmaster of the City of New York, and reduced her claim accordingly.

The cause came on for trial by a jury, and the plaintiff, having introduced evidence to maintain the issues on her part, rested her case, when, on a motion of the defendant, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which was done. Judgment was rendered thereon in favor of the defendant, to reverse which this writ of error is now prosecuted.

The question of law for our determination is whether there was sufficient evidence in support of the plaintiff's cause of action to require its submission to the jury.

The evidence offered by the plaintiff on the trial of the cause tended to prove the following facts:

The burglary occurred in January, 1876. Efforts were immediately made by the Bank to recover the lost property; and, about three weeks after the burglary, the officers and directors of the Bank caused a meeting to be held at the bank, of some of the losers, including depositors for safe keeping. Plaintiff did not attend this meeting, and it does not appear that she was represented there. At that meeting directors and officers of the Bank were present, and it was proposed to form a committee composed of bank officers and depositors to take measures to recover the stolen property. This was assented to by the Bank's officers, but was voted down, and the matter left as before, to the efforts of the Bank.

In 1877 the plaintiff in error married Dr. Wylie, of New York, who thereafter acted for her in the matter. In the same year Dr. Wylie was informed, through a patient, that he could [367] deal with Scott, one of the burglars, for the recovery of Mrs. Wylie's bonds. He did not at once act upon this, because he understood the Bank was acting for his wife. Shortly thereafter, Dr. Wylie stated this proposition to Warrener, the vice-president and manager of the Bank, and that he thought he could get back his wife's bonds. Warrener then requested Wylie not to negotiate independently of the Bank, and stated that the Bank was negotiating to get the securities back. To this request Wylie acceded.

On February 9, 1878, Wylie received from Hinckley, one of the prominent directors of the Bank, a letter representing that he was acting for the Bank, and inclosing the following paper, which he requested the plaintiff to sign:

"We, whose names follow, having suffered the loss of securities by the robbery of the Northampton National Bank in January, 1876, hereby agree to pay a pro rata proportion of the expenses incurred in obtaining them and returning them to us."

Hinckley wrote again, February 27, 1878, as he says, at the request of Warrener and Edwards, the president, urging Mrs. Wylie to sign the paper, and saying that they thought the property could be recovered "cheaper in bulk than in detail," and that they had "strong hopes of being able to effect a negotiation at no distant day, and would like to make one clean job of it." Thereupon, on March 21, 1878, Mrs. Wylie and her husband signed the paper as requested, and returned it to the Bank.

In October, 1877, Edwards, the president of the Bank, was notified by persons acting in behalf of Scott and Dunlap, two of the burglars then under sentence, that $100,000 of the best bonds had been put aside and money borrowed on them, and that the whole lot could be had for $8,000; whereupon efforts were made to effect this recovery. To the knowledge of Edwards and the vice president, Warrener, and upon consultation with them, Hinckley was allowed, however, to separately negotiate, through the same channel, for the return of $25,000 Union Pacific Railroad bonds, which were known to belong to him, on payment of $6,000. These $25,000 of bonds were a part [368] of the $100,000 lot, and upon delivery were locked up, and the transaction concealed until June, 1878. After the $6,000 was paid, the difficulties of negotiation increased, the persons holding the balance of $75,000 making exorbitant demands. While further negotiations for the $75,000 were proceeding, Hinckley, though acting as an officer of the Bank for all parties concerned, and acting with Edwards and Warrener, again attempted to make his private bargain for $19,000 more of Union Pacific bonds supposed to be in the same lot. The return of the $19,000 was offered upon payment of $10,000 to the parties holding them; which offer was refused, the price being considered too exorbitant. Further attempts were made to secure the return of the remaining $75,000, but the holders of the securities refused all offers made for their return, and the whole $75,000 were sent to Europe and negotiated or otherwise lost. On this subject, Hinckley wrote to Dr. Wylie on May 10, 1879: "This I do know, that * * * no part of the $75,000 left the country until some time in 1878, after I refused to pay $10,000 for the balance, $19,000, of my U. P.'s. It was my refusing to pay that sent them abroad. If I had accepted the offer, I have no doubt we could have got the whole $75,000 at 50 per cent of the market value." Hinckley also wrote to Dr. Wylie: "The offer was a specific one for $25,000 U. P. S. F. bonds. It came from the thieves, not from me, or anyone in my interest. If the offer had been to return the Missouri Pacifics, you would have been notified, and not I. Every effort was made to induce the holders to name a price at which they would return the $100,000, but to no purpose, although I have good reason to believe that if I had accepted the second offer of 50 per cent of the market value, something might have been done."

In January, 1879, Dr. Wylie notified various bankers abroad of the theft of the bonds, and subsequently certain of the coupons from said bonds were presented for payment, of which the plaintiff was notified by the railroad company, and she replevied and recovered the same. It was then ascertained for the first time, in June, 1879, that the Bank had not sent particulars of the robbery abroad further than that the robbery had occurred, and such a list of [369] bonds stolen, but the numbers of the bonds were not given; some circulars giving the numbers of the bonds and a general cable was sent to London, but no circulars were sent to Frankfort or elsewhere on the Continent.

In 1876 and 1877 indictments were found in Massachusetts against Scott and Dunlap, and also against Leary, Conners, and Draper, for this burglary. Scott and Dunlap were tried and convicted at Northampton; the others had not then been caught. Afterwards Draper was arrested and taken to Northampton, and remained there in jail untried about two and one half years, shortly before the expiration of which time, in 1880, Conners and Leary were arrested and taken to Northampton jail. Negotiations were conducted between the Bank and Scott and Dunlap, then in state prison, and influence brought to bear upon them for the return of the property, and they finally stated to one of the directors that Leary had control of it. After Leary was arrested, Scott and Dunlap wrote a letter to him, which resulted in the greater portion of the property being recovered soon after Conners was taken to Northampton. Hinckley and Warrener went to New York to a safe deposit company there and brought it away. A little before or after this final recovery, Conners, Leary and Draper were all discharged at Northampton without trials. The amount of property stolen was recovered, except about $12,000 cash and $70,000 to $80,000 par value of bonds and securities. The bulk of the negotiable coupon bonds were recovered; also all non-negotiable bonds, and all negotiable securities except about $80,000.

Hinckley testified that a final recovery was not made by or through him, and not by or through the means mentioned in the 1878 and 1879 letters to Wylie. Everything was futile until the final recovery. The Bank or its officers did not agree that the plaintiff's bonds should be retained and released to the thieves, or any other person, as compensation for the restoration of the remainder. Of the coupons attached to the plaintiff's stolen bonds maturing prior to the commencement of this action, [370] twenty-eight have never been recovered. These coupons were each for $80.

The value of the plaintiff's bonds on January 31, 1882, was $1,080 for each bond, with unmatured coupons only attached. Of the plaintiff's bonds so stolen four have never been recovered by her.

The complaint in this case may be considered as embracing two distinct causes of action: the first, founded on the alleged negligence of the defendant in the original loss of the bonds, and the second, on negligence alleged to have occurred in the execution of the agreement for their recovery. It was decided in the case of the National Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 750] that it would "be competent for a national bank to receive a special deposit of such securities as those here in question, either on a contract of hiring or without reward; and it would be liable for a greater or less degree of negligence accordingly." In the present case it is conceded that there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the Bank resulting in the original loss by robbery, except the mere fact of the loss itself by that means. The plaintiff's case, therefore, upon this cause of action is without proof.

As to the second cause of action, the facts stated in the complaint seem to us to be sufficient if proven to constitute a legal liability on the part of the defendant. It would certainly be competent for a national bank to take measures for the recovery of its own property lost in the way described. If the loss, as in the present case, included the property of others, and it was deemed best, having reference to the bank's own interest, that these measures should be taken by the bank alone for itself and all concerned, it might lawfully undertake to act for others thus jointly concerned with itself as well as for itself alone; and want of proper diligence, skill and care in the performance of such an undertaking would be ground of liability to respond in damages for such failure. Much more would the bank be liable, in such a case, if, in the performance of such an undertaking it used the property of the plaintiff for the recovery of its own. This, it is alleged in the complaint in this case, the defendant did. There is a total want of evidence to this effect, [371] and that ground of complaint was very properly abandoned.

The plaintiff therefore, must stand upon the remaining allegations, which may be reduced to two: (1) that the Bank did make such an agreement to act as the plaintiff's agent in the recovery of her property; and (2) that it was guilty of a want of due care and diligence in the performance of its duty as such, whereby the loss occurred. On both of these points we think there was no evidence to charge the defendant sufficient to require it to be submitted to the jury. The meeting referred to in the evidence, called by the Bank, of those interested with itself in the recovery of the stolen property, resulted in no such agreement. The Bank had before that been taking such measures for that purpose in its own behalf, and incidentally for the others, as it deemed best. The proposal made at the meeting to put the matter in charge of a joint committee of the officers of the Bank and individual losers was rejected. The Bank continued thereafter to prosecute the matter as it had been doing from the beginning. The communications which subsequently took place between Dr. Wylie, the plaintiff's husband, and Mr. Warrener, the vice president and manager of the Bank, based on the information which the former had received from his patient, that he could deal with Scott, one of the burglars, for the recovery of his wife's bonds, and the reply made by Mr. Warrener requesting him not to institute an independent negotiation, on the ground that it might interfere with the success of those which the Bank was then prosecuting, do not tend to prove a contract by which the Bank assumed to act [as the plaintiff's agent in the matter which bound the Bank to take any other measures than such as it was then pursuing, or which obliged the plaintiff not to undertake any separate negotiations of her own. At the most, it can be considered only as a friendly understanding between two parties having like interests, in respect to the course deemed best for the interests of both.

But, even if it could be supposed that there was proof of a distinct agreement, such as is alleged, whereby the Bank agreed, in consideration of the plaintiff's desisting from any separate efforts on her own behalf to prosecute measures for the recovery of her property equally with that of the Bank and others, there is still an entire failure of evidence to establish as against the Bank any failure of performance [372] on its part. It seems to have acted with promptness, with diligence, with skill, and with success. The great bulk of the stolen property was in fact recovered through its exertions and instrumentalities. This recovery included one half in number of the bonds lost by the plaintiff, and no part of the plaintiff's property was used or sacrificed to save what was secured.

The particular circumstances in regard to the recovery by Hinckley of his Union Pacific Railroad bonds, which seem to form the chief matter of complaint on the part of the plaintiff, do not seem to us to warrant any inference against the Bank. Hinckley, although a director of the Bank, had an individual interest in the bonds; and the information which led to his negotiations and the recovery of a portion of them came to him directly because he was the only owner of bonds of that description included in the loss. He was, therefore, allowed by the Bank, without objection, to negotiate separately for their return. He recovered $25,000 by the payment of $6,000, but $19,000 additional he was unable to obtain, except upon payment of what he deemed to be an exorbitant demand, with which he was unwilling to comply. It is supposed that Hinckley's bonds were a part of the lot amounting in all to $100,000; it is also supposed that this lot included some of the plaintiff's bonds; and it is also supposed that, in consequence of Hinckley's refusal to continue negotiations for the recovery of the remainder of his own bonds, the holders secretly sent them to Europe, where they passed into the hands of innocent holders and became lost beyond recovery; but all this is mere matter of conjecture. There is absolutely in the case no evidence whatever, either that any part of the bonds of the plaintiff constituted a portion of this lot of $100,000, or that they could have been recovered, either without Hinckley's interference or if he had pursued his negotiations; or that the bonds were sent abroad by reason of anything done or omitted by him. Hinckley does, indeed, state, in a letter written by him [373] to the husband of the plaintiff, that he had reason to suppose that the whole lot of $100,000 might have been purchased for fifty cents on the dollar; but no facts are stated as the ground for this opinion, and there is no proof beyond the conjecture itself. Neither is there any reason to conclude that the Bank was responsible either for what Hinckley did or failed to do. There is no evidence to warrant the conclusion that anything the Bank could have done, beyond what was done, would have resulted more favorably to the plaintiff.

In our opinion, therefore, the court below was justified in its ruling upon the evidence, instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

[445] LEVINA CAMPBELL ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
LACLEDE GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 445-449.)

State law as to record of federal land patent—effect of as evidence—weight of evidence.

1. It is proper for a State to pass a law, making the record of a patent from the United States in the offices of such State prima facie evidence of its contents.

2. This court affirms the decree of the Supreme Court of Missouri, deciding that the prima facie case made by the record of a patent, in the recorder's office of St Louis County, the original not being in the control of either party, was not overcome by the evidence in the case.

Submitted Nov. 15, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Leverett Bell, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. C. Gibson and C. E. Gibson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this case, directed to the [446] Supreme Court of Missouri, brings up for review the following judgment:

"Levina Campbell, Frank H. Murray and Annie L. Murray, his wife, and Charles J. January and Annie E. January, his wife, Respondents,
v.
The Laclede Gas-Light Company, Appellant, and the City of St. Louis.

} Appeal from the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

"Now at this day come again the parties aforesaid, by their respective attorneys, and, consenting that this court may proceed to render such judgment as to them may seem proper upon the record herein, it is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the plaintiffs' cause of action was at the commencement of this suit absolutely barred by the Missouri Statute of Limitations, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the rights claimed by them under the Act of Congress approved June 6, 1874, entitled 'An Act for Obviating the Necessity of Issuing Patents for Certain Private Land Claims, and for Other Purposes;' and the judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals and the judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court herein are reversed and held for naught; and it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs take nothing by this action, and that said defendants shall recover of the plaintiffs its costs in this behalf expended, and have execution therefor."

The question on which the jurisdiction of this court depends is whether the title to the land in controversy passed from the United States by the Act of Congress of June 6, 1874, referred to in this judgment (18 U. S. Stat. at L. pt. 3, p. 62), in which case the Statute of Limitations was no bar, or by a patent issued March 26, 1824, to Pierre Chouteau, in which case it was a bar.

The question is still further narrowed because it depends upon whether the patent issued to Chouteau had the seal of the United States for the General Land-Office impressed upon it. The patent itself was not in evidence; but the defendant, who relied upon the Statute of Limitations, produced a certified copy of the patent from the United States to Chouteau from the office of the recorder of deeds of St. Louis [447] County, made in that office in 1847, in which copy a seal in due form appears, and the instrument is perfect in every respect. The law of Missouri on the subject of the recording of patents for lands lying within that State is found in sections 3826 and 3827 of the Revised Statutes of that State. They are as follows:

"Section 3826. All patents for land lying within the State of Missouri, granted to any person or persons by the President of the United States or the governor of this State, may be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which the lands are situated.

"Section 3827. All copies of patents so recorded, or which may have heretofore been recorded, duly certified by the recorder under his official seal, shall be received in all courts in this State as prima facie evidence of the contents of such patents."

The record shows that the original patent was not in the possession or under the control of either party to this action. It is not denied that the copy produced from the office of the recorder of deeds makes a prima facie case of the transfer of the title from the United States to Chouteau in 1824. The plaintiff, however, undertook to impeach the validity of this copy by producing from the records of the General Land-Office in Washington City a copy of the patent as there recorded. This copy is without a seal, and to make sure that this was not an accidental omission of the officer making the copy from the records of the land-office, a letter of the commissioner of that office, written at the time the copy was made, is produced, in which he says that he himself has examined with care the record from which the copy was taken, and that no seal appears therein. He suggests, however, that while it is probable that the seal of the General Land-Office was affixed to the patent, there is no authority to correct the record of it in the absence of said patent.

The case was tried without a jury, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs. This judgment was affirmed, as the record states pro forma, in the court of appeals, but was reversed by the supreme court, and judgment rendered for the defendant, as already cited.

[448] It might be a question of some doubt whether this is not merely a decision of all these courts as to a matter of fact, in regard to which this court has no supervision over the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. But as the question really is, at what time the Statute of Limitations began to run in favor of the defendant, and as that depends upon whether the instrument called the patent to Chouteau is a valid patent, and as we concur in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri on that subject, we think its judgment ought to be affirmed.

That the State of Missouri had a right to pass the statute, which makes the record in the offices of that State of a patent from the United States prima facie evidence of the contents of that patent, does not seem to be doubted. Indeed, it was a very wise and needful provision, for without it the title to large quantities of land, which rested primarily in the patents from the United States, might be very difficult to establish by evidence of that title. By this statute parties were enabled to place this evidence in permanent form upon the records of the counties in which the land was situated, at the same time giving notice to all the world of their claim to such land. This record of the Chouteau patent being therefore authorized by a valid law, we see no reason why a transcript of it is not of as much actual value, as evidence of the original patent, as a transcript from a similar record made at Washington City. In each instance the record is but the copy of the same instrument, made by different persons, who must be supposed to be equally honest, equally careful, and therefore equally accurate in the record which they made of the original. If there is found to be a variance in the two copies thus produced, it would naturally be supposed that all that is found in either copy was in the original, and that any important matter found in one copy which was not found in the other was due to an accidental omission, rather than that it was an accidental insertion of matter not in the original paper. Counsel for defendant argues that it is fairly to be inferred that there was a seal to the original patent, and that its record was accidentally omitted, because this patent, like all others, contains in the testimonium the language of the President, that [449] "I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the General Land-Office to be hereunto affixed." Whatever force might be given to this language, as evidence, that there was a seal to the original, is lost by reason of the failure to incorporate either one of the transcripts in the record of the case as it comes to us.

The case of McGarrahan v. Min. Co. 96 U. S. 323 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 635], so far from sustaining the doctrine claimed by counsel for plaintiffs in error, that the Act of Congress making certified copies from the books of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office evidence equally with the originals (§ 891, Rev. Stat.) makes the copy in this case, with the seal omitted, conclusive against the record from the St. Louis office; that case recognizes the fact that there is nothing in the Statute, either express or implied, which forbids a party from showing by extrinsic proof, otherwise legitimate, what the contents of the lost original really were, when it is shown that the record itself, or the transcript from it, is not a true copy; and it further holds that the party is not necessarily deprived of his rights on account of the defective record in the General Land-Office.

The words "evidence equally," as used in the Act of Congress, were not intended to mean that in all cases the copy should have the same probative force as the original instrument, but that it should be regarded as of the same class, in the grades of evidence, as to written and parol, and primary and secondary. It could not have been intended to say that when the existence of the instrument is conceded, but a question arises as to some particular word or figure, the copy would be as convincing as the original.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the prima facie case made by the record of the patent in the recorder's office of St. Louis County is not overcome by what purports to be a copy of the same from the records of the General Land-Office in Washington, and that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri must be affirmed.

GERMANIA INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW ORLEANS, Plff. in Err., v. STATE OF WISCONSIN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 473–477.)

Suit by State in its own courts—removable when—federal question must appear on the face of the record.

1. Under the Act of 1875 a suit by a State in one of its own courts can only be removed to the federal court on the ground that it is a suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made under their authority.

2. In order that a suit may be removable for this cause it must appear on the face of the record that some title, right, privilege or immunity, on which the recovery depends, will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or a law of the United States, or sustained by an opposite construction.

3. In an action where the complaint discloses no such case, and where the only appearance of the defendant was special, to object to the service of the summons, the only question raised is as to the service, and the case is not removable.

Submitted Nov. 23, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. F. W. Cotzhausen, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. W. Chynoweth, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error brought under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, for the review of an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been entered in that court as a suit removed from a state court. The record shows a suit brought by the State of Wisconsin, in one of its own courts, against the Germania Insurance Company of New Orleans, an insurance company incorporated by the State of Louisiana, and having its principal office and place of business in New Orleans, to recover certain statutory penalties for doing business in Wisconsin without complying with the laws of [474] that State in reference to foreign insurance companies. The only process in the cause was served December 29, 1885, on L. D. Harmon, a citizen of Wisconsin, and described in the sheriff's return as "being then and there an agent of the said defendant."

On the 12th of April, 1886, the Insurance Company came, and entering "its special appearance in the action, * * * for the purpose of this motion only," moved the court "to vacate and set aside the pretended service of summons" as above stated, "and all and every proceeding in said action subsequent thereto, for want of jurisdiction and irregularity in said pretended service of process." In support of this motion an affidavit of the vice president and of the secretary of the Company was filed, to the effect that Harmon was never the agent of the Company, and that the Company had no agent in the State, and had had no agent, and had not transacted insurance business there for ten years then last past. Before any action was had upon this motion, the Company, on the same 12th of April, presented to the court its petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, in which is set forth the motion to set aside the service of the summons in the action and the special appearance of the Company for the purposes of that motion only, and the grounds of the motion. The petition then states "that the suit arises out of a controversy between the parties in regard to the operation and effect of certain provisions of the laws of the State of Wisconsin, said to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States in various particulars, and necessitating a construction thereof, among which subjects of controversy are the following, to wit:

"Whether the attempt of the State to prevent the Company from doing business in the way it was done was not in conflict with section 1, article 14, and with section 8, article 1, of the Constitution; and,

"Whether the aforesaid proceedings in said court, and the attempt to proceed against your petitioner by service of summons or process upon one not authorized to represent it, without appearance in court, constitute 'due process of law' within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States."

The state court refused to allow a removal, and thereupon the Company took a copy of the record to the circuit court, where proceedings were had on the 29th of May in accordance with the following docket entry:

"The State of Wisconsin
v.
The Germania Insurance Company of New Orleans.

"And comes the defendant, specially appearing by Cotzhausen, Sylvester, Schelber & [475] Sloan, for purposes of pending motion only, and moves the court for an order docketing this cause, which motion was granted ex parte; and the defendant, appearing specially for the purposes of this pending motion, gives notice that on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1886, at the opening of court on that day, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard," the plaintiff will be required to show cause "why the pending motion to set aside the pretended service of summons and all subsequent proceedings in said cause should not be taken up, heard and considered."

On the 24th of June the circuit court remanded the cause; whereupon, this writ of error was sued out.

A suit by a State in one of its own courts cannot be removed to a Circuit Court of the United States under the Act of 1875, unless it be a suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made under their authority; Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 482]; and a suit cannot be said to be one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States until it has in some way been made to appear on the face of the record that "some title, right, privilege or immunity, on which the recovery depends, will [476] be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or a law of the United States, or sustained by an opposite construction." Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257 [29 : 390]. This record shows no such thing, for, as the case now stands, the right of recovery depends alone on the question whether service of summons has been made on a person who was at the time an agent of the Company within the State on whom process might legally be served, so as to bind the Company and bring it within the jurisdiction of the court. This is a mixed question of law and fact; and in no way dependent on the construction of the Constitution or any law of the United States. If decided in one way, the suit will be at an end and the Company relieved from all necessity of appearing to defend. If in another, the Company must appear or suffer the consequences of a default. As yet no suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States has been brought, within the meaning of that term as used in the statute. There is nothing in the complaint which discloses any such case, and, until the Company submits itself to the jurisdiction of the court for the trial of the suit, it cannot be permitted to allege any new matter. All further proceedings have been stopped by the Company on its own motion until it can be determined whether any suit at all has in law been begun so as to require the Company to appear and defend. The case stands, therefore, on the summons, the alleged service, the complaint, the special appearance of the Company for the purposes of its motion to vacate the service, and the petition for removal, which must be limited in its statements to such as are consistent with the special appearance which has been entered. No new matter in the nature of a defense to the action can be introduced. The only question which can be considered in the case as it now stands is whether Harmon, on whom this process was served, was in fact an "authorized agent." The suit, therefore, does not, as yet, "really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of the circuit court," and it was properly remanded.

The order to that effect is consequently affirmed.

Jurisdiction—dependent on citizenship—duty of plaintiff to show jurisdiction—amendment.

1. Where in the circuit court judgment was for the defendants in a case where the jurisdiction depended on citizenship, and the plaintiff brought the case to this court, and the citizenship on which the jurisdiction depended does not appear in the record, the judgment will be reversed, but at the costs of the plaintiff in error; it being his fault that the citizenship of the parties was not shown.

2. If the citizenship of the parties was such as to give jurisdiction, it will be competent for the court below to allow the necessary amendment.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia. Reversed.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Mr. A. Burlew, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [342]
ion of the court.

This record does not show that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the suit, which depends alone on the citizenship of the parties. In the declaration it is stated that Halsted, the plaintiff, is a citizen of New York, but nothing is said of the citizenship of the defendants. Neither is there anything in the rest of the record to show what their citizenship actually was. For this reason the judgment is reversed, but as the fault rests alone on the plaintiff, whose duty it was, in bringing the suit, to make the jurisdiction appear, the reversal will be at his cost in this court. Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 229 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 714]. If the citizenship of the defendants was, in fact, such at the commencement of the suit as to give the circuit court jurisdiction, it will be in the power of that court, when the case gets back, to allow the necessary amendment to be made and then proceed to trial. This whole subject was recently considered at the present term in Continental Life Insurance Co. v. Rhoads [ante, 390,] and it is only necessary to refer now to the opinion in [343] that case and the authorities there cited for the reasons of this judgment.

Bankruptcy—when assignee is bound by proceedings in state court affecting assets—jurisdiction.

Pending an action in a state court involving the title to certain lands, the defendant made an assignment in bankruptcy, and the assignee was made a party to the proceedings. The defendant's title was established and a lien declared in favor of his attorneys for their fees, of which an account was taken in chancery and for which the property was sold to them.

In a subsequent action brought in a state court to enforce the lien of a trust deed, executed by the defendant pending said proceedings, it is held:

1. That the state court had jurisdiction to declare and enforce said lien for fees, notwitstanding the proceedings in bankruptcy.
2. That the assignee was bound by the proceedings in the state court, he having appeared and litigated his rights there.
3. That the immunity claimed by plaintiffs in error under section 711 R. S., conferring upon the courts of the United States exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings, from the operation of the decree of the court below, gives this court jurisdiction of this writ of error.
4. That the question here is not whether the decree in the former proceedings binds the plaintiffs in error, but whether the state court had jurisdiction to bind the parties and those whom they represented.

Let it be assumed that the defendants are senior mortgagees or incumbrancers, and that the plaintiffs are junior mortgagees. Can it be doubted that a junior mortgagee, who is not a party to the proceedings under which the senior incumbrancer forecloses his lien and obtains title, can, if such proceedings are void, attack the title set up thereunder, and have it declared void, or maintain his ejectment suit in equity to recover the property?

Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg. 59; Almony v. Hicks, 8 Head, 39; Kerr v. Kerr, 8 Lea, 228.

A sale made under foreclosure of a senior mortgage is wholly inoperative as to the rights of a junior mortgagee who was not a party to the suit.

The plaintiffs in error were not parties to or bound by the proceedings and decree of the state court.

Freem. Judg. § 156; Boro v. Harris, 13 Lea, 36, 44.

The Chancery Court of Shelby County had no jurisdiction to ascertain and liquidate the lien of the defendants, because of the bankruptcy of Townsend and the proceedings in the United States District Court.

Sec. 711, R. S. See also Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 833); McHenry v. La Société etc. 95 U. S. 58 (24: 370).

The record shows that the land was conveyed and delivered to the assignee and that it remained in his actual possession until after the defendants had obtained their decree vesting title in them.

Townsend was adjudicated a bankrupt more than a year before the Supreme Court of Tennessee declared the lien in favor of the defendants. When the lien is declared the attorney and client first assume antagonistic relations, and when the parties are sui juris such declaration of lien is simply the basis of a suit which the attorney must institute to enforce.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts disclosed by the record are in brief as follows:

On the 16th of February, 1869, Annie L. Jones and others, the widow and heirs at law of William E. Jones, deceased, filed their bill in the Chancery Court of Shelby County, Tennessee, against D. H. Townsend, to set aside and cancel a sheriff's deed purporting to convey certain lands to him, and to be quieted in their title to the property. The defendants in error, Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell, were employed by Townsend to defend this suit, which they did successfully, and at the December Term, 1876, obtained a decree of the supreme court of the State establishing his title to the property. On the 18th of June, 1875, while this suit was pending, Townsend conveyed the land in dispute to George W. Winchester, in trust to secure certain debts owing by him, and for which Ben. May was bound as indorser. On the 30th of November, 1875, Townsend filed his petition in bankruptcy, and on the 12th of January, 1876, T. P. Winchester was duly appointed his assignee. [451]

In the decree of the supreme court establishing the title of Townsend to the land appears the following:

"And it being suggested to the court that, pending the proceeding in this court, the title of the said Townsend has been assigned to Thomas P. Winchester, assignee in bankruptcy, it is, with the consent of the said Townsend by his counsel, ordered that the said Winchester be made a party to this decree, and by consent, this cause is remanded to the Chancery Court of Shelby County to take * * * an account and make report of the reasonable counsel fee of the counsel, Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell, for which a lien is hereby declared on the premises in controversy, the said Winchester asking that the account be taken below."

Under this order the cause was remanded, the account taken in the chancery court, the amount due ascertained, the lien declared, and the property sold to Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell for its satisfaction.

On the 12th of February, 1880, the present appellants filed this bill in the Chancery Court of Shelby County against Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell, to enforce the lien of the deed of trust executed by Townsend to George W. Winchester, trustee, claiming that their title under this deed is superior to that of the defendants under their purchase at the sale which had been ordered in the former case. In their bill they allege that they are not bound by the decree in the original suit, because "neither they nor the interest in said land that they represented were before the court when said decree was pronounced, and they had no representative before said court. The suit was not revived or reinstated in their names or in the name of the trustee after Townsend's bankruptcy and the assignment of his assets in bankruptcy." This is the substance of the allegations of the bill on this branch of the case. The hearing was originally had before a commission of referees appointed under a Statute of Tennessee, and in their report it is said, among other things: "This proceeding in the chancery court, on the reference as to the amount of the fee, etc., is not [452] such a matter in bankruptcy as is contemplated by section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, 1874, especially under the circumstances of this case." The report of the referees was confirmed by the supreme court. In its first decision no reference was made to the question of the jurisdiction of the state court in the original suit to adjudicate as to the lien for fees, in view of the provisions of section 711 of the Revised Statutes; but, on a petition for rehearing and a suggestion of this omission, the decree was modified as follows.

"The court being of the opinion that this court had jurisdiction in the case of Annie L. Jones v. D. H. Townsend, mentioned and set forth in the record, to declare the attorneys' lien in favor of the defendants in this case on the tract of land described in the pleadings, and that the Chancery Court of Shelby County, Tenn., had jurisdiction to enforce said lien on said property by the proceedings, decrees, and sale, as shown in the record, notwithstanding the bankruptcy of D. H. Townsend and the bankrupt proceedings in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee, as shown in the record, and notwithstanding the provisions of the 711th section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and notwithstanding the provisions of the sections of said Revised Statutes embraced in Title 61, 'Bankruptcy,' the court adjudges that the authority exercised by the state courts in said proceedings is not repugnant to the said laws of the United States. In construing said laws of the United States, the court is of the opinion that, under the circumstances of the case as shown by the record, the said state courts had the jurisdiction to declare and enforce said liens on the land in question; and that under the said proceedings the defendants acquired a good and valid title to the land in controversy, and that the title is not and was not void and a cloud on the complainants' right and title, and the court doth so order and decree."

Upon this state of facts the appellees have moved: (1) to dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction; or (2) to affirm under Rule 6, clause 5.

[453] One of the questions presented by the bill was as to the binding effect of the decree in the original case upon the complainants in this suit. Objection was not made in the pleadings to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action on account of the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, under section 711 of the Revised Statutes, "of all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy," but it clearly was at the trial before the referees, and it was directly presented to and decided by the supreme court. An immunity was claimed by the appellants under this statute from the operation of the decree of the state court on their rights, because that statute made the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States exclusive in such cases. We thus have jurisdiction, but as the decision of the state court upon this question was clearly right, we do not care to hear further argument. The assignee in bankruptcy appeared in the state court and litigated his rights there. This he had authority to do, and the judgment in such an action is binding on him. This we have many times decided, Mays v. Fritton, 20 Wall. 414 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 389]; Doe v. Childress, 21 Wall. 642, 647 [88 U. S. 22: 549, 551]; Scott v. Kelly, 22 Wall. 57 [89 U. S. 22: 729]; Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521 [23: 403]; Burbank v. Bigelow, 92 U. S. 182 [23: 543]; Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 737 [24: 137]; McHenry v. La Société Francaise, 95 U. S. 58 [24 : 370]; Davis v. Friedlander, 104 U. S. 570 [26 : 818]. The question here is not whether that decree thus rendered binds these appellants, but whether the state court had jurisdiction so as to bind those who were parties to the suit, and those whom the parties in law represented.

The motion to dismiss is denied, and that to affirm granted.

SAME CASE. On petition for rehearing.

Submitted Jan. 25, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

This petition is denied, but inasmuch as the petitioners think that the points on which they relied for a reversal of the judgment were not clearly understood, we will restate what was decided.

1. We held that, as the suit of Townsend v. Jones was pending when Townsend filed his petition in bankruptcy, and when he made his assignment to Winchester, the assignee, Winchester, as such assignee, had the right to appear in that suit and have the amount due Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell determined. It may be that, according to the practice in Tennessee, if he had not appeared, Heiskell, Scott & Heiskell would have been compelled to bring a new suit to have the amount of their lien ascertained; but as he did appear and did ask to have the matter adjudicated in that suit, he was bound by what was done. As the court had declared the lien, it was within its jurisdiction to ascertain, with the consent of all the parties, the amount that was due under the lien and make the necessary order for its enforcement as against those who were parties to that suit. About this we have no doubt.

2. We said: "The question here is, not whether that decree thus rendered binds these appellants (plaintiffs in error), but whether the state court had jurisdiction so as to bind those who were parties to the suit, and those whom the parties in law represented." The assignee having voluntarily made himself a party to the suit, and the court having at his request settled the amount of the lien, he was bound by what was done, and so were all whom he in law represented in the litigation. That certainly includes the general creditors of the bankrupt, but whether it does those claiming under the trust deed from Townsend, before his bankruptcy, to George W. Winchester, trustee, we did not then and do not now decide.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 339-341.)

Cause of action.

1. A creditor who receives the obligation of his debtor for his debt, and sells such obligation for less than its nominal value, cannot sue on the original debt to recover the difference.
2. Looney v. District of Columbia, Bk. 28, followed.

Submitted Nov. 19, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The following is the statement of the case by Mr. Chief Justice Drake of the Court of Claims:

The claimant had four contracts with the board of public works of the District of Columbia for the improvement of streets, under which he did a large amount of work. In regard to one piece of that work, the macadamizing of 4½ Street S. W., a controversy arose between him and the board, which delayed the settlement between them of a final balance due him on account of all the work done under the four contracts. After considerable negotiation the following agreement was arrived at, and signed and sealed by the claimant and all the members of the board:

Whereas, differences have existed between the Board of Public Works of the District of Columbia and Patrick Cullinane, in reference to the contract of said Cullinane, for improving Four-and-a-Half Street, in the City of Washington, it is agreed to adjust the same by deducting from the total amount due said Cullinane the sum of fifteen thousand dollars in consequence of the character of the work, in the judgment of the board, and the amount equitably chargeable against the Metropolitan Railroad Company, which said amount is to be hereafter fixed between said board and said company; bonds to be issued to said Cullinane for the balance due him.

Witness our hands and seals this thirteenth day of September, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-three.

PATRICK CULLINANE	[seal.]
H. D. COOKE	[seal.]
ALEX. R. SHEPHERD	[seal.]
JAMES A. MAGRUDER	[seal.]
ADOLF CLUSS	[seal.]
H. A. WILLARD	[seal.]

In pursuance of this agreement bonds of the District of Columbia to the amount of $113,950 were delivered to and accepted by the claimant, which he hypothecated in part, and sold in part, at much below their par value.

He now sues to recover $68,000, which he alleges he lost by the depreciation of the bonds; and in order to lay a foundation for a recovery, he avers that the above writing did not fully express the actual agreement arrived at between him and the board; and he invokes the equitable jurisdiction vested in this court in cases against the District, to reform that writing, so as to make it express that actual agreement. His averment is that there was omitted, by mistake, therefrom a stipulation which was agreed upon, that the bonds given to him in pursuance of that agreement "should be at par, or equivalent to cash, and if not, they (the board of public works) would pay in cash the difference between the actual value and their face value."

Mr. V. B. Edwards, for appellants.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

[341]

The judgment in this case is affirmed on the authority of Looney v. District of Columbia, 118 U. S. 258 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 974]. It having been found as a fact by the court below that no mistake had been made in reducing the contract to writing, no questions are presented in this court on that branch of the case.

Freight, due carrier on dutiable goods paid to deputy collector—collector, not liable at suit of carrier—notice—suit removable—authorities distinguished.

1. Under section 10 of the Act of June 10, 1880, providing for the preservation of carriers' liens for freight on dutiable goods delivered to customs officers, it is not the duty of a collector to collect or receive such freight for the lienholder.
2. A collector of customs is not chargeable, at the suit of a carrier, for freight paid to his deputy, unless it appears that in receiving such freight the deputy acted under his authority.
3. An action to charge the collector with freight thus paid to his deputy differs from an action for damages for a failure to give the notice required by the statute. It amounts to a waiver of the notice, and a ratification of the action of the deputy in receiving the freight.
4. Such an action against a collector, when brought in a state court, is removable under section 643 R. S.

Argued Nov. 12, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. H. Holding, E. W. Kittredge and Ramsey, Maxwell & Matthews, for plaintiff in error:

The deputy collector acting as cashier was,

by virtue of his position and continuous action in the premises, the agent of the defendant, who was responsible for his conduct and, under the circumstances disclosed, estopped to deny his agency.

Secs. 2630, 2632, 3148, R. S. See also Dignan v. Shields, 51 Tex. 322; Badger v. Gutieres, 111 U. S. 734 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 581); Ogden v. Maxwell, 3 Blatchf. 319; McIntyre v. Trumbull, 7 Johns. 35.

The duty to withhold the delivery of the goods until the freight was paid, which under the decision of Mason v. Fearson, 9 How. 259, (50 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 130), is an absolute duty, is one which devolved upon the collector officially, and which he had the right to perform by his deputy.

The question whether the act of the deputy, regarding him as an agent, was within the scope of his authority was determined by the course and manner in which he was accustomed to conduct his principal's business.

Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 49).

The performance of his duties in respect to numerous transactions in a particular manner, for a period of six months, should conclusively establish a course of business sanctioned by his principal, and for which his principal should be held responsible.

Messrs. Benjamin Butterworth and Chaning Richards, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents the following facts: D. W. McClung held the office of Collector of Customs and Surveyor of the Port of the City of Cincinnati, under the laws of the United States, and J. L. Wartman was employed by him, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as deputy collector of customs. As such, deputy Wartman acted as the cashier of the collector. Section 10 of the Act of June 10, 1880, chap. 190, 21 Stat. at L. 175, is as follows:

"That whenever the proper officer of the customs shall be duly notified in writing of the existence of a lien for freight upon imported goods, wares or merchandise in his custody, he shall, before delivering such * * * merchandise to the importer, owner or consignee thereof, give reasonable notice to the party or parties claiming the lien; and the possession by the officers of customs shall not affect the discharge [455] of such lien, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and such officer may refuse the delivery of such merchandise from any public or bonded warehouse or other place in which the same shall be deposited, until proof to his satisfaction shall be produced that the freight thereon had been paid or secured; but the rights of the United States shall not be prejudiced thereby, nor shall the United States or its officers be in any manner liable for losses consequent upon such refusal to deliver. If merchandise so subject to a lien, regarding which notice has been filed, shall be forfeited to the United States and sold, the freight due thereon shall be paid from the proceeds of such sale in the same manner as other charges and expenses authorized by law to be paid therefrom are paid." This is part of "An Act to Amend the Statutes in Relation to Immediate Transportation of Dutiable Goods."

The Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railroad Company was a common carrier, and as such designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of receiving and transporting dutiable goods from the port of arrival to the port of destination under this Act of Congress. As such carrier, so designated, this Company carried to Cincinnati large quantities of dutiable goods, the freight and charges upon which amounted in the aggregate to $8,477.50, and placed them in the custody and control of McClung as collector of customs and surveyor of the port, and, as is claimed, notified him in writing of its lien as carrier for such freight and charges. Wartman, as deputy collector, had charge, under McClung, of the collection of customs payable at the Port of Cincinnati, and of the delivery of imported merchandise to the consignees thereof. He received the freight and charges due the Company from the consignees of these goods at the same time that he received the duties, and delivered the goods to the consignees without notifying the Company. The charges were never paid by him either to the Company or to McClung.

Such being the conceded facts, this suit was brought against McClung in the Superior Court of Cincinnati. In the petition it is averred that McClung was collector, etc.; that the Railroad Company had carried and delivered the goods to him under the Act, charged with a lien thereon for freight, of which due notice [456] was given to him in writing, as provided in the Act; and "that it became and was the duty of the defendant, as such officer, to refuse to deliver the said goods and merchandise until such freight thereon had been paid to the common carrier." It is then averred that the consignees paid the charges due the Company to the defendant, "and the defendant then and there received" the same "for the account and benefit of the said * * * Company, and the defendant then and thereupon caused the said goods and merchandise to be delivered to the consignees, * * * without notice to the Railroad Company, whereby its lien for said freight was lost;" and that "the defendant, though often requested, has not paid said" money to the plaintiff, but the same, "with interest from September 8, 1881, is now due and unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiff."

Summons in the action was served on McClung, March 21, 1882, and on the 7th of November following he filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, his petition, under section 643 of the Revised Statutes, for a writ of certiorari to the state court, requiring that court to send to the circuit court the record and proceedings in the cause, on the ground that "At the time the said acts charged in such petition are alleged to have been done, he was, and still is, an officer of the United States, appointed and acting under the authority of the revenue laws of the United States, * * * and all his acts in connection with the receipt and delivery of the merchandise described in said petition were done by him under color of his said office." Upon this petition a writ of certiorari was issued and the record and proceedings removed. Upon the entry of the cause in the circuit court the Railroad Company moved that it be remanded, "for the reason that this court has no jurisdiction of the person or subject matter of the action." This motion was denied November 15, 1882, and on the 12th of February, 1883, McClung answered the petition in the suit, denying that he had been notified of the lien, or that it [457] had ever become his duty to refuse to deliver the goods until the freight was paid, and also denying that he had ever received the freight for the benefit of the Company.

Upon the trial it was shown that the freight and charges were paid to Wartman at the same time with the duties, and that, upon such payment, the goods were delivered to the consignees, without notice to the carriers. The plaintiff also offered further evidence "tending to prove that it had been the general usage and custom prevailing at the custom office of Cincinnati for ten years prior to the appointment of the defendant, and was the general usage and custom at the said office after the defendant's appointment, on March 18, 1881, and down to the 8th of September, 1881, for the consignees of imported goods brought to the Port of Cincinnati by all the common carriers who are authorized under said Act to transport imported merchandise to the port of its destination, to pay the freights due to such common carrier at the office of the collector and of the cashier deputy of the surveyor of the port when a * * * notice in writing of the existence of a lien thereon in favor of the carrier had been given to the deputy collector at such office; and that such payments were exacted and required by the deputy collector as a precedent condition to the delivery of such goods by the surveyor of the port to the owners and consignees thereof; and that such freights were paid, together with the duties due upon such imported goods, to such deputy collector, sometimes in money, but most generally in checks, which included duties due to the government and the freights due for the carriage of said goods, and which checks were drawn by the consignees in favor of the surveyor of the port by name, or of the 'collector' or 'surveyor' of customs at the Port of Cincinnati, which checks were indorsed and collected by such deputy collector for the collector or surveyor in his official capacity, and were collected in the usual course of business by such deputy collector; and that, upon the receipt of such money or checks in payment of duties and freight, the goods were, by the order of said deputy, with the acquiescence of the surveyor of the port, delivered to the respective consignees; and that the deputy collector, in his [458] official capacity, accounted with and paid over the freights so collected to the common carrier of such imported goods, from time to time, as the same were demanded."

There was also evidence tending to prove that the payments in this case were made in accordance with this custom and upon the demand of Wartman.

McClung was sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and testified that Wartman was acting as deputy when he came into office, and attending to the receipt of duties, and was continued in the same service by him; that he was never authorized to sign or indorse checks, and that he, McClung, was not aware that he had ever done so. He also testified that he had no knowledge whatever of the fact that Wartman was receiving freight moneys until September 6, 1881, which was after all these payments were made, and that there was not kept in the office any account of moneys received for freights.

At the close of the testimony the court charged the jury, among other things, as follows:

"In order to authorize a recovery against the defendant for failing to give the seasonable notice to the plaintiff required by the statute, before delivering the goods to the owners or consignees, an averment that the freights due plaintiff and for which it had a lien were owing and unpaid is necessary. There is no such averment in the plaintiff's petition in this case; on the contrary, it distinctly avers that the consignees did pay the freights to the defendant; and, while it does not say in express terms that it authorized such payments to be made, by demanding and suing for the same, as it has done, ratifies and confirms the payments, and claims that the money was received for its account and benefit, and demands judgment therefor. This is in fact the gravamen of its complaint, the theory upon which its suit rests; and the court instructs that you are here to try this case upon the hypothesis that the freights due from the consignees to the plaintiff for the carriage of the goods in question were paid before the goods were delivered by the defendant to the consignees, and that the defendant was therefore under no legal duty to give the plaintiff notice of his intention to make such delivery."

"It was competent for the parties, by express [459] contract, or by a tacit understanding resulting from an established course of business, for the benefit and convenience of both parties, to agree that the defendant should receive the freights due the carrier for the account of the latter, and upon receipt thereof deliver the goods to the owners or consignees, and that such receipts by him should be in lieu of the notice which the law required him to give the carrier in the contingency described by the statute. It may be that such tacit or implied agreement existed between these parties in this case. This is the question for you to determine. The defendant was under no official or legal obligation to undertake to thus act for the plaintiff. If he did so, he was but acting in his private capacity and not in the discharge of any official duty. It not being an official duty, his deputy could not thus act by reason of his official relations to his superior, and the defendant would not be liable for such extra-official action unless he had in some way authorized his deputy so to act, or unless he has so acted as to estop him from denying that the deputy was in the specific matter complained of acting by his authority for him."

"If defendant had knowledge of this custom, acquired from observation from the business and books of his office, or through other sources, and acquiesced therein, and permitted the plaintiff to make its collections through his deputy in the belief that he was acting for and as his agent, or by his acts or declarations represented or held him out as his agent in the matter, the plaintiff and defendant, both understanding and tacitly or otherwise agreeing that the freights due the plaintiff should be paid in this way, in lieu of the notice which the statute in the contingency described required the defendant as collector to give to the plaintiff, he would be liable to the plaintiff for all sums so paid to the deputy for the plaintiff's use."

"If the deputy acted without authority from the defendant, and the defendant did not know of his said action, nor hold him out to the plaintiff as his agent, nor do nor say anything to mislead the plaintiff nor its officers nor agents, nor undertake nor assume to collect plaintiff's freight, he would not be liable to plaintiff's demand, and your verdict ought to be in his favor." [460]

To all this the Railroad Company excepted. There were other instructions to which exceptions were also taken, but they were all substantially embraced in the above, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant upon which a judgment was entered, and the case is now here for review. The errors assigned are:

1. That the court overruled the motion to remand; and,

2. That it instructed the jury as above stated.

The removal was under section 643 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, among other things, for the removal of "a civil suit * * * commenced in any court of a State against an officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States, * * * on account of any act done under color of his office." This is a suit against an collector of customs, an officer appointed under the revenue laws of the United States, for an act alleged to have been done by him in the delivery of dutiable goods placed in his hands by virtue of his office subject to a carrier's lien. His liability, if any there is, grows out of his official duty to keep the goods and deliver them to the consignees thereof when the import duties are paid and the carrier's lien discharged. The allegation is that the collector, instead of notifying the carrier, as the law required, delivered the goods to the consignees on receiving himself the moneys due for the carrier's charges. This suit is for the money so received. Clearly, then, according to the allegations of the petition, the suit is for an act done by the collector under color of his office. This is not seriously denied; but the claim is that—as the defendant insists, and the court below has decided, that it was not the official duty of the collector to collect the carrier's money and, therefore, that he is not liable for the acts of his deputy in that behalf—the suit is really one that could not be removed. But the petition alleges an act done by the collector under color of his office, and seeks a recovery on that account. Such a suit is removable; and certainly the right to a removal is not taken away because the collector says in his defense that the act charged was not in fact done. If done by him, it was done under color of his office. The thing to be tried is whether it was done. [461]

We agree entirely with the court below in the view it took of the character of the suit which has been brought. It is not for damages for delivering the goods without notice to the carrier, but for the charges collected on the delivery. That is the case made, both by the petition and upon the trial. The whole effort on the part of the Company, so far as the record discloses, was to show that it was, and had been for years, the general usage in Cincinnati for consignees to pay the carrier's charges upon dutiable goods carried, and held in the custom house for the payment of duties, to the cashier deputy of the collector; and that such payments were exacted and required by the deputy as a condition precedent to the delivery, he accounting to the carriers for the money received on this account. The claim was that these payments had been made pursuant to this custom, and that the collector was bound by the acts of the deputy, and liable for his defaults. If the suit had been to recover damages for the delivery without notice, this proof might perhaps have come from the other side to show that the carriers had, by long usage, made the deputy their agent to collect their charges, and that, as the payment had in this case been made to the deputy in accordance with that custom, no notice was required. We are clear, therefore, that the whole case turns upon the question whether the collector is liable for these collections of the deputy. [462]

Section 2680 of the Revised Statutes gives authority to every collector of customs to employ, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, "Such number of persons as deputy collectors as he shall deem necessary, and such deputies are declared to be officers of the customs." There can be no doubt that the collector is answerable for all the acts of his deputies in the performance of their official duties under him. The real question here is, therefore, whether the collection of the carrier's charges was a part of the official duty of the collector. If it was, the collection by the deputy was an official act, and the principal officer is liable accordingly.

What, then, was the duty of the collector under this statute? Clearly, to take the goods from the carrier when brought, and not to deliver them to the consignees without first giving seasonable notice to the person or persons who had notified him in writing of the existence of a lien in their favor thereon for freight. The statute neither made it his duty to collect the freight, nor authorized him to receive it for the lienholder. Payment to him would not have been a payment to the carrier, so as to discharge the consignee from liability for the freight, unless the carrier had made him his personal agent for that purpose, in which case he would receive the money not as collector, but in his private capacity as the representative of the person to whom the money was due. The money in his hands on this account would not be in any sense public moneys, for which he was officially liable to the government, but private moneys, collected in a private capacity, for which he was accountable only to the person from whom he received his authority. So, too, if he had received the freight without authority, and the carrier had sued him for it, he would be liable because the carrier, by suing, would have ratified his act and accepted his agency in the premises. But his liability in that case would not be official as collector, but private as the agent of the carrier. [463]

It follows that the payment of the freight to the deputy was not in law a payment to McClung, unless the deputy, in making the collection, was acting under authority from him, not in his official, but in his private capacity. For this purpose it is not sufficient that Wartman, to whom the payments were made, was the official deputy of McClung as collector. It must appear that he was his private agent in this behalf. That question was fairly submitted to the jury under proper instructions; and the verdict was against the Company, and to the effect that McClung had not authorized Wartman to receive the freight moneys on his account. That concludes this point.

As the alleged exactions of the deputy were not within the scope, either actual or apparent, under the law, of the authority of the collector's office, the case is not within the principle which, under some circumstances, makes the officer liable for the illegal and wrongful acts of his deputy, of which Ogden v. Maxwell, 3 Blatchf. 319, and McIntyre v. Trumbull, 7 Johns. 35, cited in the brief of counsel for the Company, are examples. And, besides, here the exactions, if any, were not from the Company, but from the consignees, who alone can complain. If they were made without the authority of the Company to whom the freight belonged, the Company is under no obligation to accept the payment thus exacted in discharge of its debt for the freight, and may still proceed against the consignees for its recovery.

If this were a suit for delivering the goods without notice to the Company, a different rule would apply. As it was the duty of the collector, as collector, to notify the Company before delivery, and not to deliver until proof to his satisfaction had been produced that the freight had been paid or secured, it would have been a breach of official duty for the deputy to [464] make the delivery before the notice, and the act of the deputy would have been in law the act of his principal. Such a case would be within Ogden v. Maxwell and McIntyre v. Trumbull, and others of like import, which are very numerous. But, as has already been shown, this suit is not of that character. It is for the money paid, and not for delivery without payment.

It follows that there is no error in the record, and the judgment is consequently affirmed.

[526] SHIRLEY C. ASHBY, Appt.,
v.
SIDNEY M. HALL AND HENRY M. PARCHEN.

Public lands—town sites—Act of March 2, 1867—when occupant of lot entitled to right of way over alley after entry—power vested in Legislature of territory—limits of—Legislature could not, under said Act, close streets, etc., by new survey.

1. The entry in the Land-Office of a portion of the public lands in the Territory of Montana, settled upon and occupied as a town site, under the Act of Congress of March 2, 1867, "for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns on the public lands," being "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests; the execution of which trust as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the State or Territory in which the same may be situated," it was held that the occupant of a lot in the town which had been surveyed and platted into streets, alleys, blocks and lots, continued to possess after such entry the same right of way over an adjoining alley which he had previously possessed as appurtenant to his lot.

2. The interests which the occupants possessed previous to the entry, either in the land occupied by them or in rights of way over adjoining streets and alleys, were secured by it.

3. The power vested in the Legislature of the Territory was confined to regulations for the disposal of the lots and the proceeds of the sales. These regulations might extend to provisions for the ascertainment of the nature and extent of the occupancy of different claimants of lots, and the execution and delivery to those found to be occupants in good faith of some official recognition of title in the nature of a conveyance; but they could not authorize any diminution of the rights of the occupants when the extent of their occupancy was established.

2. The Legislature of the Territory could not, under the authority conferred by the above Act of Congress, change or close the streets, alleys and blocks of the town by a new survey. Whatever power it may have over them does not come from the Town Site Act, but, if it exists at all, from the general grant of legislative power under the organic Act of the Territory.

Argued Nov. 10, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana. Affirmed.

The case and facts are given in the opinion.

Messrs. Eppa Hunton and Jeff. Chandler, for appellant:

The owner of the fee, the United States, made no dedication until the town was platted into lots, streets and alleys by the county judge, or by his adoption of a previous plat.

Field v. Manchester, 32 Mich. 279; Shanklin v. Evansville, 55 Ind. 240; Livermore v. Maquoketa, 35 Iowa, 358.

The fact that the owners of adjacent lots, in their conveyances, described this space of ground as an alley does not affect the question, because they could not estop themselves or the county judge, not being owners of the fee in the so-called alley.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 498; Baugan v. Mann, 59 Ill. 492.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

This case comes from the Supreme Court of Montana. It was a suit to abate an obstruction in an alley in the City of Helena, in that Territory. The plaintiffs are the owners of certain lots in a block bordering on the alley, over which they claim a right of way; an easement which they or their predecessors used and enjoyed from 1866 to 1871, when the defendant caused the obstruction complained of.

In the pleadings and in the findings several facts are assumed to be well known, upon which no information is given, as; that the lands within the City of Helena were, in 1869, entered in the local land-office, by the probate judge of the county, under the Town Site Act; and that there was an addition to the original limits of Helena, known as Scott's Addition, within which are the lots owned by the plaintiffs. It would have facilitated the examination of the case if these facts had been stated with some particularity, rather than assumed to be within the knowledge of the court.

The case was brought in one of the district courts of the Territory, and was by stipulation of the parties, tried without a jury. The facts as found, so far as they are material, are substantially as follows: In 1866 Scott's Addition to Helena was laid out, surveyed and platted into streets, blocks, lots and alleys. The alleys ran through the center of the blocks, and were sixteen feet in width. The lots of the plaintiffs adjoined one of these alleys, the passage in which was obstructed by a fence placed across it by the defendant. The title to the ground occupied by the town, including the streets and alleys, was in the United States until the entry of the town site in 1869. The original occupants of the lots recognized the existence of the alley, as did their grantees and successors in interest until such entry, and received their deeds bounded thereon. The principal use of the alley was to take in wood and hay for the adjoining occupants, and for the ingress and egress of their cows. The plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had made valuable improvements upon the lots, to which they held a possessory right at the time of the [528] entry of the town site. Some time afterwards a new survey and a map of the town were made, by direction of the probate judge as trustee, and were approved by the county commissioners. The survey and map did not show the alley in question, and no proceedings were taken to correct them in that particular; and they were filed with the clerk and recorder of the county. In 1871, the defendant entered upon and occupied the land embracing the alley in question; and in 1872 he received a deed of the same from the probate judge, no adverse claim having been presented.

From the facts, of which the above is a brief statement, the district court found as a conclusion of law that, at the time of the entry of the town site by the probate judge, the plaintiffs and others, as adjacent lot owners, had a subsisting and valid right in the alley, and to the use thereof; that the probate judge entered the same in connection with the town site in trust, with the usual rights and interests therein; that his subsequent conveyance thereof to defendant was void and inoperative; and therefore the nonpresentation of an adverse claim to defendant's application for the ground was immaterial.

The court accordingly adjudged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a right of way over the sixteen feet of ground adjoining their lots, and to the use of it as an alleyway without let or hindrance from the defendant or any one acting under him; and declared that the fence erected across it was a nuisance, to be removed by the sheriff of the county, and that the defendant and his servants be forever enjoined from erecting any fence or other obstruction upon the ground. This decree was affirmed, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the Territory, and from the judgment of the latter court the case is brought here.

The Act of Congress of March 2, 1867, "For the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands" (14 Stat. at L. 541, chap. 177), the substance of which has been carried into the Revised Statutes (§ 2387), provided that "Whenever any portion of the public lands have been or shall be settled upon and occupied as a town site, and therefore not subject to entry under the agricultural preemption laws, it shall be lawful, in case such town shall be incorporated, for the corporate au- [529] thorities thereof, and if not incorporated, for the judge of the county court for the county in which such town may be situated, to enter at the proper land-office, and at the minimum price, the land so settled and occupied in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests; the execution of which trust, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the State or Territory in which the same may be situated." It also provided that any act of said trustee, not made in conformity with the rules and regulations mentioned, should be void.

As thus seen, the Act required the entry of land settled upon and occupied, to be in trust "For the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests." The very notion of land settled upon and occupied as a town site implies the existence of streets, alleys, lots and blocks; and for the possession of the lots, and their convenient use and enjoyment, there must of necessity be appurtenant to them a right of way over adjacent streets and alleys. The entry of the land carried with it such a right of way. The streets and alleys were not afterwards at the disposal of the government, except as subject to such easement.

That portion of the town known as Scott's Addition, within which is the alley in controversy, was laid out and platted into streets, alleys, blocks and lots, as early as 1866; and the lots were occupied, in conformity with that survey and plat, when the entry was made. The right of way, and all appurtenances to the lots, which were held by the occupants under their possessory claims, continued after the entry, and the receipt of their deeds or other evidences of title, as before, with the additional support arising from the change of their possessory claims to estates in fee.

The power vested in the Legislature of the Territory in the execution of the trust, upon which the entry was made, was confined to regulations for the disposal of the lots and the proceeds of the sales. These regulations might [530] extend to provisions for the ascertainment of the nature and extent of the occupancy of different claimants of lots, and the execution and delivery to those found to be occupants in good faith of some official recognition of title, in the nature of a conveyance. But they could not authorize any diminution of the rights of the occupants, when the extent of their occupancy was established. The entry was in trust for them, and nothing more was necessary than an official recognition of the extent of their occupancy. Under the authority conferred by the Town-Site Act, the Legislature could not change or close the streets, alleys and blocks of the town by a new survey. Whatever power it may have had over them did not come from that Act, but, if it existed at all, from the general grant of legislative power under the organic Act of the Territory.

The plaintiffs taking the lots they occupied, with the right of way appurtenant thereto, that is, over the alley on which the lots were situated, which they had previously enjoyed, the action of the probate judge in conveying the alley to the defendant was illegal and void. The intrusion of the defendant thereon was therefore a trespass, and the fence erected by him, to bar the passage through it, was a nuisance to be abated.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

v.

F. W. SCHALICKE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 401–407.)

Patent for improvement in concrete pavements—action for infringement—essentials of complainant's device.

In an action for the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 4864, for an improvement in concrete pavements, held, that, as the essential feature of complainant's device was that the pavement should be laid in separate sections so that each section might be removed separately, or heave separately, because of the frost, the patentee disclaiming the formation of such blocks without the interposition of anything between the blocks while in the process of formation, while the defendant laid his pavement in one mass and then merely marked the surface to the depth of one sixteenth of an inch for purpose of ornamentation, there was no infringement.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Aff'd.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. M. A. Wheaton, for appellant.

Mr. Manuel Eyre, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit in equity, brought by the California Artificial Stone Paving Company, a California corporation, against F. W. Schalicke, to recover for the infringement of reissued [402] letters patent No. 4864, granted to John J. Schillinger, May 2, 1871, for an improvement in concrete pavements, on the surrender of original letters patent No. 105559, granted to him July 19, 1870. The specification and drawings of the reissued patent are as follows:

This invention relates to a concrete pavement, which is laid in sections, so that each section can be taken up and relaid without disturbing the adjoining sections. With the joints of this sectional concrete pavement are combined strips of tar paper, or equivalent material, arranged between the several blocks or sections in such a manner as to produce a suitable tight joint and yet allow the blocks to be raised separately without affecting the blocks adjacent thereto.

In carrying out my invention, I form the concrete by mixing cement with sand and gravel, or other suitable material, to form a plastic compound, using about the following proportions: One part, by measure, of cement, one part, by measure, of sand, and from three to six parts, by measure, of gravel, with sufficient water to render the mixture plastic; but I do not confine myself to any definite proportions or materials for making the concrete composition. [403] While the mass is plastic, I lay or spread the same on the foundation or bed of the pavement, either in molds or between movable joists of the proper thickness, so as to form the edges of the concrete blocks, a, a, one block being formed after the other. When the first block has set I remove the joists or partitions between it and the block next to be formed, and then I form the second block, and so on, each succeeding block being formed after the adjacent blocks have set [and, since the concrete in setting shrinks, the second block, when set, does not adhere to the first, and so on], and, when the pavement is completed, each block can be taken up independent of the adjoining blocks. Between the joints of the adjacent blocks are placed strips, b, of tar paper, or other suitable material, in the following manner: After completing one block, a, I place the tar paper, b, along the edge where the next block is to be formed, and I put the plastic composition for such next block up against the tar paper joint, and proceed with the formation of the new block until it is completed. In this manner I proceed until the pavement is completed, interposing tar paper between the several joints, as described. The paper constitutes a tight water-proof joint, but it allows the several blocks to heave separately, from the effects of frost, or to be raised or removed separately, whenever occasion may arise, without injury to the adjacent blocks. The paper, when placed against the block first formed, does not adhere thereto, and therefore the joints are always free between the several blocks, although the paper may adhere to the edges of the block or blocks formed, after the same has been set up in its place between the joints. [In such cases, however, where cheapness is an object, the tar paper may be omitted, and the blocks formed without interposing anything between their joints, as previously described. In this latter case, the joints soon fill up with sand or dust, and the pavement is rendered sufficiently tight [404] for many purposes, while the blocks are detached from each other, and can be taken up and relaid, each independent of the adjoining blocks.]

What I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

1. A concrete pavement laid in detached blocks or sections, substantially in the manner shown and described.

2. The arrangement of tar paper, or its equivalent, between adjoining blocks of concrete, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

On the first of March, 1875, Schillinger filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer, in which he disclaimed the matter above enclosed in brackets; and stated also that he disclaimed "the forming of blocks from plastic material without interposing anything between their joints while in the process of formation."

The only defense set up in the answer is non-infringement. After a hearing, on proofs, the circuit court dismissed the bill, on the ground that the defendant's pavement did not infringe either one of the two claims of the patent.

This patent has been construed by several circuit courts since the disclaimer was filed. In Schillinger v. Gunther, 14 Blatchf. 152, in the Southern District of New York, in February, 1877, the defendant's pavement had a bottom layer of coarse cement, on which was laid a course of fine cement, divided into blocks by a trowel run through that course while plastic. It possessed the advantage of Schillinger's invention, because any blocks in the upper course could be taken up without injury to the adjoining blocks. Concrete pavement having been before laid in sections, without being divided into blocks, the invention of Schillinger was held to consist in dividing the pavement into blocks, so that one block could be removed and repaired without injury to the rest of the pavement, the division being effected by either a permanent or a temporary interposition of something between the blocks. It was held that the effect of the disclaimer was to leave the patent to be one for a pavement wherein the blocks are formed by interposing some separating material between the joints; that to limit the patent to the permanent interposition of a material equivalent to tar paper, would limit the actual invention; that using the trowel accomplished the substantial results of the invention in substantially the same way devised by Schillinger; that the only difference in result was that the defendant's method left an open joint; that having a tight joint was not a material part of Schillinger's invention; and that the mode of operation involved in using the trowel was within the first claim of the reissue as it stood after the disclaimer. [405]

In the same suit (17 Blatchf. 66), in August, 1879, it was held that the disclaimer took out of the first claim of the reissue only so much thereof as claimed a concrete pavement made of plastic material laid in detached blocks, without interposing anything between the joints in the process of formation, leaving the claim to be one for such a pavement laid in detached blocks, when free joints are made between the blocks, by interposing tar paper or its equivalent.

In California Arti. S. P. Co. v. Molitor, 7 Sawy. 190, in the District of California, in May, 1881, the defendant's pavement was made by cutting a lower course into sections with a trowel, to a greater or less depth, according to the character of the material, making a joint, and doing the same with an upper course, the upper joint being directly over the lower joint. Into the open joint, in each case, was loosely put some of the partially set material from the top of the laid course, answering the purpose of tar paper. A blunt and rounded joint marker, which was said to be $\frac{1}{16}$ or $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch in depth, was then run over the line of the joints, marking off the block. The pavement was weaker along the line of the joint than in any other place. This was held to be an infringement.

In California Arti. S. P. Co. v. Freeborn, 8 Sawy. 448, in the District of California, in January, 1883, it was held, that, where nothing was interposed in the joint between a newly laid block and one laid before, but, after the material in the newly laid block had partially set, a blunt and rounded joint marker, $\frac{1}{16}$ of an inch in depth, was run along the line between the newly laid block and the one laid before, there was no infringement. [406]

In Schillinger v. Greenway Brewing Co. 21 Blatchf. 383, in the Northern District of New York, in July, 1883, it was held that the second claim of the reissue was infringed by a concrete pavement which had an open cut made by a trowel entirely through two courses of material, the line of cut in the upper course being directly over the line of cut in the lower course; and that the interposition of the trowel, though temporary, was an equivalent for the tar paper, even though the joint was left open after the trowel was removed, and was not made tight.

In Kuhl v. Mueller, 21 Fed. Rep. 510, in the Southern District of Ohio, in June, 1884, it was held that the use of any marker was an infringement, which made a cut ordepression having the effect to cause the pavement to break by upheaval, or cracking, from any cause, along the line of the cut or depression; and that, as the blocks from the pavements laid by the defendant showed clear, distinct and complete lines of division, there was infringement, whether those lines were produced by a trowel or by a marker.

The evidence in the present case shows that the defendant, during the process of making his pavement, marked off its surface into squares. But the question is whether he, to any extent, divided it into blocks, so that the line of cracking was controlled, and induced to follow the joints of the divisions, rather than the body of the block, and so that a block could be taken out, and a new one put in its place, without disturbing or injuring an adjoining block. The specification makes it essential that the pavement shall be so laid in sections "that each section can be taken up and relaid without disturbing the adjoining sections." Again, it says that the joint between the blocks "allows the several blocks to heave separately, from the effects of frost, or to be raised or removed separately, whenever occasion may arise, without injury to the adjacent blocks." This is essential; and in all the cases where infringement has been held to have been established, there have been blocks substantially separate, made so by the permanent or temporary interposition of a separating medium or a cutting instrument, so that one block could upheave or be removed without disturbing the adjoining [407] blocks. The patentee, in the disclaimer, expressly disclaimed "the forming of blocks from plastic material without interposing anything between their joints while in the process of formation."

It appears that the defendant laid his pavement in strips from the curb of the sidewalk inward to the fence, in one mass, and then marked the strip crosswise with a blunt marker, which is made an exhibit, to the depth of about one sixteenth of an inch. But it is not shown that this produced any such division into blocks as the patent speaks of, even in degree. There were no blocks produced, and, of course, there was nothing interposed between blocks. The mass underneath was solid, in both layers, laterally. So far as appears, what the defendant did was just what the patentee disclaimed. The marking was only for ornamentation, and produced no free joints between blocks, and the evidence as to the condition of the defendant's pavements after they were laid shows that they did not have the characteristic features above mentioned as belonging to the patented pavement.

Without affirming or disaffirming the constructions given to the patent in the particular cases cited from the circuit courts, we are of opinion that, under any construction which it is possible to give to the claims, the defendant in this case has not infringed.

Decree affirmed.

GREENWICH INSURANCE COMPANY, Piff. in Err., v. PROVIDENCE AND STONINGTON STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 481-484.)

Construction of insurance policy—to continue in force until terminated by notice from insured—payment for one month, not notice.

An agreement written upon the margin of an insurance policy provided that the policy should continue in force from the date of its expiration until notice was given to the insurer of its discontinuance, the assured to pay for such privilege pro rata for the time used. The payment by the assured for an additional month's insurance did not operate as notice, under this agreement, that the insurance was to be discontinued at the end of the month for which payment was made.

Submitted Nov. 8, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. William Allen Butler, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action on a policy of insurance, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff in error, to recover for the loss of the steamboat Rhode Island. It appeared on the trial that, on the 5th of April, 1880, the Providence and Stonington Steamship Company effected with the Greenwich Insurance Company a policy of marine insurance, numbered 2661, for $10,000, upon The Rhode Island, for the term of six months from date, with an agreement written in the margin as follows: "This policy to continue in force from the date of expiration until notice is given this Company of its discontinuance, the assured to pay for such privilege pro rata for the time used." The policy having been given in evidence, it was thereupon admitted by defendant's counsel that the steamer "Rhode Island" named in the policy was lost by a peril of the sea by running ashore on Bonnett's Point, in Narragansett Bay, November 6, 1880, and thereby suffered damage beyond the amount of the insurance, and that the plaintiff thereafter gave due notice and proof of the loss and interest. The amount of the insurance money and interest to the date of trial was thereupon proved to be the sum of $11,333.18.

The defendant's counsel then gave in evidence a letter written on behalf of the plaintiff to, and received by, the defendant on the day it bore date, which was as follows, to wit:

"Providence & Stonington Steamship Co.,
Treasurer's Office
"NEW YORK, Oct. 9, 1880.

"The Greenwich Ins. Co., New York:

"Gents: Herewith please find our check for sixty-six $\frac{44}{100}$ dolls., being one monthly premium, from Oct. 5 to Nov. 5, '80, on insurance on strs. Massachusetts & Rhode Island, as specified in your policies Nos. 2661 & 2662.

"Yours resp'y, C. G. BABCOCK, Treas."

Plaintiff's counsel admitted that the letter was accompanied by the check of the plaintiff for $66.66, and that no other or further notice was given by the plaintiff to the defendant before the happening of the loss. The evidence being closed, the defendant's counsel prayed the court to rule and decide:

First. That the privilege written on the margin of the policy was wholly for the benefit of the assured, and gave them the option of continuing the policy in force after the date of expiration named in it without doing any act or thing; that the only notice or act on the part of the assured called for by the privilege was notice of the time of discontinuance whenever the assured should elect to give such notice, and make payment for the time used under the privilege.

Second. That in the absence of any such act or notice on the part of the assured the policy and the risk continued from day to day under the terms of the privilege.

Third. That it was competent for plaintiff to make the time, which was left indefinite and uncertain by the terms of the privilege, definite and certain, and to fix the time to be used under the privilege by proper notice or act for that purpose.

Fourth. That the act of the plaintiff, on October 9, 1880, after date of expiration of the policy had passed, and the policy was in force under the privilege only, in paying one month's premium, and specifying the period of one month, beginning October 5, 1880, and ending November 5, 1880, as the time for which payment was made, was in law an election to continue the risk in force for that month, and that the legal effect of the transaction was to continue the policy in force until November 5, at noon, and no longer.

And thereupon defendant's counsel prayed the court to direct a verdict for the defendant. This was refused, and the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff.

This is the whole case; and the only question is whether the sending of the check for an additional month's insurance was, in legal effect, a notice of the discontinuance of the policy after that time. The agreement written in the margin of the policy was that the policy should continue in force from the date of its expiration until notice was given to the Insurance Company of its discontinuance, the assured to pay for such privilege pro rata for the time used. It did not specify when, or how often, such pro rata payments should be made. The plaintiff might have waited a year before making a payment, unless the Insurance Company had demanded an earlier payment. The plaintiffs elected to make a monthly payment, and made it. It seems to us very clear that the mere making of such a payment was not, and did not amount to, a notice to discontinue the policy, or an election to have it continued in force for the month for which the payment was made, and no longer. The plan adopted by the plaintiffs, to pay from month to month, was a reasonable one and favorable to the Insurance Company. It would have been a less favorable one to have deferred any payment longer, and a more favorable one to have paid for a longer time, when they did make a payment. But in whatever manner they chose to arrange their payments, it did not affect the terms of the policy. That continued in force by the terms of it, until the plaintiffs gave notice of its discontinuance. To say that a mere payment for a specified time would amount in law to such a notice, would make it dangerous for them to make any payment at all until they met with a loss. Even if in making a payment they should make an express stipulation or proviso that it was not intended as a notice of discontinuance, such a stipulation would be of no avail, if the defendants are right in the position they take. This, we think, would be an unreasonable construction of the contract and of the acts of the assured done in pursuance of it.

We cannot say that such a contract is a desirable one for insurers to make. Ordinarily, on an insurance for a specified time or adventure, such as a year for example, or a voyage, they get their premium in advance for the risk of the whole period or adventure; and if a loss happen ever so soon after the insurance is effected, no abatement of the premium is made. This gives them the benefit of average losses in determinate times or adventures, which is the solid basis on which all insurance rests. But the Insurance Company saw fit to make the contract in the form they did; and having made it, they are bound by its terms. And according to that contract, we think that they continued to be liable for a loss, although it happened after the time covered by the premiums already paid, the assured being only liable to pay pro rata for the time used, and not yet paid for.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ERASTUS A. NICHOLS ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 485–491.)

Adverse claims to placer mine—Statute of the United States as to—Civil Code of Montana as to actions for determining right to possession of real estate.

1. An adverse claimant to a placer mine, who has executed an instrument by which he agrees to convey the premises in dispute, at some future time, to a tenant in possession may, under the Code of Montana and sections 2335 and 2326, R. S., maintain an action in the courts of Montana to determine the right to the possession of the premises in dispute.

2. Where the plaintiffs in their petition assert claim to a certain tract, and the defendants in their answer admit that they have applied for a patent for the same tract, the conflict as to the right of possession sufficiently appears. If defendants did not wish to contest plaintiffs' claim they should have disclaimed.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Edward O. Wolcott, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith, Wm. Herbert Smith and F. C. Ford, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana. The suit was brought in the District Court of that Territory to settle the controverted right to a patent from the United States for a placer mine, under sections 2325 and 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It is therein enacted that a person who has located and set up a claim for mineral lands, and who desires to get a patent for it, shall file in the proper land-office an application for such patent, showing a compliance with the laws on that subject, and a plat and field notes of the claim, and shall post a copy of such plat, with a notice of the application for the patent, in a conspicuous place on the land, for sixty days. If no adverse claim for the same is filed with the register within sixty days from this publication, and if the papers are otherwise in proper form, the patent shall issue; but where an adverse claim is filed during the period of publication, it shall be upon oath of the person making the same, showing the nature, boundaries and extent of his claim, and "It shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within thirty days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to determine the question of the right of possession, and prosecute the same with reasonable diligence to final judgment."

In the case before us the defendants, Nichols and Fuller, having made their application for a patent for a placer mine, the plaintiffs in error, the widow and heirs of Nelson Wolverton, filed the requisite claim in the register's office, adverse to that of Nichols and Fuller, in due time, and afterwards, in compliance with the Act of Congress, instituted the present suit in the District Court of Montana to determine the right of possession. Upon the trial of this case before a jury, the plaintiffs made what appears to be satisfactory proof that Nelson Wolverton had in his lifetime taken the necessary steps to establish his claim to the mine, or to that part of it now in contest, and had been dead about two years when these proceedings were commenced. In the course of the production of the plaintiffs' evidence it was developed by cross-examination that Mrs. Wolverton, acting for herself and as guardian of the two children of her deceased husband, had executed and delivered the following instrument:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Margaret J. Wolverton, widow of Nelson Wolverton, deceased, for myself, and as guardian [487] for Eva Jane Wolverton and William Arthur Wolverton, infants under the age of twenty-one years, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to me in hand paid by the Colorado and Montana Smelting Company, and the further consideration of said company prosecuting to a successful conclusion the cause of J. R. Clark, administrator of the estate of Nelson Wolverton, deceased, et al. v. Silas F. King, now pending in the District Court in and for Silver Bow County, have covenanted and agreed, and by these presents do covenant and agree, to convey, by a good and sufficient deed of conveyance, duly acknowledged, all that certain land bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a point on the easterly extremity of certain placer mining claims belonging to the estate of the said Nelson Wolverton, and located in Independence Mining District, Silver Bow County, Territory of Montana, in Township No. 3 North, Range No. 8 West of the principal meridian, which said point is due east from the most southerly point of a certain fence running westerly therefrom along the general course of said Silver Bow Creek; thence in a due west line from said point, touching the most southerly point of said fence, a distance of about thirteen hundred feet, to a point on the westerly extremity of placer mining claim number two hundred and thirty; thence from said point due south along the westerly boundary of said last-named placer claim to the most southerly boundary thereof; thence along the most southerly boundary of said placer mining claim, and placer mining claims numbers 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241 and 242, in an easterly direction, to the southeast corner of said placer mining claim number two hundred and forty-two; thence in a northerly direction from said corner to the point or place of beginning; it being intended to convey all that part of said placer mining claims numbered from two hundred and thirty to two hundred and forty-two, both inclusive, which lies south of the most southerly point of the fence first above mentioned: To have and to hold the same unto the said The Colorado and Montana Smelting Company, their successors and assigns, for their own benefit and behoof forever.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto placed my hand and seal this 12th day of May, eighteen [488] hundred and eighty-one.

"MARGARET J. WOLVERTON, [Seal.]
"MARGARET J. WOLVERTON, [Seal.]
As guardian for Eva Jane Wolverton and William Arthur Wolverton.
"In presence of CALEB E. IRVINE."

It was proved that the Colorado and Montana Smelting Company, who had held this property for two years under a lease, or as tenants of the Wolvertons, were now in the actual control and possession of the property mentioned in this instrument. An attempt was also made to show that they had performed the condition mentioned in it, and were entitled to the conveyance which that instrument provided should be made when this was done. Thereupon, at the suggestion of defendant's counsel, the court ordered a nonsuit. This judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the Territory, and is the subject of consideration here.

The ground upon which this nonsuit was ordered is that the plaintiffs were not in the actual possession of the property at the time of the trial, and that under the Statute of Montana, section 354 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this was an absolute necessity to the successful prosecution of this action. That section is in the following words:

"An action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or his tenant, of real property, against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate or interest."

But whatever may be the effect of that statute in an ordinary action which has no direct relation to the proceedings under the Act of Congress which we have referred to, we are of opinion that, as applicable to such a case, the construction given by the court is entirely too restricted. The proceedings in this case commenced by the assertion of the defendants' claim to have a patent issue to them for the land in controversy. The next step was the filing of an adverse claim by the plaintiffs in the land-office, and the present suit is but a [489] continuation of those proceedings, prescribed by the laws of the United States, to have a determination of the question as to which of the contesting parties is entitled to the patent. The Act of Congress requires that the certified copy of the judgment of the court shall be filed in the land-office and shall be there conclusive. And we must keep this main purpose of the action in view in any decision made with regard to the rights of the parties.

It appears from the evidence that at the time these proceedings took place in the land-office the smelting company was in possession as the tenant of the Wolvertons, and that the contract by which Mrs. Wolverton undertook upon certain conditions, to convey all the right of the Wolverton heirs to the smelting company was made after the commencement of those proceedings. It might very well be maintained that, having thus commenced such proceedings, at a time when the possession was in the Wolvertons, they could be conducted to a termination in their name. But however that may be, it is quite clear, upon the testimony before us, that Mrs. Wolverton had not completely parted with her interest and that of her children in the land in controversy, at the time of the trial. The language of the instrument, by which this is supposed to have been done, is that she will thereafter convey the lands described. This conveyance has never been made. The whole thing rests in promise or covenant to do it in the future. This covenant also is that it shall be done by a good and sufficient deed of conveyance. These words have always been held to mean a conveyance of a good title, and though in point of fact the legal title was in the United States, as it is yet, still the parties understood very well that they were dealing with regard to a class of claims which the United States by statute and otherwise had always recognized, and the meaning of the covenant was that she should convey such an interest in the property as would enable the other parties, if they chose, to obtain the patent from the government. She, therefore, was interested to defeat the claim of the defendants, who were seeking to get that patent; it was her duty and her interest to contest their claim and have the right [490] to the patent decided in favor of the claims which she set up as being derived from her late husband. This was necessary to enable her to make that "good and sufficient conveyance" which this covenant required, and which had never been made, and if she had stood by and permitted the defendants to obtain the patent from the United States she would have been unable to comply with her contract to convey a good and sufficient title to the smelting company. In fact, so far as regards the right of possession, which alone is in controversy in this suit, the interest, the claim and the rights of the plaintiffs, the Wolvertons, and of the smelting company, are in privity with each other and are identical. And, inasmuch as this is a contest provided for by the Statutes of the United States in order that the officers of the land department may be informed which of the two contestants before it is entitled to the patent, we see no reason why the plaintiffs here should not have been permitted to have the verdict of a jury on that question in this suit. And, since such possession as the smelting company had was a part of and in subordination to the title of the Wolvertons, the judgment in this case between the parties to this suit would have settled the question which the Act of Congress required to be settled. We are of opinion, therefore, that, so far as regards this, the main ground on which the court below directed a nonsuit, that court erred.

Something is said in the brief about the fact that the plaintiffs have failed to show that the possession of these parties conflicted. On that point it is sufficient to say that the plaintiffs, in their petition, asserted a claim to the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 23, in Township 3 North, Range 8 West of the principal meridian of Montana, and that the defendants, in their answer, admit that they have applied for a patent for the same land exactly. If they did not desire to have the question of the right of possession to any part of these forty acres submitted to a jury on the ground that they did not claim it, they should have made a disclaimer. Apart from this, so far as relates to the evidence on the subject, we are of opinion that there was sufficient to go to the jury to show that the plaintiffs' claim did include a part of that claimed by the defendants in this action. [491

For these reasons the judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Action on guaranty—letter of credit—evidence.

In an action on a written guaranty in which the guarantors stated that they would "satisfy all orders Mr. Gillman gives this spring, such as plows and cultivators," the original order, given by the principal prior to the guaranty, and which was not referred to in the guaranty, was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the guarantors had been released by the giving of credit by the plaintiff different from that contemplated. The guaranty was complete in itself, and no additional agreement as to the character of the credit to be given could be imported into it by parol.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. H. K. Whiton, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. R. D. Mussey, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court [492 of the Territory of Dakota. The action was brought by the Moline Plow Company, as plaintiff, against Herman Gilbert and Jacob Schartzel, defendants. It was tried before a jury, and verdict rendered for the plaintiff. This judgment, on appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory, was affirmed. The suit was founded on the following instrument in writing, signed by the defendants:

"SIOUX FALLS, D. T., March 9, 1878.

"Moline Plow Co., Moline Ill.

"Sirs: We, the undersigned, are acquainted with Peter Gillman, of this place (formerly of Fond Du Lac, Wis.), and have no hesitation in indorsing him as an honest, capable business man and deserving of confidence and credit. We think your informant, in regard to Mr. Gillman's business ability and capacity, was in error, if not selfish and malicious. We will satisfy all orders Mr. Gillman gives this spring, such as plows and cultivators.

"WM. B. DICK.
"H. GILBERT.
"JACOB SCHARTZEL."

It seems that on January 21, 1878, Peter Gillman had sent an order to the Moline Plow

Company requesting them to forward him certain goods in which they were dealing, and specifying the terms of payment, with which they declined to comply on the ground that they were not sufficiently advised of his responsibility. After obtaining the above instrument, signed by the defendants, Gillman inclosed it to the Plow Company with the following letter:

"SIOUX FALLS, D. T., March 9, 1878.
"Moline Plow Co., Moline, Ill.

"Sir: Will you accept my order under the recommend inclosed; if so, ship me the breakers as ordered; also the cultivators, and about 6 vibrating harrows. Hoping we will get better acquainted, I am sorryabout such a report as stated to you, and I know you will think so [493] much more of me. (Too late in season for harrows.)

"I remain, yours, PETER GILLMAN.

"If you accept my order, please ship the goods at once, and oblige "P. G."

The plaintiffs accepted the guaranty, notified Gillman that it was accepted, and forwarded the goods. The dealings between these parties under this guaranty continued during the spring, the last shipment being made about May 24, 1878. On July 28, following, a settlement was made, and for the balance found due from Gillman to plaintiffs two notes were given, one payable September 15, 1878, and the other November 15, 1878.

An attempt was made by the defendants to show that credits were given in this transaction which released them from the liability of their letter of credit or guaranty. To establish this they insisted that the original order given by Gillman in January was to be taken as a part of, or an explanation of, their letter of credit. The court held that the letter of credit was complete within itself, and that the defendants could not import into it by parol any additional agreement as to the time and character of the credit to be given to Gillman, and instructed the jury to that effect. This is the principal error relied upon to reverse the judgment, which we think is no error.

The instrument sued on contains no reference to the previous letter of Gillman to the Plow Company, nor any restriction as to the terms on which they held themselves liable for his orders, except that they shall be given "this spring." The language used is, "We will satisfy all orders Mr. Gillman gives this spring, such as plows and cultivators." The letter from Gillman dated March 9, referring to his previous order, is in fact a new order of that date, and evidently made under and in pursuance of the guaranty of the defendants. All the goods delivered to Gillman by the plaintiffs for which suit is now brought against the de-[494] fendants were delivered during that spring, and were delivered after the receipt of this guaranty. The court was right therefore in not permitting the defendants to explain or qualify that guaranty by the parol testimony which they offered. Nor do we see anything in the testimony, as found in the bill of exceptions, to discharge the defendants from the obligation incurred by the letter of credit, or guaranty, whichever it may be.

An error is assigned by the brief, on the admission in evidence on the part of the plaintiffs of a letter-press copy of a letter of the Moline Plow Company to Gillman, signed by Lobdell, the witness, on the part of that Company. It is a reply to the letter received from Gillman of March 9, 1878, inclosing the guaranty, and reads as follows:

"PETER GILLMAN, Esq., Sioux Falls D. T.

"Yours of the 9th is at hand and satisfactory. We will ship your goods in a day or so, and hope they will arrive promptly.

"LOBDELL."

The objection was made that it was a letter-press copy and not the original. Without deciding whether a letter-press copy can always be introduced in place of the original, as is contended by the counsel for the defendants in error, it is sufficient to say that Lobdell, the witness, had previously testified, without objection, that he had acknowledged the receipt of the letter of guaranty and order by a letter to Gillman, in which he told him that the goods would be shipped in a few days. The introduction of this copy was, therefore, wholly immaterial. And even without such proof the acknowledgment of the letter of Gillman was unnecessary to fix the liability of the defendants, and could have worked no prejudice.

These are all the assignments of error worthy of attention, and the judgment of the Supreme Court is therefore affirmed.

CHICAGO AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Piff. in Err., [566]

v.

E. J. McLAUGHLIN, EXR. of JOHN M. O'NEIL, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 566–581.)

Liability to employee for negligence of fellow servant under Iowa Statute—constitutionality of Act—conflict with Fourteenth Amendment to Constitution of United States.

While an employee of a railroad company was engaged in the removal of a lamp bracket from a car, standing upon a side track, he was thrown from a ladder, and injured by a car and locomotive being run upon the side track, through the opening of a switch. He recovered judgment for $15,000. Upon the trial and upon the writ of error here it was insisted by the Railroad Company that the employee was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, in not observing the approaching engine and car, and that the Statute of Iowa permitting a recovery in such a case was in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which provides that no State shall "deny to any person, within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws," and that the Railroad Company was not guilty of negligence. The defendant in error insisted that the switchman, the fireman upon the engine, and the engineer were all guilty of negligence. These questions were presented by exceptions to certain instructions given and refused, and this court being equally divided upon the questions, the judgment below stands affirmed.

Argued Nov. 29, 30, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa. Affirmed.

An action was brought in the Circuit Court of Clinton County, Iowa, by the defendant in error's testator. Upon the petition of the plaintiff in error, alleging that it was a foreign Corporation, and that from prejudice and local influence it would not be able to obtain justice in the state court, the cause was transferred to the United States Circuit Court. The defendant in error (plaintiff below) alleged in his petition that, while in the employment of the plaintiff in error (defendant below) as a coach builder, and specially employed to put on and remove lamp brackets on a car at the time, and while properly and not negligently performing his duties on one of the defendant's cars, standing on one of the defendant's side tracks, the plaintiff being at a height of six or seven feet from the ground on a ladder which was inclined against the car, his position became suddenly dangerous by reason of the shifting of certain switches and running an engine and a car on the track where he was at work. That the switchman saw plaintiff in this position, which became dangerous by said acts, and although said switchman could easily have prevented collision and injury of plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care and caution in either apprising plaintiff of the sudden approach of said engine, or turning the brake on said car, or causing the engineer to stop the car, he failed to do so, but carelessly and heedlessly caused said collision to take place to plaintiff's injury. That the fireman upon the said engine saw that plaintiff was exposed to danger and peril, and permitted said collision to take place, although by the exercise of ordinary care he could have prevented the same by notifying the engineer. That the engineer in charge of the engine thrown upon said track was ordered to stop his engine by reason of plaintiff's peril, and could easily have obeyed said instruction, but heedlessly and carelessly refused to inform himself of such peril, and with a negligent disregard of consequences hurried said engine on to a collision. That the facts rendering plaintiff's position perilous by reason of the movements of said engine and cars were to plaintiff entirely unknown, although due care and caution were exercised by him.

The defendant below denied the allegations of the petition, and alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury in this; he failed to notice or listen for the approach of engine or cars, and failed to get off the ladder when the engine and car which caused the injury approached the line of cars where plaintiff was at work, in plain sight of plaintiff with the bell ringing to warn persons of their coming.

The case was submitted to a jury. It was shown that the plaintiff was required, in the performance of his duty as an employee of the Railway Company as a repairer of cars, to perform work on and about its trains. At the time of the injury he was acting under the direct orders and instructions of his superior. He stood upon a ladder, and at the time of the injury was facing westwardly while the engine which caused the injury came from the east. Before he exposed himself in his work of repairing, he found from examination of the switches that four switches must be turned east of him before a car could enter the track on which he was working, and the employees when required to turn such switches could plainly see him on the ladder. From his position on the ladder the plaintiff could not see the nearest switch, the turning of which threw the car and engine on to the track causing the injury, because the lever was on the north side obscured by the standing cars. Just before the accident, plaintiff with a hammer was breaking screws which held the lamp bracket, with his face within four or five inches of the cars. There were from twenty to thirty trains each way per day, and two switch engines in the yard all day, keeping up a clatter and constant ringing of bells.

O'Neil didn't know of the approach of the engine. He stated he could have heard the click of the engine going over the switches if he had been listening. The tracks are straight at that place and the cut-offs are diagonally across. The plaintiff had been upon the ladder probably two minutes when the car was struck. He had drawn two screws, and broken two off, making some noise but not a great deal. His feet were about six feet from the ground. To look eastward, the direction the engine came from, he would have to step down or lean back some ways; otherwise his line of vision would be obstructed by the cars. He received no warning. Had the engine and car intended to pass northward, plaintiff could not have discovered any change of the switch which would have allowed them to pass upon the track where he was stationed. The engine could not have come upon the track where the plaintiff was stationed, without a change in the switch which was concealed from his view, and if he had seen the engine with the cars upon the main track, and heard the bell ringing, he would not have considered it a warning to get down, as he would have assumed that they were going on the other track, and expected to be warned of a change in the switch, and exposure thereby to danger. Plaintiff testified that if the bell of the engine that struck the cars had been ringing as it came up, he most certainly would have heard it. There was nothing to prevent switchmen, engineers and firemen, coming in and crossing over the switches bearing to the northward, from seeing plaintiff at his work standing upon the ladder. The switchman saw the plaintiff on the ladder at a distance from the point where the striking cars caused the injury; "thought he would get down; didn't pay much attention to it." The fireman saw the plaintiff when about thirty feet from the point where the car was struck; did not state the fact to the engineer, but "just said whoa; was going to tell him to stop, that there was a car repairer on a ladder on the side of the car; but before I could say any more he got the signal on his own side of the switch engine to come ahead." When the engineer heard the word "whoa," he turned his engine back, and the car would hardly have struck unless, upon the signal he received to go ahead, he had turned her ahead again. The engineer knew it was the duty of the fireman to warn him of danger, and he obeyed his signal to stop by reversing the lever. He did not inquire why the fireman ordered him to stop, but sent the engine ahead on the signal of the switchman. The switch engine went on to the track where plaintit was stationed, about twenty times each day, to put away or to get away cars. Two switch engines were used in the yard in the day time.

The court gave to the jury instructions of which the following were excepted to:

"4. Under the Statute of the State of Iowa every corporation operating a railway is liable for all injuries caused to, and the consequent damages sustained by, the employees of such corporation in consequence of the neglect of a coemployee in the performance of his duty to the company; that is to say, the negligence of an employee in the discharge of the duties of his position in the employ of the company is deemed to be the negligence of the corporation, and will render the company liable for any injuries caused thereby to any of its other employees, unless the person injured is himself guilty of negligence contributing to the accident.

"14. It is claimed on part of the plaintiff that the switchman on the south side saw O'Neil's danger in time sufficient to have averted the danger.

"On part of defendant it is claimed that this switchman did not see O'Neil in time; and under such circumstances as that, it was his duty [575] either to have stopped the engine or warned the plaintiff of the danger. Has the plaintiff by a fair preponderance of evidence satisfied you that this switchman had knowledge of plaintiff's danger in time sufficient to have averted the accident either by stopping the engine or through a warning to the engineer, or by notifying plaintiff of the coming danger, so that he could have avoided the accident?

"It is not sufficient for it now to appear that possibly the switchman might have done so if he had known all the facts that are now made apparent. The true inquiry is, Was this switchman, acting under the light and knowledge he then had, wanting in the exercise of ordinary care in not stopping the engine or in not notifying plaintiff of his danger? Did he or not have knowledge of the danger to which plaintiff was exposed in time sufficient to enable him by the use of ordinary care to have caused the engine to be stopped, or to warn the plaintiff so that he might have gotten down from the ladder before the cars came in contact?

"15. It is further claimed on behalf of plaintiff that the fireman, Riggs, was negligent in not notifying the engineer of the peril to which plaintiff was exposed. There is evidence tending to show that Riggs saw the plaintiff upon the ladder and knew of his position, and that there was danger of an injury being caused to him if he did not get down before the cars came in contact; that Riggs gave a signal to the engineer to stop in time to prevent the cars coming into contact, which signal the engineer obeyed by shutting off the steam and reversing the engine.

"On the part of plaintiff it is claimed that Riggs should have notified the engineer of the necessity for stopping the engine; namely, that there was a man in a dangerous position; and it is claimed that Riggs had time sufficient to have so done, so that the engineer could have prevented the cars coming in contact.

"On part of defendant it is claimed that Riggs did all that could reasonably be expected of him; that he gave the proper signal to stop the engine, and that in obedience thereto the engineer reversed his engine and brought it nearly to a stop, and then, before Riggs had time to ascertain the necessity for any further action on his part, the engineer, in obedience to a signal from the switchman, which could not have been reasonably foreseen by Riggs, gave a forward motion to the engine, and that it was beyond the power of Riggs to again notify the [576] engineer to stop in time to prevent the accident.

"16. It was the duty of Riggs, if he saw the plaintiff was in a dangerous position, and that there was risk of an accident if the cars were brought into contact before plaintiff should get down from the ladder, to take such action as was reasonably within his power to stop the engine and prevent the cars from coming into contact.

"When human life or limbs are in peril, ordinary prudence requires that all reasonable means should be used by those who are aware of the danger to avert the same, and avoid injury to the person exposed thereto.

"Riggs himself testifies that he saw plaintiff upon the ladder; knew that he was in a dangerous position if the cars were brought into contact, and saw, as the engine approached the standing cars, that the plaintiff remained upon the ladder.

"Under these circumstances, was or was it not his duty to notify the engineer, who had control of the engine, of the nature of the danger to be avoided, or was his duty discharged when he gave the signal to stop by crying out 'Whoa'?

"Did he or did he not have sufficient time to give such information to the engineer, if you find the same should have been given?

"It is for you to determine what ordinary prudence, when human life and limb were in danger, required of Riggs under the facts and circumstances known to him at that time, and whether Riggs did or did not do all that ordinary prudence required of him, and all that he had a fair opportunity to do, in the exercise of ordinary care, and in the brief time in which he was required to think and act?

"17. It is further claimed on part of plaintiff that the engineer did not exercise ordinary care and prudence on his part, in that, after receiving the signal to stop from the fireman, and after, in obedience thereto, reversing his engine and bringing the same nearly to a stop, he then, in obedience to a signal from the switchman on the north side of the track, gave a forward motion to the engine and brought the cars into contact, without first ascertaining the reason why the signal to stop was given by [577] the fireman. On part of defendant it is claimed that the switchman and fireman have a right to signal the engineer, and that it is the duty of the latter to obey such signals; and if the switchman gave the signal without fault on his part, there would not be negligence on part of engineer in obeying the signal thus given.

"18. That the engineer is bound to obey signals given by the switchmen is doubtless true, as a general proposition, but by this can only be meant that the engineer is bound to obey if there is no good reason why he should not obey.

"Suppose he received a signal from a switchman to move forward when he sees that if he does he will cause an accident, would it not then be clearly his duty to disobey the signal? Suppose that the instant he receives the signal from the switchman to move forward his fireman notifies him that there is a man on the track in danger, and that he must stop. It cannot be doubted that in such cases the engineer must disobey the signal from the switchman. Take it in this case. Suppose the engineer knew that the plaintiff was on the ladder, exposed to danger if the cars were brought into contact, and the switchman gave the signal to move forward, would it be acting with reasonable prudence to obey the signal, or would it not be clearly the duty of the engineer to disobey the same? But it is in evidence that the engineer in this case did not know in fact that the plaintiff was in danger. He had received a signal from his fireman, on the left of his engine, requiring him to stop, and he obeyed it by shutting off steam and reversing the engine.

"What inference did the engineer draw from the signal given him by the fireman to stop? Did he or did he not infer therefrom that there was some sufficient reason known to the fireman why the engine should be stopped? Was he not bound to so infer, and if he did, what was it his duty to do when he received the signal from the switchman on the other side of the track to move forward? Did or did not ordinary care and prudence require of him to ascertain from his fireman the reason of the order to stop given by the fireman on his left, before he obeyed the order to move forward given him by the switchman on his right?

[578] "The engineer himself testifies that the signal 'whoa' given by the fireman was given somewhat sharply, indicating the necessity for promptly stopping the engine; and he further testifies that from the distance from the engine to the stationary cars he supposed the order to stop was given by the fireman, not because the cars were close enough for coupling, but for some other cause or a reason unknown to him, and that he started the engine forward upon receiving the signal from the switchman without making any inquiry of the fireman whether he could safely do so, or without inquiring why the fireman had ordered him to stop the engine.

"In so doing, did or did not the engineer exercise the care which ordinary prudence demanded of him?

"19. If, under the instructions given you, you find that none of the employees of the Company were guilty of negligence causing the accident, then your verdict must be for defendant; and you need not consider any of the questions submitted to you.

"If, however, you find that the defendant was negligent in any of the particulars alleged against it, and that such negligence was the immediate cause of the injury to plaintiff, you will then consider whether the defense of contributory negligence set up by the defendant has been made out and sustained by a fair preponderance of the evidence, the burden of the issue in this respect being upon the defendant; or, in other words, in order to defeat plaintiff's recovery on the ground of contributory negligence on his part, you must be fully satisfied from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the injury complained of.

"21. Extraordinary care was not required of him. He was expected to do the work he was sent to attend to, and he could only be required [579] to exercise the care and watchfulness that were compatible with the discharge of his duty to the Company.

"Plaintiff testifies that he did not see or hear the engine when it was approaching, and it is claimed that his failure to notice its approach is proof of his negligence, on the theory that if he had kept his senses on the alert he would either have seen or heard the engine in time to have avoided the accident.

"On the part of plaintiff it is claimed that his failure to notice the approach of the engine was due to the fact that the work he was engaged in doing so occupied his attention that, without fault upon his part, he failed to notice the coming of the engine, either by sight or sound.

"You will consider all the evidence introduced in the case tending to show what work the plaintiff was required to do; the position he occupied upon the side of the car; the direction in which his face was turned whilst at work upon the ladder; the character of the work upon which he was actually engaged, and the demands, if any, which this work made upon his attention; the distance from where the plaintiff was at work to the point where the engine came upon track No. 2; the number of cars, if any, between that upon which plaintiff was at work and the approaching engine, and all facts shown by the evidence adduced by either party which tend to throw light upon the question; and from this evidence you will determine whether the defense of contributory negligence, as alleged by the defendant, has been established by a fair preponderance of evidence, the burden of establishing the same being, as already stated, upon the defendant.

"22. If the evidence, under the instructions given you, fails to establish the fact that the plaintiff was wanting in the exercise of proper care and watchfulness whilst engaged in repairing the way-car of defendant, then the defense of contributory negligence is not made out, and on this issue, you should then find for plaintiff; but, on the other hand, if you find that the failure of plaintiff to notice the approach of the engine was due to a want of ordinary care and watchfulness on part of plaintiff, you will then consider and determine whether the defendant had knowledge of the dangerous position of plaintiff and of his fail- [580] ure to notice the approach of the engine in time to have avoided the injury to plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable care on its part; the rule of law being that, although the plaintiff may have negligently exposed himself to an injury, yet if the defendant, after discovering the exposed situation and danger negligently incurred by the plaintiff, can, by the exercise of reasonable care on its part, prevent any injury to plaintiff it is bound so to do, and a failure to exercise such reasonable care, after knowledge of the danger to which plaintiff may be exposed, will render the defendant liable for a resulting injury, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff may have been in the first instance negligent on his part. Under such circumstances plaintiff's negligence is not deemed to be a proximate cause of the injury.

"If then you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, through his failure to notice the approach of the engine in time to get down from his exposed situation on the side of the way-car, was guilty of negligence contributing to the cause of the injury complained of, then your verdict must be for the defendant; unless you further find that, after discovering the fact that plaintiff was at work upon the way-car in such a manner as to expose him to danger in case the cars were brought into contact, the defendant could, by the exercise of proper care, have prevented the accident, and that having knowledge of the danger to which plaintiff was exposed the defendant failed to exercise proper care, thereby causing the accident, in which case your verdict should be for the plaintiff.

"That is to say, if you find from the evidence that the switchman, Wilde, and the fireman, Riggs, or either of them, saw the plaintiff in his exposed position, and knew the danger to which he would be exposed if the cars were brought into contact whilst the plaintiff was on the ladder, then it was the duty of such switchman or fireman, as already explained to you, to take such reasonable means as were fairly within his power, to prevent bringing the cars into contact, after he knew that plaintiff had failed to notice the approach of the engine.

"If by the use of such means on part of those in charge of the engine, the accident could have been prevented, and you find that [581] they have failed to use such means after having knowledge of the plaintiff's exposed position and failure to notice the approach of the engine, and that in consequence of such failure the accident was caused, then the fact that the plaintiff failed to notice the approach of the engine would not defeat his right of recovery."

The plaintiff in error also excepted to the refusal of the court to give the following:

"Conceding to all the testimony its greatest probative force, it is not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the defendant or any of its servants guilty of any negligence whereby the plaintiff received his injuries. The undisputed and uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which directly contributed to his injury. You are therefore instructed to find for the defendant."

The plaintiff recovered judgment for $15,000, and upon the writ of error to review that judgment here, it was insisted by the Railroad Company that the employee was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, in not observing the approaching engine and car, and that the Statute of Iowa permitting a recovery in such a case was in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which provides that no State shall "deny to any person, within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws." The defendant in error insisted that the switchman, the fireman upon the engine, and the engineer, were all guilty of negligence. These questions were presented by exceptions to the foregoing instructions given and refused.

While the case was here pending the death of the defendant in error was suggested, and his executor entered his appearance.

Messrs. Charles A. Clark and N. M. Hubbard, for plaintiff in error:

Three questions are involved: (1) Can any negligence be imputed to the defendant or its servant, by reason of which the plaintiff was injured? (2). Is not the plaintiff guilty of negligence which directly contributed to his injury? (3.) Is not the law of Iowa which makes railway companies liable for the negligence of one employee by reason of which another employee in the same grade of employ is injured repugnant to, and violative of, the last clause of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States? These questions all arise on instructions asked by defendant and refused by the court, and on instructions given by the court on its own motion. The court should have instructed the jury that the testimony was not sufficient to warrant it in finding the defendant or any of its servants guilty of any negligence, whereby the plaintiff received his injury. It should have instructed the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which directly contributed to his injury, and could not therefore recover. The fireman gave his signal to stop the engine in time; it was obeyed by the engineer, and if the switchman had not signaled to come ahead the engine and car would have been fully stopped. There is no pretense of wantonness on the part of the fireman, nor was he guilty of negligence in not anticipating that his order to stop would be countermanded. He acted with reasonable prudence in the emergency.

It is said that the plaintiff's attention was necessarily absorbed by his work, and the inference is drawn therefore that he did not need to be watchful, or look out for his own safety. It is enough to say that inattention is one of the very first definitions of negligence.

Miller v. R. R. Co. 25 Mich. 291.

Where the plaintiff has been guilty of neglect he cannot recover, unless the negligence of the defendant is such as to imply a disregard of consequences or a willingness to inflict the injury.

Lafayette & I. R. R. Co. v. Adams, 26 Ind. 76; R. R. Co. v. Hutchinson, 47 Ill. 409; Brownell v. Flagler, 5 Hill, 283; Rathbun v. Payne, 19 Wend. 399.

It is only in cases where negligence of the plaintiff is remote, and not proximate to the injury, that the defendant is liable for mere neglect.

Dowell v. Navigation Co. 85 Eng. Com. L. Rep. 5 E. & B. 194; Tanner's Exrs. v. R. R. Co. 60 Ala. 621; Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455.

That the Statute of Iowa is in conflict with the last clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution is within the decision of the court in County of Santa Clara v. R. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 385.

Mr. William A. Foster, for defendant in error:

Where the facts are in dispute, if different minds may draw different conclusions therefrom, the question is proper to be submitted to a jury.

Whether there was neglect on the part of the switchman was a question properly submitted to the jury.

R. R. Co. v. Stout, supra.

Whether sufficient warning was given to the engineer by the fireman, to stop the engine, was properly submitted to the jury.

Lombard v. R. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 494.

The instruction that although plaintiff may have negligently exposed himself to an injury, yet if the defendant, after it discovered the exposed station and danger negligently incurred by the plaintiff, could, by the exercise of reasonable care on its part, prevent any injury to plaintiff, a failure to exercise such reasonable care will render the defendant liable for the resulting injury, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff may have been, in the first instance negligent on his part, correctly stated the law.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 86, 25 and notes; Railway v. Still, 19 Ill. 499; Morris v. R. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 29; Lombard v. R. R. Co. supra; Moore v. R. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 688.

By the Code of Iowa, 1873, section 1807, chapter 5, it is provided that everyone operating a railway shall be liable to employees, etc. By section 1288 of the same chapter, this provision is applied to all lessees or other person owning or operating such railway. It thus appears that the statutory liability is not specially applicable to liabilities of corporation railways, but is general and applies to individuals as well; in fact applies alike to all engaged in the hazardous business of operating railways. The Constitution of Iowa provides (§ 30, art. 3): "All laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the State." This statute has been held by the Supreme Court of Iowa, to operate uniformly upon all persons under the circumstances therein contemplated, and to be constitutional.

McAunich v. Miss. & M. R. R. Co. 20 Iowa, 338; Deppe v. Chic. R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 52; Bucklew v. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 603.

The Santa Clara County Case, 18 Fed Rep. 385, simply held that a statute which permitted a citizen to deduct from the value of his land, when it was listed for taxation, any incumbrance that might be upon it, and forbidding a railroad corporation under the same circumstances from making the same deduction, was a violation of the constitutional provision. That decision has no application to the case in hand.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced that the judgment of the court below was Affirmed by a divided court.

[502] CHARLES H. BROOKS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

EDWARD S. CLARK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 502-513.)

Removal of causes—joint suit against partners—judgment by default against resident defendant—cause, not removable on petition of nonresident defendant—Statutes of Pennsylvania—construction of—practice.

1. A joint action on a joint liability against two defendants is not separable for purpose of removal from a state court, even after judgment by default against one of the defendants who is a citizen of the same State as the plaintiff.

2. In a joint action brought under a Statute of Pennsylvania against two partners, judgment was obtained by default against one of the defendants. The other, who was a nonresident, voluntarily entered his appearance "in the same suit." Upon his petition for removal it is held that the cause is not removable; said proceeding being auxiliary to the original suit, from which it is not separable.

3. It seems that a different rule would apply had the plaintiff proceeded against said nonresident by bringing another suit under a certain other Statute of Pennsylvania.

Submitted Nov. 17, 1886. Decided Dec. 13, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Frank P. Prichard and John G. Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

An original joint cause of action does not become separated into several controversies, simply because the defendants sever in their pleadings and defenses. A careful examination of the case on this subject will show that they group themselves into three classes, viz: First.—Where no judgment has been entered, but separate defenses have been raised by the defendants. In such cases one defendant cannot remove, because the plaintiff can still elect to treat the controversy as joint.

Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, 114 U. S. 52 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 63), is an example of this class.

Second.—Where the plaintiff has entered an interlocutory judgment by default against one defendant. In such cases the other defendant cannot remove, because the final judgment will still be joint, and the defendant against whom the interlocutory judgment was entered remains interested in and will be affected by the final judgment.

Putnam v. Ingraham, 114 U. S. 57 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 65), is an example of this class.

Third.—Where a final judgment has been rendered against one defendant. In such cases the other defendant can remove, because the defendant against whom final judgment has been entered, has been thus removed from the controversy, and is no longer interested in or affected by the result of the controversy with his codefendants.

Yulee v. Vose, 99 U. S. 539 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 355), is an example of this class.

Under Act of March 28, 1835, section 2, P. L. 89, and the supplemental Act of March 11, 1836, section 14, P. L. 76, if the defendant does not file an affidavit of defense, the plaintiff's counsel moves in open court for judgment, and when that is pronounced prepares an assessment of damages based upon the copy or affidavit of loan filed, and this assessment he files with the prothonotary, who signs and files it of record. This is a final judgment without any writ of inquiry or damages, it having been so decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Sellers v. Burk, 47 Pa. 344.

McClung v. Murphy, 2 Miles, 177.

Under the common law as it was recognized and enforced in Pennsylvania, there could not be, in an action against two defendants on a joint cause of action, two separate final judgments, unless it affirmatively appeared on the record that they were upon entirely different issues.

Williams v. M'Fall, 2 Serg. & R. 280; Ridgely v. Dobson, 3 Watts. & S. 118-128.

This common-law rule, as stated in the above decisions, worked considerable hardship. This led to the enactment of two statutes in Pennsylvania.

Act of April 6, 1830, P. L. 277; Act of April 4, 1877, P. L. 52.

The judgment of the circuit court amounts to this: That a controversy with a defendant who was not served until after the suit had been finally ended as to his codefendant—a controversy in which the jury will be sworn to try the issue as against him alone, a controversy in which the judgment will be for or against him alone, and will not affect any other person—is yet not a separable controversy, because it arises in a suit in which another person was originally a joint defendant. It is submitted that this judgment cannot be sustained without overturning the doctrine of the Removal Cases, and the other decisions of this court which have furnished a guide to the profession in interpreting the Act of 1875.

Mr. Pierce Archer, for defendant in error:

The case of Putnam v. Ingraham, 114 U. S. 57 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 65), 1884, is precisely the case in hand. If the law of that case prevails, then further argument is unnecessary.

In both cases were asserted joint liability as partners, separate defenses set up, wholly severable as to the nonresident defendant, with judgment by default against one defendant.

This is the latest definition of the Act. There are many others, all in harmony with it.

The Act of 1875 says: "In which there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States" from the plaintiff's State.

Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 593; Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336 (26: 563).

The contract and suit are joint, and defendants are not all citizens of other States than plaintiff, and suit cannot be removed.

Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 823), affirmed in Winchester v. Loud, 108 U. S. 130 (27: 677), and Ayers v. Watson, 113 U. S. 594 (28: 1093).

The defendants must all be citizens of other States than plaintiff's locus.

Removal Causes, and Blake v. McKim, supra; Shainwald v. Lewis, 106 U. S. 158 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 691).

It must be a separate and distinct cause of action, capable of separation into parts. If joint when begun, cannot remove.

Fraser v. Jennison, 106 U. S. 191-5 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 131); Ayres v. Wiswall, 112 U. S. 192-8 (28: 695); Field, Fed. Courts, 173.

If joint liability is claimed and one is a Pennsylvania citizen, the circuit court has not jurisdiction. Even if not served he may appear and plead to jurisdiction.

Per Drummond, J., Lovejoy v. Washburn, 1 Biss. 416.

"Where contract is joint as well as several, omission to serve does not confer jurisdiction." Id. 418.

Here Leeds Miller's executor is not served.

Railroad Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 556 (43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 377); Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 141 (58 U. S. 15: 161).

In Putnam v. Ingraham, supra, in Connecticut, Ingraham sued Putnam and Earle of New York, and Morgan of Connecticut, as partners, Putnam, Earle & Co. Putnam and Earle defended, and said it was Morgan's private debt before any partnership formed. Morgan defaulted, and judgment was rendered against him (pp. 58, 59). The court said, the fact that Morgan has not answered, but is in default, is unimportant. Judgment is allowed by statute separately, for default, but the suit is still on joint causes of action—default no difference—separate defense does not make separate cause of action. The only controversy is as to the right of plaintiff to recover against defendants.

L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, 114 U. S. 52 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 68); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 114 U. S. 60 (29: 66).

Separate answers and separate defenses do not make separable controversies; and if one defendant is of the plaintiff's State, the cause is not removable.

Joint contractors—joint contract—not divisible. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, supra.

As to the local Statutes of Pennsylvania, as it was said in Boyd v. Gill, 19 Fed. Rep. 148, "If a joint recovery is claimed upon a cause of action which justifies a joint recovery, then the 'controversy' is between the plaintiff and all the defendants."

The same local statute existed in Connecticut, in Putnam v. Ingraham, supra, of several liability in joint actions.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

[503] This is a writ of error brought under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. pt. 3, 470, for the review of an order of the circuit court remanding a case which had been removed from the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, of the County of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The facts are these:

On the 31st of December, 1884, Edward S. Clark sued out of the court of common pleas a writ of summons against "Charles H. Brooks and Josiah D. Brooks, surviving partners of D. Leeds Miller, deceased, trading as Brooks, Miller & Co.," returnable on the first Monday of January then next. Before the return of the writ Josiah D. Brooks indorsed thereon as follows:

"I accept service of within writ. Josiah D. Brooks."

On the 12th day of January, 1885, Clark filed an "affidavit of loan" in accordance with the provisions of a Statute of Pennsylvania, showing that the suit was brought for $15,000 balance due to him on the 31st of December, 1876, for moneys lent the firm of Brooks, Miller & Co., on which interest had been paid to October 30, 1884. Appended to this affidavit was what purported to be "a copy of account from de- [504] fendant's books," showing the loan and cash paid for interest. By a Statute of Pennsylvania it was lawful for the plaintiff, "on or at any time after the third Saturday succeeding" the return day of the writ, "on motion, to enter a judgment by default, * * * unless the defendant shall previously have filed an affidavit of defense, stating therein the nature and character of the same." Josiah D. Brooks did not file an affidavit of defense within the time thus limited, and accordingly on the 26th of January, 1885, the following entry was made in the cause:

"And now, on motion of Pierce Archer, Esq., the court enters judgment against the defendants for want of an affidavit of defense."

On the same day an assessment of damages was also filed in the cause, as follows:

"I assess damages as follows:

Real debt	$15,000 00
Int. from 10, 30, 84 to 1, 24, 85	210 00
	$15,210 00

"J. KENDERDINE, pro Proth'y."

This, according to the law and practice in Pennsylvania, was a final judgment in the action against Josiah D. Brooks for the amount of damages so assessed, and, accordingly, in the docket entries this appears:

"Jan'y 26, 1885. Judg't for want of aff. of defense against Josiah D. Brooks only.

"Eo die. Dam's assessed at $15,210.00."

On the third of February, 1885, Charles H. Brooks voluntarily caused to be indorsed on the original summons, then in court, the following:

"I accept service of the writ for Charles H. Brooks, with like force and effect as if the writ had been issued ret'd to the first Monday of [505] April and had been served on or before the first Monday of March, A. D. 1885.

"JOHN G. JOHNSON,
"Att'y., Ch. H. Brooks."

On the second day of May, 1885, Charles H. Brooks filed in the cause his affidavit of defense, in which he set forth, in substance, that, until the 31st of December, 1879, he was a member of the firm of Brooks, Miller & Co.; that previous to that time Clark had deposited moneys with the firm, and on that day there was due him $15,000, for which he held the firm's due bill; that on that day Josiah D. Brooks and Miller purchased the interest of Charles H. Brooks in the firm, paying him therefor $21,749.40, and assuming all the debts; that the partnership was thereupon dissolved, and Clark duly notified; that immediately on the dissolution, Josiah D. Brooks and Miller formed a new partnership, and continued the old business; that Clark was duly notified of the assumption by the new firm of all the debts of the old, and with this knowledge gave up the due bill of the old firm which he held, and took another for the same amount from the new firm in full satisfaction and discharge of the original indebtedness; and that the new firm paid the interest as it thereafter accrued until the time mentioned in the affidavit of loan; to wit, October 30, 1884. On this state of facts, Charles H. Brooks insisted, by way of defense, that he was discharged from all liability.

Immediately on filing this affidavit of defense Charles H. Brooks presented a petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, the material parts of which are as follows:

"The petition of Charles H. Brooks, defendant above named, who was sued with Josiah D. Brooks, as surviving partners, etc., respectfully represents: that the controversy in this suit is between citizens of different States; that your petitioner was at the time of the commencement of this suit, and still is, a citizen of the State of New York, and that the said plaintiff, Edward S. Clark, was then, and still is, a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, and that the [506] matter and amount in dispute in the said suit exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars."

On the 23d of May, 1885, the suit was entered by Charles H. Brooks in the circuit court, and, on the 8th of September following, Clark moved that it be remanded. Afterwards, on the 8th of October, this motion was granted, "it appearing by inspection of the record that the defendants are not both citizens of another State than the plaintiff, and that said Josiah D. Brooks is a citizen of Pennsylvania."

To reverse that order this writ of error was brought.

The action as originally brought was a joint [509] action on a joint liability of Josiah D. Brooks and Charles H. Brooks as partners, and, according to Putnam v. Ingraham, 114 U. S. 57 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 65], it was not separable, for the purposes of removal prior to the judgment against Josiah D. Brooks, even after his default. The question we now have to consider is, therefore, whether the judgment against Josiah D. Brooks takes the case out of that rule.

A Statute of Pennsylvania, passed April 6, [510] 1830, provided as follows:

"In all suits now pending or hereafter brought in any court of record in this Commonwealth, against joint and several obligors, copartners, promisors or the indorsers of promissory notes, in which the writ or process has not been or may not be served on all the defendants, and judgment may be obtained against those served with process, such writ, process or judgment, shall not be a bar to recovery in another suit against the defendant or defendants, not served with process." 1 Brightly's Purd. Dig. 11th ed. 953, § 48.

Another statute, passed April 4, 1877, enacted as follows;

"Where judgment has been or may hereafter be obtained in any court of record of this Commonwealth, against one or more of several co-defendants, in default of appearance, plea or affidavit of defense, said judgment shall not be a bar to recovery in the same suit against the other defendants, jointly or jointly and severally liable as co-obligors, copartners or otherwise." Id. 954, § 49.

By another statute, passed August 2, 1842, it was provided that in all actions instituted against two or more defendants, in which judgment may be entered on record at different periods against one or more of the defendants, by confession or otherwise, the entries so made "Shall be considered good and valid judgments against all the defendants, as of the date of the respective entries thereof, and the day of the date of the last entry shall be recited in all subsequent proceeding by scire facias or otherwise, as the date of judgment against all of them, and judgment rendered accordingly."

And "When an entry of judgment * * * shall be made on the records of any court against two or more defendants, at different periods, such entries shall operate as good and valid judgment against all the defendants; and the plaintiff may proceed to the collection of the money due thereon, with costs, as if the entries had all been made at the date of the latest entry." Id. §§ 45, 46.

This is a proceeding in the original suit and on the original cause of action. If a judgment [511] shall be rendered against Charles H. Brooks, it will be a judgment in the original action, the same in all respects, except as to date, that it would have been if he had been served with process and had put in the same defense before the judgment against Josiah D. Brooks. He voluntarily appeared "in the same suit" by accepting service of the original summons, but with an extension of time to put in his personal defense. Had the same thing been done before the judgment against Josiah D. Brooks, there could have been no removal on the petition of Charles H. Brooks, or on the petition of all the defendants, because the suit would have been against the two defendants, one of whom was a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff, and a separate defense by one. This, it has often been held, would not show or create a separable controversy, within the meaning of the Removal Act. Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 [26: 823]; Ayres v. Wiswall, 112 U. S. 187, 193 [28: 693, 695]; Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, 114 U. S. 52 [29:63]; Putnam v. Ingraham, 114 U. S. 57 [29:65]; St. Louis etc. R. Co. v. Wilson, 114 U. S. 60 [29:66]; Pirie v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41 [29: 331]; Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 248, 259 [29: 388, 391]; Sloane v. Anderson, 117 U. S. 275 [29: 899]; Fidelity Ins. Co. v. Huntington, 117 U. S. 280 [29: 898]; Core v. Vinal, 117 U. S. 347 [29: 912]; Plymouth Min. Co. v. Amador Canal Co. 118 U. S. 265 [ante, 282]. It is true there is now no longer any controversy upon the original cause of action with Josiah D. Brooks, against whom a final judgment has already been rendered, but neither was there in Putnam v. Ingraham, supra, with the defendant Morgan, who was in default and made no defense. In this respect the two cases differ only in degree, and not in kind. In this case the proceedings had gone one step further than in the other, and the default of Josiah D. Brooks had been fixed by the judgment. In principle, however, the cases are alike.

Much reliance was had in argument on Yulee v. Vose, 99 U. S. 539 [25:355]. The petition in that case was filed under the Act of July 27, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 306, chap. 288, where only the separate controversy of the petitioning defendant could be removed, and the plaintiff was allowed to proceed against all the other defendants in the state court, as to the remain- [512] ing controversies in the suit, the same as if no removal had been had. Under that statute the suit could be divided into two distinct parts—one removable and the other not. That which was removable might be taken to the Circuit Court of the United States, and that which was not removable would remain in the state court for trial without any reference whatever to the other. The removal had the effect of making two suits out of one. Not so with the Act of 1875. Under that, it was held in Barney v. Latham, 103 U. S. 205 [26: 514], that if a separable controversy exists, a removal for such cause takes the whole suit to the circuit court, and leaves nothing behind for trial in the state court.

In Yulee v. Vose there were several causes of action embraced in the suit—some joint against Yulee and all the other defendants, and one against Yulee alone as the indorser of certain promissory notes. Upon a trial, judgment had been rendered in favor of all the defendants upon all the causes of action. This judgment was affirmed by the highest court of the State, as to all the causes of action, except that against Yulee alone as indorser. As to that it was reversed and the cause sent back for a new trial. It was under these circumstances that it was said "it appeared that the controversy, so far as it concerned Yulee, not only could be, but actually had been, by judicial determination, separated from that of the other defendants;" and a removal of this controversy, thus actually separated from the rest of the case, was directed upon the petition of Yulee, filed after the case had been sent back for trial as to him alone, and before the trial or final hearing, which was in time under that statute. Upon this removal only the separate controversy with Yulee was carried to the circuit court, and the judgment in that would have no connection whatever with the other parts of the case, which remained undisturbed in the state court, where the record continued, so far as they were concerned.

In the present case, however, and under the present law, as ruled in Barney v. Latham, supra, the whole original suit, including the judgment against Josiah D. Brooks, must be taken to the circuit court, because this is a proceeding under the Pennsylvania Statute, in that suit, to obtain a judgment therein against [513] Charles H. Brooks. If the removal should be allowed and a judgment rendered in favor of Charles H. Brooks, the circuit court would be compelled to carry into execution the judgment of the state court against Josiah D. Brooks, which would in no sense be a judgment of the circuit court, but of the state court alone. As Charles H. Brooks made himself a party to the "same suit," he voluntarily subjected himself to the obstacles which were in the way of removing his controversy to the circuit court, and must be governed accordingly. Fletcher v. Hamlet, 116 U. S. 408 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 679]. Had the plaintiffs proceeded against him under the other statute and brought another suit, the case would have been different, because that would have been a separate and distinct action to which there was no other defendant but himself; but this proceeding is merely auxiliary to the original suit, and in all respects a part of that suit, from which it cannot be separated. If a judgment shall be rendered against Charles H. Brooks, that judgment and the judgment already existing against Josiah D. Brooks "will be treated as one on the scire facias or execution." Finch v. Lamberton, 62 Pa. 370.

The order remanding the case is affirmed.

GEORGE THACKRAH, Appt.,

v.

EMIL HAAS, ANTHONY GODBE, LONDON BANK OF UTAH (Limited), AND ROYAL MINING COMPANY OF UTAH.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 499-502.)

Transfer of property fraudulently extorted from intoxicated person—complainant unable to repay consideration—equity will grant relief—provision for repayment in decree.

1. Equity will grant relief where the transfer of a valuable property has been fraudulently extorted, for a grossly inadequate consideration, from a person while in such a state of intoxication as to render him incapable of transacting business.

2. Where the complainant without any fault of his own is unable to repay the consideration of a fraudulent transfer, equity will not require him to do so as a condition precedent to granting him relief, but will make due provision in the decree for its repayment.

Submitted Dec. 9, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This suit was brought on December 16, 1880, by Thackrah against Haas, Godbe, the London Bank of Utah (Limited) and the Royal Mining Company of Utah.

The complaint alleged that on September 17, 1880, the plaintiff was owner of certain interests, property and rights in the Mining Company, equal to 80,000 shares of its capital stock, and then of the value of $80,000 (as to 75,000 shares in his own right, and as to the remaining 5,000 as trustee), and for the same was entitled to have 80,000 shares issued to him whenever the stock should be issuable; that on that day, and for two months before and a month afterwards, the plaintiff was continuously in a state of intoxication to such a degree as to have his mental faculties thereby so impaired as to render him not in his right mind, and wholly incapacitated to transact any business or enter into any contract; that all the defendants, at the time of the transfer hereinafter mentioned, knew that the plaintiff was and for two months had been in that condition; that while he was in that condition the Bank through its officers pursued, harassed and goaded him as to a debt of his to the Bank, in order to extort from him a transfer to Haas of his interest in the Mining Company; and the plaintiff was greatly worried by other creditors to whom he owed small amounts, and was greatly excited and annoyed by this conduct of the Bank and other creditors, as the defendants knew; that while in this condition the plaintiff was, as he believes, encouraged in his drunkenness and furnished with intoxicating drinks by the agents of Haas, with the knowledge of the Bank; that on September 17, 1880, Haas and the Bank, well knowing the plaintiff's condition and his incapacity for business, fraudulently imposed upon and extorted from him, for the grossly inadequate sum of $1,200, a transfer or assignment in writing to Haas of the whole of the plaintiff's interests aforesaid in the Mining Company; that Godbe and the Bank were the real parties in interest for whom the transfer was procured, and that they now held the shares, or Haas held the same for them; that of this sum of $1,200 the sum of $750 was retained by the Bank and applied to the payment of the plaintiff's debt to it, and the remaining $450 was applied by his wife in paying his small debts; that the plaintiff, on recovering from his intoxication, gave notice to all the defendants of his intention to bring this suit as soon as he should be able to repay to Haas the sum of $1,200; but that the plaintiff, although he had used every effort to obtain money for that purpose, had been unable to obtain it, and had not now the pecuniary ability to repay that sum; that the only available means to which he could look for raising it were the interests and shares aforesaid in the Mining Company, fraudulently forced from him by the pretended transfer; and that if the plaintiff were now able to repay the $1,200 to Haas, he could not do so, because Haas had left the Territory to reside elsewhere.

The complaint concluded by praying judgment that the transfer to Haas be declared void, and be canceled; that the 80,000 shares of stock and said interests therein be adjudged to be the plaintiff's property; that so much thereof be sold by order of the court as should be sufficient to yield $1,200 and interest from the date of the transfer, and that sum be paid to Haas; that the Mining Company be directed to issue the rest of those shares and interests to the plaintiff, and be restrained from issuing them to any other person; and that the other defendants restore to the plaintiff any certificates thereof in their hands, and be restrained from receiving any more, and account to him for any part that they had disposed of.

The defendants severally demurred to the complaint as stating no cause of action; the demurrers were sustained and the complaint dismissed by the courts of the Territory and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. E. D. Hoge, for appellant:

The contract was utterly void.

Dexter v. Hall, 15 Wall. 9 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 73); Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623.

If not void, the contract was certainly voidable.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 949; French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214; Barrett v. Buxton, 2 Aik. 167.

The inadequacy of consideration is so gross as to lead to a presumption of fraud.

Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89; Hough v. Hunt, 2 Ohio, 495.

Equity will interpose and annul the contract.

Stewart v. Lispenard, 26 Wend. 255; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 234, 237, 238.

The rule that upon the rescission of a contract the parties must be put in statu quo does not apply where the contract is void ab initio.

Sanchez v. McMahon, 35 Cal. 218. See also Martin v. Roberts, 5 Cush. 126; Reynolds v. Waller's Heirs, 1 Wash. (Va.) 164: Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 798).

The rule of statu quo is satisfied if the judgment asked for will accomplish the same result.

Harris v. Equitable L. Assur. Society, 64 N. Y. 196; Judge of Probate v. Stone, 44 N. H. 593.

(No counsel appeared for appellees.)

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

No opinion of the court below and no brief or argument for the appellees having been submitted to us, it is not easy to conjecture the ground upon which the demurrers were sustained.

By the Statutes of Utah, there is, for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs, but one form of action, commenced by complaint, to which the defendant may demur or answer. If there be no answer, the relief cannot exceed that demanded in the complaint; in any other case, the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue. Compiled Laws of Utah, 1876, §§ 1226, 1247, 1263, 1374.

The complaint in the present case is in the nature of a bill in equity against a Mining Corporation, a Bank, and two individuals, alleging that while the plaintiff was in such a state of intoxication as not to be in his right mind or capable of transacting any business or entering into any contract, the defendants, knowing his condition, fraudulently extorted from him, for the sum of $1,200, a transfer to one of those persons, for the benefit of the other and of the Bank, of his interests, worth $80,000, in shares to that amount in the Mining Corporation; and praying for a cancellation of the transfer, for a sale of enough of the interests transferred to repay the $1,200, for the issue of the rest by the Mining Company to the plaintiff, for the restoration to him by the other defendants of any certificates in their hands, and for an account and an injunction. It cannot be doubted that this was such a case of fraud as entitled him to

The complaint further alleges, and the demurrer admits, that the greater part of this sum of $1,200 was retained by the Bank and applied to the payment of a debt previously due to it from the plaintiff, and (it would seem before he recovered from his intoxication) the rest of that sum was applied by his wife to the payment of his small debts, and he had no means available to raise money to repay the $1,200, except the interests in the Mining Company, which he had been induced by the defendants' fraud to make a transfer of. The plaintiff, without any fault of his, being unable to repay the consideration of the fraudulent transfer, equity will not require him to do so as a condition precedent to granting him relief, but will make due provision, in the final decree, for the repayment of that sum out of the property recovered. Reynolds v. Waller, 1 Wash. (Va.) 164; Allerton v. Allerton, 50 N. Y. 670; S. C. more fully stated, in Harris v. Equitable L. Assur. Society, 64 N. Y. 196, 200.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

WILLIAM L. HUSE ET AL., Appts., [543]

v.

JOSEPH O. GLOVER ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 543-550.)

Constitutional law—effect of admission of Illinois—freedom of navigation of Illinois River—not bound by United States Ordinance—may improve navigation and exact tolls for use of artificial facilities—charge according to tonnage, valid—tonnage duties defined—review of authorities.

1. The State of Illinois upon her admission became entitled to and possessed of all the rights of dominion which belonged to the original States.

2. The provision of article 4 of the Ordinance of 1787, providing that the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence should be common highways, and forever free, does not bind the State of Illinois, and does not impair the powers which said State could have exercised over its rivers had said provision no existence.

3. How the highways of a State, whether on land or by water, shall be best improved for the public good is a matter for state determination, subject to the right of Congress to interpose when such highways are the means of interstate and foreign commerce.

4. The exaction of reasonable tolls by a State as compensation for the use of artificial facilities for the improvement of navigation, is not an impost upon such navigation, or an interference with its freedom.

5. A tonnage duty within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition is a tonnage charge upon a vessel, as an instrument of commerce, for entering or leaving a port, or navigating the public waters of the country.

6. The charges imposed by the canal commissioners of Illinois for the passage of vessels through the locks constructed by the State at Henry and at Copperas Creek on the Illinois River, are not open to objection because prescribed according to the tonnage of the vessels.

Argued Dec. 10, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. S. Eldredge, for appellants:

The attention of this court does not seem to have been called, in the late case of Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 442), to the fact that the State of Illinois, in the acceptance of the Act of Congress under which it was authorized to organize, expressly covenanted with respect to the Ordinance of 1787, that it should not be revoked "without the consent of the United States." It would seem that this was equivalent to an express adoption of the particular provisions of that ordinance with respect to the navigable watercourses to which such a degree of importance had been attached.

Had the State of Illinois, without the consent of Congress, the lawful right to assume exclusive control over the Illinois River, and to erect dams across it and thus force steamers and other vessels, before then navigating the river in its natural state as such public channel of interstate commerce, to pass through locks constructed at these dams, and pay tonnage duties and other impositions, in order to enjoy the privilege of navigating it, which they had before enjoyed without restriction?

NOTE.—Constitutional law; interstate commerce; regulation of; power of Congress; how far exclusive. For a full discussion, see Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. bk. 29, 158, note.

Unless there has been some specific delegation of power to the State by Congress, authorizing the erection of dams and other structures, and the imposition of tolls and other impositions upon the navigation of the river, such a recognition of power by the State over the commerce of the country cannot be maintained.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 89 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 44); The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557 (19: 999); The Montello, 20 Wall. 430 (22: 391); Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 (23: 543); Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299 (13: 996); Gilman v. Phila. 3 Wall. 715 (18: 96).

The Legislature has not only assumed to impose a tonnage duty within the meaning of the Act of Congress, but a direct tax upon the cargoes, aimed specifically at the particular character of the freight transported.

These imposts fall directly within the case of the State Freight Tax, 15 Wall. 232 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 146), so far as they relate to the ice being transported by the complainants down the river, to be distributed at different commercial points without the limits of the State of Illinois. As said by the court in Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 464 (26: 1068), in commenting upon the State Freight Tax Case, in this the court should apply the rule announced in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419 (6: 678), that where the burden of taxation falls on a thing which is the subject of taxation, the tax is to be considered as laid on the thing, rather than on him who is charged with the duty of paying it into the treasury.

The court further says in the Telegraph Company Case, supra, taxes on vessels according to the measurement without any reference to the value were declared to be taxes on tonnage.

State Tonnage Tax Cases, 12 Wall. 204 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 370); Peete v. Morgan, 19 Wall. 581 (22: 201); Cannon v. N. O. 20 Wall. 577 (22: 417); Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238 (24: 118); Co. of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 (26: 238); Moran v. N. O. 112 U. S. 73 (28: 655).

The impositions assumed to be laid upon the vessels of the complainants and their cargoes are direct taxes upon the vessels as instruments of interstate commerce, and upon the cargoes as subjects of interstate commerce, without reference to either the value of the vessels or cargoes, for the privilege of navigating the Illinois River, a public highway of the United States over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction.

This case does not rest upon the same principles as those of Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 377); Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423 (25: 688); Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559 (26: 1169); Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U. S. 430 (25: 690); Trans. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 (27: 584), and other kindred cases which support a charge for use of artificial channels, wharves and like improvements, made by the State, and which the State in the exercise of its local authority has the undoubted right to make, and which do not operate as a restraint upon navigation of the navigable rivers or waters of the United States by such vessels as were accustomed to navigate them in their natural condition. None of this class of cases is applicable to the case at bar.

It is admitted that the complainants were engaged in interstate commerce; that the cargoes of ice transported in their vessels were subjects of interstate commerce. It is admitted that facilities for navigating the river were not increased by the construction of locks and dams, but were impeded seriously, and that they were subjected to heavy losses.

Mr. George Hunt, Atty-Gen. of Illinois, for appellees:

The charges for passing through the locks, based upon the tonnage, are not in conflict with that clause of the Constitution which prohibits the States from imposing tonnage taxes, duties or imposts.

A State may improve navigable waters.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court: [544]

This case comes from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois. It was heard there and decided on demurrer to the bill of complaint. The substance of the bill is this: That by various Acts of her Legislature, commencing with one passed in February, 1867, the State of Illinois adopted measures for improving the navigation of Illinois River, including the construction of a lock and dam at Henry, and at Copperas Creek on the river. She created a board of canal commissioners, and invested it with authority to superintend the construction of the locks and dams, to control and manage them after their construction, and to prescribe reasonable rates of toll for the passage of vessels through the locks. By a clause in one of the Acts it was provided that all tolls received for the use of the locks, not necessary to keep the same in repair, and to pay the expenses of their collection, should be "paid quarterly into the state treasury as part of the general revenue of the State." Laws of Ill. of 1872, 213, 214.

The works were constructed at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars, which was principally borne by the State. It is represented that a small portion was contributed by the United States. Those at Henry were completed in 1872; those at Copperas Creek in 1877; and the commissioners prescribed rates of toll for the passage of vessels through the locks, the rates being fixed per ton, according to the tonnage measurement of the vessels and the amount of freight carried.

The complainants, citizens of Illinois, composing the firm of Huse, Loomis & Co., are engaged, and have been, since their organization in 1864, in cutting ice at Peru and at other points on the Illinois River, and in transporting it on that river, and thence by the Mississippi and other navigable streams to St. Louis, Memphis, and other southern markets; and in connection therewith are carrying on a general transportation business, using constantly from three to six steamboats, and from thirty to sixty barges, varying from 125 to 1,000 tons, all licensed and [545] registered under the Act of Congress. They allege in the bill that prior to the construction of the dam across the Illinois River at Henry, they were able to navigate the river without interruption, except such as was incident to its ordinary use in its natural state; that the dams at that place and at Copperas Creek are impediments to the free navigation of the river; that while an additional depth of water is created above them, no practical advantage ensues to the complainants, for they encounter below the dams the same stage of water they would have without them; that the dams are so constructed as to wholly impede, except at extreme high water, the navigation of the river by steamboats and other vessels which were previously accustomed to navigate it, unless they pass through the locks; that from the construction of the lock and dam at Henry in 1872 to the spring of 1878, they have paid as duties or charges upon the tonnage measurement of their steamboats and other vessels about $3,000, and for tolls imposed upon the cargoes of ice transported by them about $5,000; that upon subsequent shipments similar charges have been exacted, as also for the passage of their boats and barges through the lock at Copperas Creek. And they allege that they are advised and believe that the imposition of the tolls and tonnage duties mentioned is in violation first, of the provision of article four of the ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, passed July 13, 1787, which provides that "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor;" and, second, of the article of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the imposing of a tonnage duty by any State without the consent of Congress. Art. 1, § 10. They therefore pray that the defendants, who are canal commissioners, and all persons acting under them, may be restrained from exacting any tonnage duties or [546] other charges for the passage of their steamboats or barges, and other vessels used by them in navigating the Illinois River, or from interfering in any manner with the free and uninterrupted navigation of the river by them in the usual course of their business.

The questions thus urged upon the consideration of the court below are pressed here; but they are neither new nor difficult of solution. The opinion of that court presents in a clear and satisfactory manner the full answer to them, and nothing can be added to the force of its reasoning. In affirming its conclusions we can do little more than repeat its argument. Huse v. Glover, 11 Biss. 550.

The fourth section of the ordinance for the government of the northwestern territory was the subject of consideration in Escanaba, etc., Trans. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [27: 442]. We there said that the ordinance was passed before the Constitution took effect; that although it appears by various Acts of Congress to have been afterwards treated as in force in the territory, except as modified by them, and the Act enabling the people of Illinois Territory to form a Constitution and state government, and the resolution of Congress admitting the State into the Union, referred to the principles of the ordinance, according to which the Constitution was to be formed, its provisions could not control the powers and authority of the State after her admission; that whatever the limitation of her powers as a government whilst in a territorial condition, whether from the Ordinance of 1787 or the legislation of Congress, it ceased to have any operative force, except as voluntarily adopted by her, after she became a State of the Union; that on her admission she at once became entitled to and possessed of all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States; that the language of the resolution admitting her was that she is "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever;" and that she could, therefore, afterwards exercise the same powers over rivers within her limits as Delaware exercised over Blackbird Creek, and Pennsylvania over Schuylkill River. Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212 [11: 565]; Permoli v. Municipality of N. O., Id. 589 [11: 739]; Strader v. Graham, 10 How. 82 [13: 337].

We also held in that case that, independently [547] of these considerations, the terms of the ordinance were not violated because the navigable streams were subject to such crossings as the public necessities and convenience might require. The rivers did not change their character as common highways, if the crossings were allowed under reasonable conditions, and so as not unnecessarily to obstruct them. The erection of bridges with dams and the establishment of ferries for the transit of persons and property are consistent with the free navigation of the rivers; and in support of this doctrine we referred to the case of Palmer v. Comrs. of Cuyahoga County, 3 McLean, 226, where Mr. Justice McLean, speaking of the provision of the ordinance, said: "This provision does not prevent a State from improving the navigableness of these waters by removing obstructions, or by dams and locks, so increasing the depth of the water as to extend the line of navigation; nor does the ordinance prohibit the construction of any work on the river which the State may consider important to commercial intercourse. A dam may be thrown over the river, provided a lock is so constructed as to permit boats to pass with little or no delay, and without charge. A temporary delay, such as passing a lock, could not be considered as an obstruction prohibited by the ordinance."

Since the decision in the Escanaba Case we have had our attention repeatedly called to the terms of this clause in the Ordinance of 1787.

A similar clause as to their navigable rivers is found in the Acts providing for the admission of California, Wisconsin and Louisiana. The clause in the Act providing for the admission of California was considered in Cardwell v. American Bridge Co. 113 U. S. 205 [28; 959]. We there held that it did not impair the power which the State could have exercised over its rivers had the clause not existed; and that its object was to preserve the rivers as highways equally open to all persons without preference to any, and unobstructed by duties or tolls, and thus prevent the use of the navigable streams by private parties to the exclusion of the public, and the exaction of toll for their navi- [548] gation. The same doctrine we have reiterated at the present term of the court in construing a similar clause in the Act for the admission of Louisiana. Hamilton v. Vicksburgh, S. & P. R. R. Co. 119 U. S. [ante, 393.] As thus construed, the clause would prevent any exclusive use of the navigable waters of the State—a possible farming out of the privilege of navigating them to particular individuals, classes or corporations, or by vessels of a particular character. That the apprehension of such a monopoly was not unfounded is evident from the history of legislation since. The State of New York at one time endeavored to confer upon Livingston and Fulton the exclusive right to navigate the waters within its jurisdiction by vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

The exaction of tolls for passage through the locks is as compensation for the use of artificial facilities constructed, not as an impost upon the navigation of the stream. The provision of the clause that the navigable streams should be highways without any tax, impost or duty, has reference to their navigation in their natural state. It did not contemplate that such navigation might not be improved by artificial means, by the removal of obstructions, or by the making of dams for deepening the waters, or by turning into the rivers waters from other streams to increase their depth. For outlays caused by such works the State may exact reasonable tolls. They are like charges for the use of wharves and docks constructed to facilitate the landing of persons and freight, and the taking them on board, or for the repair of vessels.

The State is interested in the domestic as well as in the interstate and foreign commerce conducted on the Illinois River, and to increase its facilities and thus augment its growth, it has full power. It is only when, in the judgment of Congress, its action is deemed to encroach upon the navigation of the river as a means of interstate and foreign commerce, that that body may interfere and control or supersede it. If, in the opinion of the State, greater benefit would result to her commerce by the improvements made than by leaving the river in its natural state—and on that point the State must necessarily determine for itself—it may authorize them, although increased inconvenience and [549] expense may thereby result to the business of individuals. The private inconvenience must yield to the public good. The opening of a new highway, or the improvement of an old one, the building of a railroad and many other works in which the public is interested, may materially diminish business in certain quarters and increase it in others; yet, for the loss resulting, the sufferers have no legal ground of complaint. How the highways of a State, whether on land or by water, shall be best improved for the public good is a matter for state determination, subject always to the right of Congress to interpose in the cases mentioned. Spooner v. McConnell, 1 McLean, 337; Kellogg v. Union Co. 12 Conn. 7; Thames Bank v. Lovell, 18 Conn. 500; McReynolds v. Smallhouse, 8 Bush, 447.

By the terms tax, impost and duty, mentioned in the ordinance, is meant a charge for the use of the government, not compensation for improvements. The fact that if any surplus remains from the tolls, over what is used to keep the locks in repair, and for their collection, it is to be paid into the state treasury as a part of the revenue of the State, does not change the character of the toll or impost. In prescribing the rates it would be impossible to state in advance what the tolls would amount to in the aggregate. That would depend upon the extent of business done; that is, the number of vessels and amount of freight which may pass through the locks. Some disposition of the surplus is necessary until its use shall be required, and it may as well be placed in the state treasury, and probably better than anywhere else.

Nor is there anything in the objection that the rates of toll are prescribed by the commissioners according to the tonnage of the vessels, and the amount of freight carried by them through the locks. This is simply a mode of fixing the rate according to the size of the vessel and the amount of property it carries, and in no sense is a duty of tonnage within the prohibition of the Constitution. A duty of tonnage within the meaning of the Constitution is a charge upon a vessel, according to its tonnage, as an instrument of commerce, for entering or leaving a port, or navigating the public waters of the country: and the prohibition [550] was designed to prevent the States from imposing hindrances of this kind to commerce carried on by vessels.

In Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80 [24: 377], that city was authorized by its charter to make wharves on the banks of the navigable river upon which it is situated, and to collect and regulate wharfage, the rates being proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel; and the court held that the charge was not subject to the objection that it was a duty of tonnage within the prohibition of the Constitution. It said: "A charge for services rendered, or for conveniences provided, is in no sense a tax or a duty. It is not a hindrance or impediment to free navigation. The prohibition to the State against the imposition of a duty of tonnage was designed to guard against local hindrances to trade and carriage by vessels, not to relieve them from liability to claims for assistance rendered and facilities furnished for trade and commerce. It is a tax or a duty that is prohibited; something imposed by virtue of sovereignty, not claimed in right of proprietorship. Wharfage is of the latter character. Providing a wharf to which vessels may make fast, or at which they may conveniently load or unload, is rendering them a service." And in Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [27: 584], speaking of a charge of wharfage according to the tonnage of a vessel, and a duty of tonnage prohibited by the Constitution, the court said: "They are not the same thing; a duty of tonnage is a charge for the privilege of entering, or trading or lying in, a port or harbor; wharfage is a charge for the use of a wharf." And again; "The fact that the rates (of wharfage) charged are graduated by the size or tonnage of the vessel is of no consequence in this connection. This does not make it a duty of tonnage in the sense of the Constitution and the Acts of Congress." Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577 [22: 417]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559 [26: 1169].

It is unnecessary to pursue the subject further. We do not see any objections that would justify a disturbance of the decree below, which is accordingly affirmed.

[495] MOSES C. BIGNALL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JAMES H. GOULD.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 495-498.)

Bond—"penal sum," a penalty—"liquidated damages"—discharge in bankruptcy.

1. The "penal sum" named in a bond given to secure the obligee's discharge from a large number of claims against him, held by certain third parties severally, is held to be simply a penalty, although it is also described in the bond as "liquidated damages."

2. The plaintiff having been discharged in bankruptcy after the breach and before action brought, it is held that he can recover nominal damages only.

Submitted Dec. 7, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action, brought in September, 1881, by a citizen of Missouri against a citizen of New York upon the following bond, signed and sealed by the defendant:

"Know all men, that I, James H. Gould, of Seneca Falls, New York, am held and firmly bound to Moses C. Bignall in the penal sum of ten thousand dollars lawful money, liquidated damages, to the payment of which I bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, firmly by these presents.

"Sealed with my seal at the City of St. Louis and State of Missouri this 7th day of April, A. D. 1879.

"The condition of this obligation is such that whereas, on the first day of April, 1878, the said Moses C. Bignall became unable to pay and satisfy all his just debts and liabilities; and whereas, the Gould Manufacturing Company, of Seneca Falls aforesaid, was one of the creditors of the said Moses C. Bignall; and whereas, the said Gould Manufacturing Company, Mrs. Hannah B. Gould, of Seneca Falls, and Angus McDonald, of Rochester, New York, became the assignees by purchase of a large number and amount of the said debts and claims then existing against the said Moses C. [496] Bignall; and whereas, said last named parties or either of them may deem it to their interest to become the assignees of other of said debts and claims now existing against said Moses C. Bignall:

"Now, therefore, if the said Gould Manufacturing Company, the said Hannah B. Gould, and the said Angus McDonald, shall acquit, release and discharge the said Moses C. Bignall, within one year from the date hereof, of all and singular the debts and claims aforesaid that have been assigned to them, or that may hereafter be assigned to them, or either of them, by good and sufficient release in writing, to be made by them, and to be delivered by them to said Moses C. Bignall, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, it shall remain in full force and virtue."

The petition alleged that the defendant executed the bond at its date; that the plaintiff was then owing to divers persons debts amounting to about $50,000, including one to the Gould Manufacturing Company of about $7,000; and that Hannah B. Gould held assignments from different persons of many of those debts, to the amount of about $26,000 (a list of ten of which was annexed, varying from $147.23 to $8,117.00), and Angus McDonald held assignments of like debts to the amount of about $6,000 (a list of thirteen of which was annexed, varying from $9.80 to $1,445.52); that there had been a breach of the bond, in that more than a year had elapsed since its execution, yet neither the Gould Manufacturing Company nor Gould nor McDonald had acquitted, released or discharged the plaintiff from any of those debts, and that by reason of this breach the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,000.

The answer admitted these allegations, except that it denied that the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,000 or any other sum; and alleged that the plaintiff, under proceedings in bankruptcy pending at the date of the bond, had since obtained a certificate of discharge, whereby all his debts mentioned in the petition were discharged. The plaintiff filed a replication, denying all the allegations of the answer.

Upon a trial by the court, a jury having been duly waived, the plaintiff proved that the assets which came to the hands of his assignee in bankruptcy amounted to $23,109.54, and no more, of which $17,439.11 was collected of the Gould Manufacturing Company, and that the only dividend paid was on March 14, 1882, of $46\frac{55}{100}$ cents on the dollar. The plaintiff admitted in open court that he obtained a certificate of discharge on May 6, 1880, under pro- [497] ceedings in bankruptcy begun on April 25, 1878. The defendant relied on this admission, and introduced no evidence. No other testimony was given nor admissions made at the trial, save those contained in the pleadings.

The plaintiff asked the court to declare the following propositions of law as applicable to this case: "1. The bond sued on is a liquidated bond, and the breach being admitted by the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the liquidated sum, $10,000. 2. If the bond is not a liquidated bond, still, under the issues and the evidence, the plaintiff is entitled to recover more than nominal damages, notwithstanding his discharge in bankruptcy." The court refused thus to declare the law, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at one cent only. The plaintiff excepted to the ruling and action of the court, and sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. H. M. Pollard and S. N. Taylor, for plaintiff in error:

The following authorities support the view that the will of the parties is clearly expressed in the bond that $10,000 should be the exact and liquidated damages in case of a breach of the conditions of the bond.

Lowe v. Peers, 4 Burr. 2225; Leary v. Laflin, 101 Mass. 334; Cotheal v. Talmage, 9 N. Y. 551; Bagley v. Peddie, 16 N. Y. 469; Clement v. Cash, 21 N. Y. 253; Noyes v. Phillips, 60 N. Y. 408; Hamaker v. Schroers, 49 Mo. 406; Watts v. Sheppard, 2 Ala. 425; Williams v. Green, 14 Ark. 315; Hamilton v. Overton, 6 Blackf. 206; Chrisdee v. Bolton, 5 Car. & P. 240; Streeter v. Rush, 25 Cal. 71; Tingley v. Cutler, 7 Conn. 291; Gobble v. Snider, 76 Ill. 158; Downey v. Beach, 78 Ill. 53; Sparrow v. Paris, 7 H. & N. 594; Field, Damages, 155; 1 Sutherland, Dam. 475-520.

There is a marked distinction between being released by act of the creditor, and a release by operation of law. In the latter case a new promise revives the debt, while the former is a final extinguishment of the debt.

Valentine v. Foster, 1 Met. 520; Way v. Sperry, 6 Cush. 241; Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476.

(No counsel appeared for defendant in error.)

By the rules now established at law as well as in equity, the sum of $10,000, named in this bond, is a penalty only, and not liquidated damages. As observed by Lord Tenterden in a similar case, "Whoever framed this agreement does not appear to have had any very clear idea of the distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages; for the sum" in question "is described in the same sentence as a penal sum and as liquidated damages." Davies v. Penton, 6 B. & C. 216, 222; S. C. 9 D. & R. 369, 376. The object of the bond is to secure the obligee's discharge from a large number of claims against him, held by certain third persons severally, amounting in all to something like $39,000, and varying from more than $8,000 to less than $10 each. A failure of either of those persons to release any one of those claims would be a breach of the bond; and for any such breach a just compensation might be estimated in damages. The sum of $10,000 must therefore be regarded as simply a penalty to secure the payment of such damages as the obligee may suffer from any breach of the bond. Watts v. Camors, 115 U. S. 353 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 406]; Boyd v. Ancell, 5 Bing. N. C. 390; S. C. 7 Scott, 364; Thompson v. Hudson, L. R. 4 H. L. 1, 30; Fisk v. Gray, 11 Allen, 132.

Upon the evidence introduced and the admissions made by the plaintiff at the trial, it does not appear that he suffered any damage whatever. Although there was a technical breach of the bond at the expiration of a year from its date, by the third persons therein named having failed to release the plaintiff from any of the debts held by them, yet, within a month afterwards, and before this action was brought, he was legally discharged from all those debts by obtaining a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy. This discharge was not the less complete and effectual because the creditors had not received payment in full, nor because the plaintiff might, if he saw fit, by new promises to them, waive the discharge and revive so much of the debts as had not been satisfied by the dividends paid by the assignee in bankruptcy.

Judgment for nominal damages affirmed.

ISAAC ROBINSON, AND JULIUS ROSENTHAL, Admr of ABRAHAM ROBINSON, Deceased.

Letters patent construed and limited to apparatus claimed — process, not within — equivalents — file wrapper as evidence — practice.

1. Letters patent No. 216298, for an improved apparatus for resweating tobacco, do not sustain a claim for a process of steaming tobacco by means of steam, or steam and a body of hot water, nor by any process whatever, but must be limited to the apparatus; the precise improvement covered thereby being the substitution of a wooden vessel for holding the tobacco for a metallic one.

2. In such an apparatus, the use of the cases, boxes or packages in which the tobacco was originally packed is not equivalent to the use of the wooden tobacco holder covered by said letters patent.

3. A patentee cannot insist upon a construction of his patent which will include what the Patent Office was expressly required him to abandon and disavow as a condition of the grant.

Argued Dec. 9, 10, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas A. Banning and Ephraim Banning, for appellants.

Messrs. John W. Munday, and Edmund Adcock, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by Isaac Robinson and Abraham Robinson against the appellants to restrain an alleged infringement of letters patent granted by the United States to Abraham Robinson on June 10, 1879, for an improved apparatus for resweating tobacco. The defenses relied on are, that the patent is invalid for want of novelty, and a denial of the alleged infringement. The specifications and claims of the patent, with reference to accompanying drawings, are as follows:

"Like letters of reference indicate like parts.

"It is usual to soften the leaves of tobacco, as is well known, in order to prepare them for being manufactured into cigars and other manufactured goods, and to bring out a good and uniform color. This has been done heretofore in various ways, and, among others, by dampening the leaves and exposing them to heat while in that condition.

"The object of this invention is to provide improved means for exposing the leaves to the action of steam for the purposes above set forth; and to that end my invention consists of a tobacco holding vessel made of wood sufficiently porous to permit the steam to percolate through it, in combination, substantially as [532] hereinafter described, with a steam generating apparatus and a steam receiving chamber surrounding the vessel for containing the tobacco.

"I am aware that the general structural plan of the apparatus hereinafter described is old, and I do not, therefore, here intend to claim the same independently of a tobacco receiving vessel made of wood sufficiently porous to permit the steam to percolate through it, as and for the purposes set forth, the said wooden vessel constituting, as I believe, an improvement upon the apparatus heretofore in use; for the reason that, in employing wood instead of metal in the construction of the said vessel, the tobacco is prevented from being tainted, and may be kept continually moist by the action of the steam instead of being merely heated and sweated by it, or steamed only by the generation of steam in the same vessel containing the tobacco; it being obvious that if the tobacco receiving vessel be made of metal, as heretofore in devices of this class, the steam in an outer surrounding vessel would merely heat the tobacco and sweat it without imparting new moisture to it. Neither do I here intend to claim the process, as such, of steaming tobacco.

"In the drawings A represents an ordinary boiler for generating steam. B is a tank or vessel for receiving the steam generated by the boiler A. C is a tight wooden vessel for receiving the tobacco to be treated. This vessel should be provided with a tight-fitting cover, a. I make the vessel C of wood, as an essential feature of my invention, in order that the steam may sweat or percolate through it from the tank B, and so that the tobacco will not be tainted by contact with metal. The vessel C is enough smaller than the tank B to be suspended in the latter and leave an annular space, b, between the two, as well as a space underneath the bottom of the vessel C, as shown. The space b should also be covered. In order to provide a cover for the space b, and also suspend the vessel C firmly in the tank B, I employ an annular rim or lid, c, having an upwardly turned flange, c', fitted to the vessel C, and a downwardly turned flange, c'', fitted to the tank B, screws or other fastenings passing through the flanges into the parts to which they are fitted; [533] but it is not essential that these flanges should be continuous or extend entirely around the vessels. Neither is it essential that the flanged portions of the lid c should be continuous, or in the same piece with the remaining part of the said lid. It is, in fact, much the easier way to make the flanged portions separately from the lid proper, and I have represented them as made in that manner.

"I do not, however, here intend to be restricted to any particular way of applying the lid c and suspending the vessel C, as both may [534] be done in various suitable ways; but I deem the manner shown to be the best.

"D is a steam pipe leading from the upper part of the boiler A into the upper part of the space b, and E is a water pipe leading from the lower part of the said space into the lower part of the boiler. To use this apparatus for the purpose for which it is intended, the water in the boiler should be heated until steam is generated. The tobacco to be treated should be placed in the vessel C and covered, the tobacco being then in the condition in which it exists when taken from the cases or packages in which it may have been packed by the producers or shippers.

"The water, as well as the steam, will enter the space b and produce a sufficient temperature in the vessel C to sweat the tobacco therein, the steam producing moisture in the vessel C by sweating or percolating through it from the space b, in addition to the moisture originally in the tobacco before it was confined in the vessel. The steam which enters the space b, through the pipe D, finding a lower temperature in the said space than in the boiler, becomes condensed, and is added or returned to the volume of water which flows from the said space into the boiler, and thus keeps the latter supplied. A circulation of water and steam is also kept up to a certain extent.

"In a building where steam is supplied through pipes, the steam may be conducted into the space b from the boiler which supplies the steam, wherever the boiler may be situated. The tobacco should be exposed to this treatment from three to eight days, according to the result desired to be produced, and it will thus be rendered soft and pliable, and of a uniform and dark color, without being in any way injured. The tobacco prepared in this manner may be manufactured into various articles, like cigars and cigarettes.

"I deem it preferable to make the tank B, as well as the tank C, of wood, so as to prevent tainting the tobacco, and so as to render the apparatus capable of treating large quantities of tobacco at the same time, and without making the apparatus heavy and expensive, and to em-[535] ploy a boiler wholly detached from the tank B, excepting by the steam and water pipes connecting the same, thus enabling me to make the outer or larger tank of wood without exposing it to danger from fire. A detached boiler amply sufficient to be employed in connection with very large tanks will be comparatively simple and cheap.

"Having thus described my invention, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

"1. The apparatus, substantially as described, for treating tobacco, to wit: The tight vessel or tank B, the tight vessel C, made of wood and suspended in the tank B, and a steam generator or heater, all combined and operating together, substantially as and for the purposes specified.

"2. The combination of the boiler A, the tight tank B, made of wood, the tight vessel C, made of wood and suspended in the tank B, and the pipes D and E entering the tank B and the boiler, all arranged and operating substantially as and for the purposes specified."

On the hearing in the circuit court it was found upon the evidence, that the device used by the defendants differed from that of the complainants, as described in the patent, only in this respect, that the defendant's tobacco holder is not made tight so as to exclude moisture except through the pores of the wood; the defendants using the ordinary tobacco cases in which the leaf tobacco comes packed, to hold the tobacco during the process of resweating. It was contended on the part of the defendants that this was a substantial difference, because the complainants' claim required their tobacco holder to be tight, while that of the defendants was not. In disposing of the case upon this point, the judge holding the circuit court, in his opinion, said: "The essential feature of complainants' invention consists in subjecting the mass of leaf tobacco to moisture and heat in a comparatively close wooden box for a sufficient time to have it undergo the process of resweating, and it is no answer to complainants' charge of infringement of their patent to say that defendants' box is not quite so tight as that complainants deem desirable or necessary for the most satisfactory operation of their device." Robinson v. Sutter, 10 Biss. 100; S. C. 8 Fed. Rep. 828.

The issue as to novelty, upon the proof, was [536] also decided against the defendants, for the reason that the two devices relied upon—one described in the Oppelt patent of June 16, 1874, and the other in the Wenderoth patent of July 16, 1878—both use metal tanks and a metal tobacco holder. It was shown that contact with metal taints and injures the tobacco operated upon, and that the free admission of steam wets and to some extent cooks the tobacco; and the conclusion of the circuit court was that "The porous wooden tobacco holder devised by Robinson seems, from the proof, to stimulate that slow fermentation and action in the constituent elements of the leaf which is required to make the whole mass homogeneous."

Upon a showing made by the defendants, a rehearing of the cause was granted, and further proofs taken. Upon that hearing it was made clearly to appear, from the testimony, that the artificial resweating of tobacco had been effected long prior to the application for the complainants' patent, by means of the application of steam in a chamber adapted for that purpose, applied to the tobacco while in the ordinary tobacco cases in which the leaf tobacco comes packed, just as the defendants were found to have practiced. The case, however, was decided against the defendants upon another ground, as appears from the opinion of the judge holding the circuit court. Robinson v. Sutter, 11 Fed. Rep. 798. He said: "The distinctive feature of complainants' device for resweating tobacco is the water tank in the bottom of their outer chamber, so that, by keeping this water at the proper temperature, the atmosphere of the outer chamber can be kept warm and humid, whereby the process of resweating will be induced and carried on to whatever extent shall be deemed desirable." The devices used prior to Robinson's invention, and proven as anticipations, which would avoid his patent for want of novelty, were found not to meet that point in the description of the complainants' device, inasmuch as the outer tank in each, into which the steam entered for the purpose of heating and moistening the tobacco, had specific provision made in it for drawing off the water formed by condensation of the steam, instead of being arranged so as to hold [537] a body of water in order to equalize and maintain the temperature of the vapor in the room or tank.

The defendants had also introduced in evidence, as an anticipation, a patent granted in 1865 to one Huse. His invention is described in his specification as follows:

"I take the tobacco by preference, after it has been desiccated and packed in the usual manner in hogsheads or cases, and which it is well known are not by any means so close as to exclude steam. I place these hogsheads or cases, or both, in a chamber of convenient size, and which can be closed up steam tight, and I then introduce heat and moisture by means of steam apparatus, such as generally employed for heating buildings, the coils or congeries of pipe being arranged in any suitable manner for a proper distribution of the heat. Some of the pipes, about one half of them, are to be pierced with very small holes, to permit the escape of steam into the chamber. It will be found best to raise and maintain the temperature at about 150 degrees Fahrenheit, and for about forty-eight hours for tobacco which has been well desiccated, a longer time being required when treated before it has been well dried. At the end of the time specified, the tobacco should be examined, and, so soon as nicotine is well developed, which will be indicated by the evolution of ammonia, the steam must be shut off, the chamber opened, the hogsheads or cases opened, the tobacco all opened and shaken and thoroughly dried, which is best done in an open and well ventilated room; and after it has been well dried the tobacco will be found to be thoroughly cured and ready for use, and further fermentation so completely stopped that it can be repacked and kept for any desired length of time.

"In this way I avoid all the evil consequences of the method heretofore practiced, while at the same time it will enable the planter to put his crop of tobacco in market in a comparatively short space of time.

"What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the process, substantially as herein described, of curing tobacco, which process consists in subjecting it to the [538] action of artificial heat and steam to induce the required fermentation until nicotine is evolved, and then stopping the further progress of fermentation by opening the packages and thoroughly drying every part substantially as described."

In respect to this, the circuit court said: "As for the Huse patent of 1865, it was only a box heated with steam coils, in which the tobacco was to be placed and heated by the radiation of heat from the pipes and the introduction of live steam." 11 Fed. Rep. 798.

There was, accordingly, a decree entered in favor of the complainants for an injunction, and for the recovery of $8,309.30 damages found by the master. The defendants have brought the present appeal.

It sufficiently appears from the evidence that if the essential and sole characteristic of the complainants' invention consists in a substitution of a close wooden box, to hold the tobacco while being subjected to the process of resweating, for metal tobacco holders previously in use, either the practice of the defendants in using as a tobacco holder the ordinary tobacco cases in which the leaf tobacco comes packed, during the process of resweating, is not an infringement, or, if it be so held, the complainants' invention was anticipated by others long prior to its date. This is shown by the Huse patent, and it is proven to have been employed by others, particularly by Louis Specht in the tobacco factory of August Beck & Co., in Chicago.

It only becomes important, therefore, to consider the ground finally taken in support of the decree, which involves the question whether the appellees are entitled to claim the water tank in the bottom of the outer chamber, and the use of water in it, whereby the atmosphere of the outer chamber can be kept warm and humid, so that the process of resweating may be induced and carried on to any desirable extent. In this connection it becomes important to consider the proceedings in the patent office in the granting of the patent, as shown by the file wrapper. It appears from the transcript of the record in the case that the defendants offered in evidence a copy of this file wrapper and contents, which was objected to as incompetent and not sufficiently verified. No ruling [539] of the circuit court seems to have been made upon the objection, and the paper, although described as marked, "Defendants' exhibit, copy of the file wrapper and contents of the Robinson patent," is not certified as a part of the evidence, and is not contained in the transcript. It does not, therefore, appear that the paper was ever before the court below, or considered by it in the hearing of the case. In this court, however, on the hearing, by consent of parties, the file wrapper and contents were ordered to be made a part of the record. From that paper it appears that the original specification, on which the application for a patent was based, declared that the petitioner had invented certain new and useful improvements in the method as well as apparatus for steaming leaf tobacco. In setting out the object of the invention, he said: "The object of this invention is to provide suitable means whereby the leaves may be subjected to the process of sweating by means of steam or water under the influence of heat, and to that end my invention consists of that process and in the apparatus by means of which I carry on the said process, substantially as hereinafter specified."

It was also stated, that "B is a tank or vessel for containing water and receiving the steam generated by the boiler A;" and that "steam may also be generated in the space by filling the latter partly with water, and by applying heat directly to the bottom of the tank B. A good result will be accomplished by keeping the water hot, though not to a degree sufficient to generate steam to any appreciable extent." The claims were set out as follows:

"First. The method or art, substantially as described, of treating tobacco; to wit, by placing the leaves in a tight vessel surrounded or partly surrounded by a chamber for containing water, and subjecting the tobacco to heat by heating the water in the said chamber, and keeping it to the proper temperature by means of heat applied to the said chamber continuously during the operation of sweating the leaves, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

"Second. The method or art, substantially as specified, of treating tobacco; to wit, by placing the leaves in a tight vessel surrounded [540] by a steam and water tight chamber, and by introducing steam into the said chamber, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

"Third. The apparatus, substantially as described, for treating tobacco; to wit, the tight vessel or tank B, the tight vessel C, made of wood and suspended in the tank B, and a steam generator or heater, all combined and operating together, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

"Fourth. The combination of the boiler A, the tight tank B, made of wood, the tight vessel C, made of wood and suspended in the tank B, and the pipes D and E entering the tank B and the boiler, all arranged and operating substantially as and for the purpose specified."

This application was filed on the 28th of February, 1879, and rejected by the patent office on the 6th of March, 1879.

Thereupon the applicant filed certain amendments to his specification, by striking out everything that related to the method or process for steaming leaf tobacco, and all that had reference to the use of water under the influence of heat, as contained in the tank B, and the first two claims. Amendments were also made by inserting other parts of the specification as it now stands; amongst others, the following: "I make the vessel C of wood, as an essential feature of my invention, in order that the steam may sweat or percolate through it from the tank B, and so that the tobacco will not be tainted by contact with the metal." And also the following: "The steam producing moisture in the vessel C, by sweating or percolating through it from the space b, in addition to the moisture originally in the tobacco before it was confined in the vessel."

On the 10th of April, 1879, the examiner informed the applicant that he "should specifically set forth that the structural plan of the device is old, and that the improvement consists alone in making the vessel C of wood instead of metal, and sufficiently porous to permit the steam to percolate through it."

Thereupon the applicant filed an amendment
[541] by inserting the following: "I am aware that the general structural plan of the apparatus hereinbefore described is old, excepting that the vessel C for receiving the tobacco has not, so far as I am aware, heretofore been made of wood, but of metal. The making of the vessel C of wood, and sufficiently porous to permit the steam to percolate through it, constitutes the essential feature of this invention. When metallic vessels are employed to receive the tobacco, it is liable to be tainted, and in such cases is merely heated, but not subjected to the moistening influence of steam or vapor percolating through the vessel containing the tobacco, as when this vessel is made of wood sufficiently porous to admit of that result. I do not, therefore, here intend to claim the general structural plan of the said apparatus independently of a vessel. C. made of wood, sufficiently porous to allow the steam to percolate through it."

On the 24th of April, 1879, the examiner wrote to the applicant as follows: "The specification should be amended by omitting all statements that the applicant has an improved process or is the inventor of such. * * * The statement of invention, and reference to the state of the art, both require correction, as the invention is an improved apparatus only."

Thereupon further amendments were made, resulting in the specification and claims as they now stand, and the patent was granted.

A comparison of the patent as granted with the application very conclusively establishes the limits within which the patentee's claims must be confined. He is not at liberty now to insist upon a construction of his patent which will include what he was expressly required to abandon and disavow as a condition of the grant. Shepard v. Carrigan, 116 U. S. 593 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 728], and cases there cited. It appears, therefore, distinctly that the patentee has no claim for a process of steaming tobacco by means of steam, or steam and a body of hot water, nor by any process whatever. His invention must be limited to the apparatus, and as to that he was expressly required to state that its structural plan was old and not of his invention. What is meant by the structural plan of the apparatus is the arrangement of the vessels for holding the tobacco, for confining [542] the steam and water, and for supplying the steam; and the precise improvement which is alone the subject of the patent is the substitution of a wooden vessel for holding the tobacco while being resweated in place of a metallic one. So that the ultimate question in the case is reduced to this, whether, in such an apparatus, the use of the cases, or boxes, or packages, in which the tobacco leaves are originally packed by the producer is equivalent to the wooden tobacco holder mentioned in the complainants' specification. If it is not, there is no infringement; if it is, as we have already seen, it had been anticipated for many years by the practice of other persons. It is expressly described in the Huse patent of 1865, where the inventor states, as follows: "I take the tobacco, by preference, after it has been desiccated and packed in the usual manner in hogsheads or cases, and which it is well known are not by any means so close as to exclude steam. I place these hogsheads or cases, or both, in a chamber of convenient size, and which can be closed up steam tight, and I then introduce heat and moisture by means of steam apparatus, such as generally employed for heating buildings, the coils or congeries of pipe being arranged in any suitable manner for a proper distribution of the heat. Some of the pipes, about one half of them, are to be pierced with very small holes to permit the escape of steam into the chamber." And the same thing was done at the establishment of August Beck & Co., in Chicago, before the date of Robinson's application, and by several others.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the decree below was erroneous. It is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill.

v.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF MISSOURI.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 513-523.)

Corporations—surrender of stock to effect consolidation—whether a sale—evidence—recital in deed, not an estoppel to one not a party.

1. The plaintiff in error, who was the principal promoter of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, surrendered to said Company certain shares of its stock for the purpose of effecting the consolidation of the American District Telegraph Company with said Telephone Company. In an action brought by him against the Telephone Company to recover the value of said stock, it is held that the transaction cannot be construed as a loan of the stock to the defendant to be returned in specie or accounted for in value, nor as a sale of the stock at what it was reasonably worth.

2. The defendant is not estopped by a recital to the effect that it had purchased said stock, contained in the act of agreement of consolidation between itself and the other corporation, as found in its minute book, because the plaintiff is not a party to the deed, and because the recital is an innocent misdescription of the transaction.

Argued Dec. 7, 8, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Millard R. Powers and L. R. Valliant, for plaintiff in error:

A party may assume an obligation by putting himself in a position which requires the performance of duties.

Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 68 (23: 386); Routsong v. Pacific R. R. 45 Mo. 236.

The stock was used by the defendant for its sole use and benefit. No express agreement to pay is necessary.

Toledo, W. & W. R. R. Co. v. Chew, 67 Ill. 378; Routsong v. Pacific R. R. supra.

The defendant is estopped from denying its liability.

Wood v. Whelen, 98 Ill. 153; Peoria & S. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 202; Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413.

Mr. Henry Hitchcock, for defendant in error.

The plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, being a citizen of the State of New York, brought his action at law in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri against the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, a corporation of that State, to recover $25,000, the price and value of 250 shares of the capital stock of the defendant Corporation, of the par value of $100 per share, the personal property of the plaintiff, advanced, furnished and delivered to the defendant at its special instance and request, to be by the defendant accounted for to the plaintiff. The defendant filed an answer containing a general denial of the allegations of the petition. The case came on for trial before a jury; evidence on both sides was heard, which is fully set out in a bill of exceptions, and the judge instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which was done. The judgment rendered thereon is sought to be reversed by the present writ of error.

The question presented is whether there was sufficient evidence in support of the plaintiff's cause of action to require its submission to the jury. It is conceded that there was no express agreement between the parties under which the defendant was bound to pay for the shares in question. The plaintiff's claim to recover was based entirely upon the supposition of a contract to be inferred from the acts of the parties. The undisputed facts on which this claim is founded are as follows:

In October, 1879, the plaintiff, Eldred, had some correspondence with the National Bell Telephone Company of Boston, with reference [515] to acquiring the right to operate telephonic exchanges in Kansas City and St. Louis. The arrangement which resulted from that correspondence required the organization of a corporation under the laws of Missouri, and the acquisition by it of certain outstanding contracts between the National Bell Telephone Company and the Kansas City Telephonic Exchange, and also of a contract between the former and the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis. Accordingly, the plaintiff, on December 3, 1879, organized under the laws of that State the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, the nominal capital stock of the Corporation being fixed at $400,000, in shares of $100 each. This stock was to be issued as full paid to the plaintiff and others named by him as associates, in consideration of the transfer to said Corporation of the rights expected to be acquired by him from the National Bell Telephone Company upon the conditions required by it. The plaintiff associated with himself four personal friends, Messrs. Kent and Storke, of New York, and Durant and Smith, of St. Louis, it being necessary, under the laws of Missouri, to have five stockholders as incorporators, agreeing to give them certain proportions of his interest in the rights to be acquired by him and transferred to the Corporation. The proportions were to be as follows: Storke 750 shares, Kent 250 shares, Smith 20 shares, and Durant 750 shares, out of 4,000, Eldred himself retaining the remaining 2,230 shares. No money was paid or to be paid by any of these incorporators for their interests. In the organization of the Company, the capital stock was subscribed for and taken up in the manner and proportions just stated, and certificates of stock for these amounts, respectively, were made out with the intention of delivering them to the subscribers. Before any such delivery was made, however, on the 19th day of December, 1879, the transaction took place by which the rights of the American District Telegraph Company were secured to the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri. To accomplish that it became necessary to make a consolidation, under the laws of Missouri, of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, as already organized, with the American District Telegraph Company. The latter was a corporation of Missouri, with a capital stock consisting of 500 shares of $50 each, 263 of which the plaintiff, Eldred, owned and controlled. According to the [516] plan of consolidation agreed on, it was necessary to issue to the owners of the capital stock of the American District Telegraph Company 250 shares of the stock in the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri.

The plaintiff, in his examination in chief, in answer to a question as to what steps were taken to effect this consolidation, made the following statement:

"We met several times, and I remember that at that time there seemed to be some difficulty about the consolidation of the two Companies in consequence of the statute of the State having been changed. There were several meetings held, and I believe the attorneys who had charge of the matter finally made the consolidation under both of the statutes, which necessitated considerable delay. On coming together, we had issued 4,000 shares of stock, and we wished to consolidate with the American District Telegraph Company, of which I was then president. I was president of both Companies. Therefore, it became necessary to provide for some shares to take up the stock of the American District Telegraph Company. These gentlemen, with whom I had been already associated, four in number, at that time were all personal friends of mine, and I gave them this stock. All the business was like a family operation. Two of the parties were in New York, Mr. Kent and Mr. Storke; and Durant, Smith, and myself were here. Previous to my coming to St. Louis, I had obtained proxies for the purpose of voting the stock of Mr. Storke and Mr. Kent, they not being present, and as I had agreed with them in regard to the proportion of stock which I was to give them, I did not feel authorized to act for them without authority, and therefore I said that I would advance the 250 shares necessary to make up the capital stock of the American District Telegraph Company out of the proportion which was to be issued to me. I think that was the way it was done. We had some trouble about the minutes under the existing statute, and I think they were fixed up by the attorneys afterwards, after I left the city, or about that time."

[517] A consultation was held between Eldred, the plaintiff, and Durant and Smith, two of his associates, on December 19, 1879, at the office of the Bell Telephone Company in St. Louis, as to how the arrangement should be consummated. The plaintiff's own statement, on cross examination as a witness in the case, of this conference, is as follows:

"All that I remember about that particular portion of it is that it was at no meeting of the board; so far as my recollection goes, Mr. Durant was the only person present, and we found by figuring up the stock that we hadn't enough shares to take in the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis. These gentlemen in interest were all personal friends of mine. Some of them were in New York, and I had no authority to make any concessions for them, and I therefore agreed with Mr. Durant, who was vice president and general manager of the Company, to advance 250 shares of the stock of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, so that we might take up the entire capital stock of the American District Telegraph Company." In answer to the question, "You say that you agreed. What did Durant say?" he said: "Mr. Durant didn't have much to say about it; I was the owner of the property, and he acquiesced generally in all I did."

On the same day a meeting of the stockholders of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri was held at its office, at which the three persons named, Durant, Eldred, and Smith, were present. Eldred was chairman of the meeting, and a preamble and resolution offered by Durant were unanimously adopted, and are as follows:

"Whereas, the National Bell Telephone Company (a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Massachusetts) has, by agreement with H. H. Eldred, granted the said Eldred certain valuable rights, concessions, and franchises under what are known as the Bell telephone patents and other patents owned and controlled by the said company, said agreement being contained in a written proposition duly accepted by the said Eldred, and to be fully set forth in contracts to be duly executed by the said National Bell Telephone Company, pursuant to said agreements; and whereas, the said rights, concessions, and franchises, so acquired by said Eldred, were by him transferred [518] to the parties hereinafter named, with interests in the proportion hereinafter set forth, as follows: H. L. Storke, 750; George H. Kent, 250; E. A. Smith, 20; George F. Durant, 750; H. H. Eldred, 2,230; total 4,000; said parties being the owners of said interests at the time of the incorporation of this Company, and being the sole incorporators of this Company; and whereas, said exclusive rights, concessions, and franchises constitute property rights of great value to this Corporation under its charter:

"Resolved, That in consideration of the complete assignment to this Corporation in due form, of all the rights, title and interest of said parties in said exclusive rights, concessions and franchises, so that the same may be fully possessed, enjoyed and enforced as by said Eldred, this Corporation hereby allots and sets apart to said parties 4,000 full-paid shares of its capital stock, constituting the authorized capital stock of said Company, to each of said parties a proportionate part of said 4,000 shares, according to his interest in said rights, concessions and franchises, and according to the subscription of each to the capital stock of this Company, and constituting a full payment of said subscription: H. L. Storke, 750 shares; George H. Kent, 250 shares: E. A. Smith, 20 shares; George F. Durant, 750 shares; H. H. Eldred, 2,230 shares; and, in consideration of the agreement of H. H. Eldred to surrender to this Company 250 shares of stock so allotted to him for the purpose of effecting a consolidation with the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis, a certificate of 1,980 shares shall be issued to said Eldred, and the 250 shares so surrendered shall be retained in the possession of this Company, subject to issuance hereafter for said purpose of consolidation; and the officers of the Company are directed to issue in due form certificates of stock to said parties above named, and to do and perform all acts necessary and proper for the full acceptance on the part of this Company of the aforesaid agreements and propositions of the National Bell Telephone Company in the execution of contracts or otherwise."

Accordingly, the original certificate for 2,230 shares of stock, made out to Eldred but never [519] delivered, was destroyed, and another certificate prepared for 1,980 shares, which was delivered to and received by Eldred.

It further appears from the evidence that the plaintiff advanced to the defendant $6,000 in money for the purpose of meeting the expenses of starting, which was afterwards repaid by it to him, and for the rights acquired from other sources than the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri subsequently paid the Western Union Telegraph Company, which was in fact their owner, the sum of $75,000.

The implied contract relied upon by the plaintiff in this case is of that class in which the promise of the defendant is to be inferred from the acts and conduct of the parties. The contract assumed to be thus proven is that, in consideration of 250 shares of its capital stock owned by the plaintiff and advanced by him to the defendant, at its instance and request, to be used for its benefit and advantage, and accepted by the defendant and so used, the defendant undertook and promised to pay the reasonable value thereof. The facts and circumstances relied on to justify this assumption do not seem to us to warrant it. It is a misconception of the transaction, as we view it, to construe it either as a loan of stock by the plaintiff to the defendant, to be returned either in specie or accounted for in value, or as a sale of stock by the plaintiff to the defendant at what the stock was reasonably worth. In truth, the dealing supposed to result in this bargain does not appear to have taken place between the plaintiff and the defendant, but between the plaintiff and his associates, corporators in the original corporation before the consolidation. It was an arrangement having reference to the relative rights and interests of the corporators themselves, and consisted in the readjustment of the relative proportions, inter sese, according to which they should hold the capital stock of the Company. There had been an agreement by which the 4,000 shares should be allotted among them, so that the plaintiff might have 2,230; the new agreement was that that allotment should be so changed as that the [520] plaintiff would have but 1,980; the 250 shares in question being surrendered out of the original allotment for another and different use in the reorganization of the Company, so as to take in other stockholders and other interests. The plaintiff in his testimony distinctly states that when it became apparent that 250 shares of the stock were required for this purpose, he did not feel at liberty to call upon his associates for a contribution, as he had promised them the number of shares specifically designated. It is difficult to see how this does not also exclude the liability he now seeks to enforce against the Corporation, which is but another mode of compelling his associates now to make that contribution, which he says he did not feel at liberty then to exact. The benefit conferred, assumed to be the consideration for the promise to return or repay which is sought to be enforced, was not in fact conferred upon the existing Corporation sued as a defendant; the only difference in its situation, resulting from the transaction, is that the stockholders of the American District Telegraph Company, instead of Eldred, became the owners of the 250 shares surrendered by the plaintiff, for which they paid by a transfer of the rights and property of the District Telegraph Company. The real benefit and advantage growing out of the transaction inured exclusively to the original corporators in the first Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, including the plaintiff himself, as it was the means whereby that corporation was enabled successfully to accomplish the object of its incorporation, but against them, as has already been shown, the plaintiff makes no claim. To enforce his claim against the existing Corporation is not only to compel his original associates to contribute, but also the stockholders of the District Telegraph Company, who became, by virtue of the transaction, stockholders in the defendant Corporation; but they made no such bargain as that. The transaction, whatever it was, was reduced to writing at the time and put on record, as a part of the proceedings of the stockholders of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri, in the recitals and resolution already set out, and is correctly characterized in them as an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to surrender to the Company 250 shares

[521] of the stock previously allotted to him, for the purpose of effecting a consolidation with the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis, the 250 shares so surrendered to be retained in the possession of the Company, subject to be issued thereafter for that purpose. There is nothing whatever in this statement to suggest or to warrant the conclusion that there was any sale of this stock by the plaintiff to the Company, or any loan or advance of it for its uses, for which it was expected any return or payment should be made.

The plan for the organization of the Company, both in its general outlines and in its details, was the plaintiff's own scheme, of which he continued to have control until its consummation, as he himself testifies. The original plan was that he was to retain 2,230 shares out of 4,000 of the capital stock of the new Company; but it was an essential part of his undertaking to acquire the property and franchises of the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis. He became satisfied that the best way to accomplish that was by the consolidation of the two companies as actually effected, and to insure this it became necessary for him to diminish the relative quantity of his interest in the capital of the consolidated Company; and to this end, and for this consideration, as actually and fully expressed in the resolution adopted by the stockholders, of whom he was chief, he agreed to surrender to the Company 250 shares of the stock previously intended for himself. He asked no one to contribute; he certainly did not contemplate the return of the stock in kind, for that was impossible; it is not a reasonable inference, from the facts and circumstances, that he expected any payment. It is clear, beyond doubt, that those with whom he was dealing had no reason to believe the existence of any expectation of that kind on his part. It was certainly treated and considered at the time as a part, and a necessary part, of the arrangement by which the plaintiff himself performed his own engagements with the National Bell Telephone Company for the purpose of putting into successful operation the scheme which he had organized by the formation of the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri.

The plaintiff as a part of his case, read in evidence from the minute book of the Bell Tele- [522] phone Company of Missouri the Act and agreement of consolidation between it and the American District Telegraph Company of St. Louis, in which it is recited that the party of the first part, the Bell Telephone Company of Missouri "has purchased and is now owner of 250 shares of its capital stock;" and this recital is relied upon as an admission that the transaction was one of purchase and sale, and not a voluntary surrender of the right to unissued stock. The recital, however, has no effect as an estoppel, the plaintiff being no party to the deed which contains it, and acquiring no rights on the faith of it; and it is in fact an innocent misdescription of a transaction, the real nature of which fully and unambiguously appears from the other record of the same Company, where it speaks of and records the transaction as it occurred and when it took place, being made, indeed, for that very purpose.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the jury would not have been warranted in drawing the conclusion of fact, from the evidence in the case, that there was any such agreement as that sued on, and that the relation of the parties, as shown in the circumstances of the transaction, was not such as, in contemplation of law, to give rise to any such liability.

The ruling of the Circuit Court was, therefore, correct and its judgment is affirmed.

LOT C. WHITFORD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
COUNTY OF CLARK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 522–525.)

Evidence—error to read deposition when witness in court.

1. It was error for the court below to allow, against objection, a deposition taken de bene esse under section 863, R. S., to be read when it was made to appear, before the reading, that the witness was himself actually present in court ready and able to testify in the case if called.

2. When the Statutes of the United States make special provisions as to the competency or admissibility of testimony in the courts of the United States, they must be followed and not the laws or the practice of the State in which the court is held, when they are different.

Argued Dec. 6, 7, 1886. Decided Dec. 20, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reversed.

This action was commenced in the court below by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error to recover upon certain interest coupons which had been detached from bonds alleged to have been issued by the defendant in aid of the construction of the Missouri & Mississippi Railway.

See U. S. v. Clark County, Bk. 24, 545; Id. 628.

Defendant pleaded nil debet; that plaintiff never owned the bonds or any of them; that none of the coupons sued on were the deed of the County, that they were never delivered by the County, that no consideration was ever received by the County; that the plaintiff was not the holder of the coupons for value; that the coupons had always been the property of the County; that they came immediately to the possession of the plaintiff from the agent of the County, and had then been long due and dishonored.

The case was tried by the court, a jury having been waived, and resulted in judgment for the defendant.

The case is further stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clinton Rowell, John B. Henderson and H. A. Clover, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. M. G. Reynolds, W. H. Hatch, Thos. J. C. Fagg and James M. Lewis, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the trial was by the court, a jury having been waived. The record presents a special finding of facts and certain exceptions to the rulings of the court on the admissibility of testimony. Upon the facts as found we should have had no hesitation in affirming the judgment, but in the rulings excepted to there was error. As part of the evidence on which the findings were made, the court, against the objections of Whitford, the plaintiff in error, allowed a deposition of N. T. Cherry, taken de bene esse under section 863 of the Revised Statutes, to be read, when it was made to appear before the reading that the witness was himself actually present in court ready and able to testify in the case if called. From the opinion filed on the decision of a motion for a new trial (Whitford v. Clark County, 13 Fed. Rep. 837), it appears that the court held the rule on this point "to be that when a deposition in a civil action has been duly taken, because the witness resides more than one hundred miles distant, said deposition is admissible, subject, however, to the right of the adverse party to place him on the witness stand if present. Such is understood to be the true rule, although decided cases are not fully in accord." But by section 865 of the Revised Statutes it is expressly provided, that "Unless it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the witness is then dead, or gone out of the United States, or to a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place where the court is sitting, or that, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, or imprisonment, he is unable to travel and appear at court, such deposition shall not be used in the cause." This was first enacted in the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, chap. 20, section 30, 1 Stat. at L. 90, and it has been in force from that time until now. In Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. 617 [30 U. S. bk. 8. L. ed. 248], it was said, in reference to this provision, that "the Act declares expressly that, unless the same (that is, the disability) shall be made to appear on the trial, such deposition shall not be admitted or used in the cause. This inhibition does not extend to the deposition of a witness living at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles; he being considered permanently beyond a compulsory attendance. The deposition in such case may not always be absolute, for the party against whom it is to be used may prove that the witness has removed within the reach of a subpœna after the deposition was taken; and if that fact was known to the party, he would be bound to procure his personal attendance. The onus, however, of proving this would rest upon the party opposing the admission of the deposition in evidence. It is, therefore, a deposition taken de bene esse." And in The Samuel, 1 Wheat. 15 [4 : 24], Chief Justice Marshall said a deposition taken under the statute de bene esse "can be read only when the witness himself is unattainable." See also Harris v. Wall, 7 How. 693 [12 : 875], and Rutherford v. Geddes, 4 Wall. 224 [18 : 344]. It thus appears to have been established at a very early date that depositions taken de bene esse could not be used in any case at the trial if the presence of the witness himself was actually attainable, and the party offering the deposition knew it or ought to have known it. If the witness lives more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, no subpœna need be issued to secure his compulsory attendance. So, too, if he lived more than one hundred miles away when his deposition was taken, it will be presumed that he continued to live there at the time of the trial; and no further proof on that subject need be furnished by the party offering the deposition, unless this presumption shall be overcome by proof from the other side. But if it be overcome, and the party has knowledge of his power to get the witness in time to enable him to secure an attendance at the trial, he must do so, and the deposition will be excluded. Such was this case. While the witness lived more than one hundred miles from the place of trial when his deposition was taken, he was actually in court, ready and able to testify when his testimony was needed at the trial. His deposition, therefore, was not admissible. The rulings of the circuit courts have uniformly been the same way, so far as we know. While some have gone beyond the decision in Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, none have fallen short of it. Lessee of Penns v. Ingraham, 2 Wash. C. C. 487, decided in 1811; Lessee of Brown v. Galloway, Peters, C. C. 294, decided in 1816; Pettibone v. Derringer, 4 Wash. C. C. 219, decided in 1818; Russell v. Ashley, Hemp. 549; Weed v. Armstrong, 6 McLean, 44.

As to depositions taken under a dedimus potestatem in accordance with section 866 of the Revised Statutes, this provision of section 865 does not apply, for it is expressly so enacted in that section. When the Statutes of the United States make special provisions as to the competency or admissibility of testimony, they must be followed in the courts of the United States, and not the laws or the practice of the State in which the court is held when they are different. Potter v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 165 [26: 112]; King v. Worthington, 104 U. S. 50 [26: 654]; Bradley v. U. S. 104 U. S. 443 [26: 825]; Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 721 [28: 1120].

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions for a new trial.

VALLETTE DRY DOCK COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 625-630)

Admiralty—salvage—dry dock, not a subject of—jurisdiction—"salvage" and "ships and vessels" defined, and authorities reviewed.

1. A dry dock is not a navigable structure intended for transportation, and it is not, therefore, a subject of salvage service.
2. A libel against a dry dock for salvage is not within the admiralty jurisdiction.

[No. 80.]

Argued and submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. R. Beckwith, for appellants:

Personal property, which is not an instrument or vehicle of commerce may be the subject of a salvage service. "In the Matter of a Whale," 2 Hagg. Adm. 438, salvage was allowed for the rescue of a dead whale. The Federal Admiralty Courts of Massachusetts have repeatedly allowed salvage for whales.

Ghen v. Rich, 8 Fed. Rep. 159; Taber v. Jenny, 1 Sprague, 315; Bartlett v. Budd, 1 Low. Dec. 223; 3 Black Book of the Admiralty, 439. See also 50,000 Feet of Timber, 2 Low. Dec. 64; 23 Bales of Cotton, 9 Ben. 48.

It seems clear, both from authority and upon principle, that to become charged with a lien for salvage, it is only necessary that the property saved be personal or chattel property sunken in the sea, or afloat and adrift upon navigable waters, or cast ashore from the seas, within the dominion of admiralty, subjected at the time of rescue to danger of becoming lost to the owner or liable to be destroyed by the accidents or perils of the sea or navigation.

Mr. Alfred Goldthwaite, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel for salvage filed in the District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana by the owners of the steam tug Col. L. Aspinwall, her master and crew, and the owner of the steam tug Joseph Cooper, and her crew, against the Vallette Dry Dock Company of New Orleans, to recover salvage for salving the Company's dry dock at Algiers, opposite New Orleans, from sinking and becoming a total loss. According to the allegations of the [626] libel, the said dry dock was run into by the steamship Clintonia, which did not obey her helm, and by the force of the collision a large hole was broken into the side of the dock, extending below the water line, and it began to fill with water, and commenced sinking, and would have sunk but for the exertions of the libelants, who hastened to its relief and applied their suction pumps in pumping out the water with which it was being filled, and thus at large expense and much trouble saved her from destruction. The libel alleges that the Vallette dry dock is a large floating vessel and water craft and artificial contrivance, used and capable of being used as a means of transportation in water, and was of great value, having cost upwards of $200,000, and was largely and profitably engaged in the business of docking vessels for repairs in the Mississippi River, and the libelants claim that their services were of the greatest merit, deserving a reward of at least $5,000.

The respondents pleaded, first, res judicata, alleging that a similar libel for the same cause had been formerly filed in the same court and dismissed for want of jurisdiction. This plea was overruled. Their second plea was to the effect that the case is not one of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; that the assistance rendered by the libelants to the dry dock was not a salvage service; that the dry dock is not devoted to the purpose of transportation and commerce, nor intended for navigation; that it is nothing more than pieces of lumber fastened together and placed upon the water to receive vessels for repair, and having engines used, not for the purpose of locomotion from one place to another (of which, by its own resources, it is incapable), but solely to lower and elevate said dock, in order to receive vessels for repair; that it was always solely employed in the business of docking and repairing vessels; that at the time of the alleged salvage services it was moored and lying at its usual place where it had been located ever since the year 1866. Proofs being taken, the district court dismissed the libel upon the plea to the jurisdiction; and on appeal to the circuit court, the same decree was made.

The facts found by the circuit court substan- [627] tially corroborate the plea. They describe the dry dock as a structure contrived for the purpose of taking ships out of the water, in order to repair them, and for no other purpose. They state that it consisted of a large oblong box, with a flat bottom and perpendicular sides; that in the year 1866 it had been put in position by being permanently moored by means of large chains to the right or Algiers bank of the Mississippi River, and was sparred off from the bank by means of spars, to keep it afloat. When it was desired to dock a steamboat or other vessel, it was sunk by letting in water until the vessel to be docked could be floated into it. It was then raised by pumping the water out, leaving the docked vessel in a position to be inspected and repaired. It was furnished with engines, but they could only be used for pumping, and the dry dock had no means of propulsion, either by wind, steam or otherwise. It was not designed for navigation and could not be practically used therefor. The circumstances of the collision and rescue were substantially as stated in the libel. As a conclusion of law, the circuit court found that the services of the libelants were not salvage services, and that neither that court nor the district court had jurisdiction of the case.

We have no hesitation in saying that the decree of the circuit court was right. A fixed structure, such as this dry dock is, not used for the purpose of navigation, is not a subject of salvage service, any more than is a wharf or a warehouse when projecting into or upon the water. The fact that it floats on the water does not make it a ship or vessel, and no structure that is not a ship or vessel is a subject of salvage. A ferry bridge is generally a floating structure, hinged or chained to a wharf. This might be the subject of salvage as well as a dry dock. A sailor's floating bethel or meeting house moored to a wharf, and kept in place by a paling of surrounding piles, is in the same category. It can hardly be contended that such a structure is susceptible of salvage service. A ship or vessel, used for navigation and commerce, though lying at a wharf, and temporarily made fast thereto, as well as her furniture and cargo, are maritime subjects, and are capable of receiving salvage service. "Salvage is a [628] reward or recompense given to those by means of whose labor, intrepidity, or perseverance a ship or goods have been saved from shipwreck, fire, or capture." 2 Bell, Com. 688, 7th ed. "Salvage," says Kent, "is the compensation allowed to persons by whose assistance a ship or its cargo has been saved in whole or in part from impending danger, or recovered from actual loss, in cases of shipwreck, derelict, or recapture." 3 Kent, 245. Lord Tenterden defines it as "the compensation that is made to those persons by whose assistance a ship or its lading may be saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss." Abb. Shipping, 554. Sir Christopher Robinson defines salvage as follows: "Salvage, in its simple character, is the service which those who recover property from loss or danger at sea render to the owners, with the responsibility of making restitution, and with a lien for their reward." The Thetis, 3 Hagg. Adm. 14, 48. This definition is adopted by Maclachlan, in his treatise on Merchant Shipping, chap. XIII, p. 528. Sir John Nichol, in The Clifton 3 Hagg. Adm. 117, 120, says: "Now salvage is not always a mere compensation for work and labor; various circumstances upon public considerations, the interests of commerce, the benefit and security of navigation, the lives of the seamen, render it proper to estimate a salvage reward upon a more enlarged and liberal scale. The ingredients of a salvage service are, first, enterprise in the salvors in going out in tempestuous weather to assist a vessel in distress, risking their own lives to save their fellow creatures, and to rescue the property of their fellow subjects; secondly, the degree of danger and distress from which the property is rescued—whether it were in imminent peril, and almost certain to be lost if not at the time rescued and preserved; thirdly, the degree of labor and skill which the salvors incur and display, and the time occupied; lastly, the value. Where all these circumstances concur, a large and liberal reward ought to be given; but where none, or scarcely any take place, the compensation can hardly be denominated a salvage compensation; it is little more than a remuner- [629]

If we search through all the books, from the Rules of Oleron to the present time, we shall find that salvage is only spoken of in relation to ships and vessels and their cargoes, or those things which have been committed to, or lost in, the sea or its branches, or other public navigable waters, and have been found and rescued.

It is true that the terms "ships and vessels" are used in a very broad sense, to include all navigable structures intended for transportation. In a recent case decided by the Court of Appeal in England, which arose upon that part of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, § 458) giving jurisdiction to justices of the peace in certain cases of salvage, "Whenever any ship or boat is stranded, or otherwise in distress, on the shore of any sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom," it was held (overruling Sir Robert Phillimore) that the word "ship" would include a hopper barge used for receiving mud from a dredging machine and carrying it out to deep water, though it had no means of locomotion of its own, but was towed by other vessels; it had a bow, stern and rudder, and was steerable. Lord Justice Brett said: "The words 'ship' and 'boat' are used; but it seems plain to me that the word 'ship' is not used in the technical sense as denoting a vessel of a particular rig. In popular language, ships are of different kinds; barques, brigs, schooners, sloops, cutters. The word includes anything floating in or upon the water, built in a particular form, and used for a particular purpose. In this case, the vessel, if she may be so called, was built for a particular purpose; she was built as a hopper barge; she has no motive power, no means of progression within herself. Towing alone will not conduct her; she must have a rudder; and, therefore, she must have men on board to steer her. Barges are vessels in a certain sense; and as the word 'ship' is not used in a strictly nautical meaning, but is used in a popular meaning, I think that this hopper barge is a 'ship.' * * * This hopper barge is used for carrying men and mud; she is used in navigation; for to dredge up and carry away mud and gravel [630] is an act done for the purposes of navigation.

Suppose that a saloon barge, capable of carrying 200 persons, is towed down the River Mersey in order to put passengers on board of vessels lying at its mouth; she would be used for the purposes of navigation, and I think it equally true that the hopper barge was used in navigation." The Mac, 7 Prob. Div. 126; overruling S. C. Id. 88.

Perhaps this case goes as far as any case has gone in extending the meaning of the terms "ship" or "vessel." Still, the hopper barge was a navigable structure used for the purpose of transportation. We think no case can be found which would construe the terms to include a dry dock, a floating bridge, or meeting house, permanently moored or attached to a wharf.

There has been some conflict of decision with respect to claims for salvage services in rescuing goods lost at sea and found floating on the surface or cast upon the shore. When they have belonged to a ship or vessel as part of its furniture or cargo they clearly come under the head of wreck, flotsam, jetsam, ligan, or derelict, and salvage may be claimed upon them. But when they have no connection with a ship or vessel some authorities are against the claim, and others are in favor of it. Decisions in favor of the claim in reference to rafts of timber found floating at sea were made by Judge Betts in the New York District (A Raft of Spars, 1 Abb. Adm. 485), and by Judge Lowell in the Massachusetts District (50,000 Feet of Timber, 2 Lowell, 64), and against it by Chief Justice Taney in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Maryland (Tome v. 4 Cribs of Lumber, Taney, Dec. 533), and by the English Court of Exchequer, in Palmer v. Rouse, 3 Hurl. & N. 505. Perhaps the decisions in the last two cases were affected by local custom or statutory provisions. None of these cases, however, throw any light on the subject in hand. The case of Salvor Wrecking Co. v. Sectional Dry Dock Co. reported in 3 Central Law Journal, 640, and the note appended thereto, may be referred to for an interesting discussion of the question. Judge Dillon, in that case, held that a dry dock is not a subject of salvage service.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

EDWARD MERRILL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 581-584.)

Jurisdiction—grant of public lands to State—controversy between parties claiming under State—no federal question involved—preemption claim.

1. Where two parties claim lands which Congress has granted to a State, one claiming a right to purchase of the State, and the other claiming under an alleged location under the laws of the State, prior to the grant by Congress, no federal question is involved and this court is without jurisdiction.

2. The plaintiff in error, who seeks to establish a right to purchase from the State, set up a claim under the preemption laws, but did not rely upon it. It seems that this claim may possibly be asserted in another suit.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California. Dismissed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. T. Britton, A. B. Browne and W. H. Smith, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward B. Merrill, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit begun by Mace, the plaintiff in error, against Merrill, the defendant in error, in the District Court of Los Angeles County, [582] California, pursuant to a reference by the Surveyor-General of the State, under section 3314 of the Political Code of that State, which is as follows:

"When a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey or location before the Surveyor-General, or concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer before whom the contest is made may, when the question involved is as to the survey, or one purely of fact, or whether the land applied for is a part of the swamp or overflowed lands of the State, or whether it is included within a confirmed grant, the lines of which have been run by authority of law, proceed to hear and determine the same; but when, in the judgment of the officer, a question of law is involved, or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the State, he must make an order referring the contest to the district court of the county in which the land is situated, and must enter such order in a record book in his office."

The record shows that the S. E. ¼, Sec. 21, T. 2 S., R. 13 W., S. B. M., was listed to the State of California by the Secretary of the Interior on the 21st of March, 1876, as part of the 500,000 acres of land selected by the State under section 8 of the Act of Congress approved September 24, 1841, chap. 16, 5 Stat. at L. 455, for the purpose of internal improvements. On the 17th of November, 1874, Mace applied to the Surveyor-General of the State for the purchase of this tract. His application was on file when the land was listed. Merrill, the defendant in error, also claimed the same tract from the Surveyor-General. His claim was based on an alleged location of the tract under the laws of California, and a payment therefor to the State in school warrants on the 22d of June, 1857. Such being the case, he insisted that the title of the State inured to his benefit under the provisions of sections 1 and 8 of the Act of July 23, 1866, chap. 219, 14 Stat. at L., 218, "To quiet land titles in California." Mace set up no title in himself under any statute or authority of the United States. His application was to the State, and he claimed under state authority only. It is true that if the State had the right to sell he might have the right to buy, but that right to buy would come, not from the United States, but from the State. The court below [583] decided that the State could not sell because it had already sold to Merrill, and that all the title it had was held in trust for him. Mace, in his petition, did indeed aver that he entered into the possession of the land in 1869, with the intention of acquiring title from the United States by preemption, and that in 1873 he filed in the proper office his declaratory statement and offered the necessary proof; but his claim in this case is not based on any such right, the prayer of his petition being only that it may be adjudged that he "has the better right to purchase." If his rights under the preemption laws are superior to the title of Merrill under the State's selection, it may perhaps be made a subject of litigation in another suit, where his title can be set up against that of Merrill; but in this suit, which is only to establish his right to buy from the State, no such questions can arise. His right to buy has no connection whatever with his claim of preemption; for, as he says in his petition, "He made application to the Surveyor-General of the State of California under the provisions of Title Eight of the Political Code of the State, to purchase, * * * which said application was in all respects made in conformity with the requirements of the Code aforesaid, and which application has been ever since the date last aforesaid, and now is, on file in the office of the Surveyor-General aforesaid;" and "the plaintiff is the owner of a school land warrant, and under which he claims the benefit of the location of said quarter section." Had this suit been instituted by Mace to establish a right superior to that of the State, growing out of his preemption claim, and to charge the State as his trustee on that account, the case would have been different; for then he would have set up a right under the preemption laws of the United States and, with a decision against him, he might be in a condition to have a review by this court. Instead of that, however, he has contented himself with seeking to buy from the State that which, it has been decided, the State had no right to sell.

It is possible, also, that, by the practice in California, Mace might have contested the title of the State before the Surveyor-General, and had the case referred to the district court for the purpose of determining that title, and having a trust declared in his favor under the listing which had been made. The cases of Tyler [584] v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 26, and Thompson v. True, 48 Cal. 608, indicate that this might be done, but such, as we have seen, is not the purpose of this suit. For all the purposes of the present inquiry, the right of the State to have the lands listed under the Act of 1841 must be considered as admitted, and the litigation confined to the contest between the parties as to which has the better right to buy from the State. According to the respective claims of the parties, Merrill did buy in 1857 and Mace made application to buy in 1874. Both claim under the State. If Merrill actually did buy, as he says he did, the title of the State inured to his benefit under the Act of Congress as soon as it passed from the United States. If he did not, then, so far as the record discloses, Mace might have had the right to buy when he made application for that purpose. The determination of this question, as the case comes here, involves no federal right in Mace which has been denied him by the decision of the court below. We consequently have no jurisdiction, and the cases of Romie v. Casanova, 91 U. S. 379 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 374]; McStay v. Friedman, 92 U. S. 728 [23: 767], and Hastings v. Jackson, 112 U. S. 288 [28:712], are directly to that effect. Indeed, the case of Hastings v. Jackson is strikingly like this in its material facts.

The writ of error is dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

IRON MOUNTAIN AND HELENA RAIL- [608] ROAD COMPANY ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

ALBERT H. JOHNSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 608-613.)

Forcible entry and detainer—Statute of Arkansas—recovery of part of a railroad—common-law rule.

1. Under the Statute of Arkansas relating to forcible entry and detainer, part of a railroad may be recovered by a contractor, who has been, by force and violence, turned out of possession after its completion and before payment.

2. In such an action questions relating to the validity and construction of the contract are immaterial.

3. It seems that upon the facts presented forcible entry and detainer would lie at common law.

[No. 88.]

Argued Dec. 10, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith and John F. Dillon, for plaintiffs in error:

The directors had no authority to authorize any stipulation delegating to the plaintiff the right to possess, use and operate the defendant's railroad. If they did so the act was ultra vires, and the plaintiff had no right to hold the road—to operate and use it. The road so in his possession is not "lands, tenements or other possessions" within the meaning of the Arkansas Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer.

See Rees v. Lawless, Litt. (Ky.) Sel. Cas. 184.

The whole class of decisions—such, for instance, as those in which it is held that statutes providing for the redemption of real estate do not apply to railroads; Hammock v. Loan & T. Co. 105 U. S. 77 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1111); that statutes providing for the sale of real estate on execution do not apply to railroads, Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 21 How. 112 (16: 38); Morawetz, Corp. 2d ed. section 1125, and cases there cited; that mechanics' lien statutes are inapplicable to railroads, unless clearly so expressed, or, when applicable at all, that the lien attaches to the whole road and not to a specific part of it (2 Wood, R. § 208, and cases there cited)—these cases, we say, are grounded upon the one underlying principle that the roadbed or right of way of a railroad company is not real estate in the usual sense of the word, in its hands, for its uses, but is merely an appurtenance to the franchise.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, J. C. Tappan and John J. Hornor, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [609] the court:

This is a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The suit was commenced by an action of forcible entry and detainer brought by Johnson, the present] defendant in error, against the Iron Mountain and Helena Railroad Company, and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company was, in the progress of the case, made a defendant on its own petition. The action was to recover possession of eighteen miles of a railroad which Johnson had built for the defendant, and from which he had been ejected by force and violence by the Iron Mountain and Helena Railroad Company. On the trial before a jury Johnson recovered a verdict on which a judgment was entered for restitution to the possession of the road. To reverse this judgment the present writ of error is brought.

Although there is some controversy about the validity and effect of the contract under which Johnson constructed and held possession of this eighteen miles of road, part of a larger road of the defendant, the main facts on which his right to recover depend are simple and not much controverted. Whatever may be the truth about the validity and construction of the contract under which he built the road for the Company, it is fully established that, after he had built it, and before they had paid him for it, he was in possession of it, using it by running his own locomotives over it; and that while thus in peaceable possession and claiming a right to hold it until he was paid for building it, he was by force and violence turned out of this possession by the Railroad Company, its officers and agents.

The Statute of Arkansas relating to forcible entries and detainers is to be found in chapter LXVII, Mansfield's Digest, as follows:

"Sec. 3346. No person shall enter into or upon any lands, tenements or other possessions, and detain or hold the same, but where an entry is given by law, and then only in a peaceable manner.

[610] "Sec. 3347. If any person shall enter into or upon any lands, tenements or other possessions, and detain or hold the same with force and strong hand, or with weapons or breaking open the doors and windows or other parts of the house, whether any person be in or not, or by threatening to kill, maim or beat the party in possession, or by entering peaceably and then turning out by force, or frightening by threats or other circumstances of terror the party to yield possession—in such case every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a forcible entry and detainer within the meaning of this Act."

"Sec. 3368. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any party from proceeding under this Act by filing his complaint and causing an ordinary summons to be issued without filing the affidavit or giving the obligation hereinbefore required; and in all cases, when the judgment shall be for the plaintiff, the court shall award him a writ of restitution to carry such judgment into execution."

The main objection relied upon by plaintiff in error to the recovery of the plaintiff below is that a railroad is not real estate, nor such an interest in real estate that it can be recovered by actions applicable to that class of property. It is argued that a railroad is a complex kind of incorporeal hereditament, the possession of which is not authorized to be changed by an action of forcible entry and detainer. We do not think this objection would be a good one if in the State of Arkansas that action were left as it was at common law. The statute of that State, however, which, we have just quoted, materially enlarges the extent and operation of this action. The language of both sections 3346 and 3347 makes it applicable to "lands, tenements or other possessions," and declares that "If any person shall enter into or upon any lands, tenements or other possessions, and detain or hold them with force and strong hand, or with weapons, * * * or frightening by threats or other circumstances of terror the party to yield possession, in such case every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a forcible entry and detainer within the meaning of this [611] Act."

We do not see any reason in the nature of the possession of a section of a railroad which takes it out of the language of this statute, or out of the general principle which lies at the foundation of all suits of forcible entry and detainer. The general purpose of these statutes is that, not regarding the actual condition of the title to the property, where any person is in the peaceable and quiet possession of it, he shall not be turned out by the strong hand, by force, by violence, or by terror. The party so using force and acquiring possession may have the superior title, or may have the better right to the present possession, but the policy of the law in this class of cases is to prevent disturbances of the public peace, to forbid any person righting himself in a case of that kind by his own hand and by violence, and to require that the party who has in this manner obtained possession shall restore it to the party from whom it has been so obtained; and then, when the parties are in statu quo, or in the same position as they were before the use of violence, the party out of possession must resort to legal means to obtain his possession, as he should have done in the first instance. This is the philosophy which lies at the foundation of all these actions of forcible entry and detainer, which are declared not to have relation to the condition of the title, or to the absolute right of possession, but to compelling the party out of possession, who desires to recover it of a person in the peaceable possession, to respect and resort to the law alone to obtain what he claims.

It occurs to us that this principle is as fully applicable to the possession of a railroad, or a part of a railroad, as to any other class of landed interests; and in fact that, of all owners or claimants of real estate, large corporations, with vast bodies of employees and servants ready to execute their orders, are the last persons who should be permitted to right themselves by force. The language of the presiding judge in his charge to the jury in this case meets our entire approval, and we quote from it as follows:

"The law will not sanction or support a possession acquired by such means, but will, on the contrary, when appealed to in this form of action, compel the party who thus gains possession to surrender it to the party whom he dispos- [612] sessed, without inquiring which party owns the property or has the legal right to the possession. If the law was otherwise, force, the exhibition and use of deadly weapons, and threats of personal violence, would speedily take the place of lawful and peaceful methods of gaining possession of property. The law compels a defendant, found guilty of a forcible entry and detainer, to restore the possession. After he has restored the possession so forcibly and wrongfully acquired, he can then proceed in a lawful manner to assert his claim to the property; but he cannot have his legal rights to the property, or its possession, adjudged or determined in the action of forcible entry and detainer, when, by his own admission or the proof in the case, he is shown to be guilty of a forcible entry and detainer. If, therefore, you find that the plaintiff built the eighteen miles of road in controversy, and had been in the quiet and peaceable possession of the same from the time of its completion, claiming the right to such possession under the contract, and that, while so in the quiet and peaceable possession of the road, Bailey, the president of the defendant corporation, with a force of men acting in the name and on behalf of the defendant corporation, by force and strong hand, or with weapons, or by threatening to kill, maim or beat, or by such words and actions as have a natural tendency to excite fear or apprehension of danger, drove the plaintiff's agents or employees out of his cars and off the road with the declared purpose of retaining the possession of the same, then the defendant corporation is guilty of a forcible entry and detainer within the meaning of the statutes of this State, and the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict."

In this view of the case nearly all the questions raised by counsel for plaintiff in error, in regard to the contract under which Johnson built this eighteen miles of road, and held possession of it, and his right to hold possession, are immaterial. The jury must have found, under this charge, that he was in the peaceable and quiet possession of the property, and was ejected from it by the force and violence and wrong doing of the Iron Mountain and Helena [613] Railroad Company. They were not bound to inquire any further, nor are we bound to answer other questions.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Practice—refusal of clerk of state court to transmit copy of record—no writ of error—this court has no jurisdiction—mandamus does not lie—allowance of supersedeas—validity of—vacation of—whether judge of state court can allow writ of error to this court.

1. It is not the duty of the clerk of a state court to transmit a copy of the record of a case, determined in such court, to this court, until there is a writ of error to which it can be annexed and with which it can be returned.

2. Where no writ of error has in fact been issued, this court is without jurisdiction of the suit, and cannot by mandamus require the clerk of the state court to transmit to it a copy of the record.

3. A supersedeas allowed by a justice of this court under a mistaken supposition that a writ of error had been issued, has no legal effect; but this court is without jurisdiction to vacate the order.

4. A supersedeas cannot be allowed except as an incident to an appeal actually taken, or a writ of error actually sued out.

5. It seems that it is very doubtful whether the clerk of a state court can issue a writ of error to this court on the allowance of a judge of the state court.

[No. 5, Orig.]

Petition filed Oct. 25, 1886. Rule granted, Nov. 8, 1886. Argued, and motion to vacate supersedeas submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

ORIGINAL. Petition for mandamus, and motion to vacate order allowing supersedeas. Denied.

The facts are given in the opinion.

Mr. S. Prentiss Nutt, for petitioner.

Mr. James Lowndes, in support of motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for a writ of mandamus requiring the clerk of the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to transmit to this court a true copy of the record in that court of a judgment in the suit of the British and American Mortgage Company against Mrs. E. J. Ralston and her husband, omitting therefrom certain portions not material to the federal question involved. [614] From the showing made it sufficiently appears that the judgment was rendered April 5, 1886, and that on the 31st of May, 1886, the Chief Justice of the state court allowed a writ of error to this court, "on furnishing bond, with security, according to law, for one thousand dollars, not to operate as a supersedeas." No writ was, however, issued in fact, but the order of allowance, with the petition therefor, was filed in the office of the clerk of the state court, "and a demand made on the clerk * * * for a copy of the record." According to the statements in the petition, the clerk refused to give such a transcript unless it should include everything used on the trial in the state court, but the petitioner wanted only such parts of the record as were necessary to present the single question of which this court had jurisdiction.

After the allowance of the writ by the Chief Justice of the state court, on application of the petitioner, Mr. Justice Woods, the associate justice of this court allotted to the Fifth Circuit, made this order, evidently supposing that a writ of error had actually been issued:

"A writ of error having been allowed in this case and a bond given and duly approved, without an allowance of supersedeas, though the right of supersedeas is claimed by Mrs. E. J. Ralston, the plaintiff in error, it is ordered that further proceedings to enforce executory process in execution sought to be enforced in this case in the Supreme Court of Louisiana, or in the district court from which the case was appealed to said Supreme Court of Louisiana, be suspended until the further order of the Supreme Court of the United States."

From this statement it is apparent that we have no authority over the clerk in the matter about which the mandamus is asked. As no writ of error has in fact been issued, we have no jurisdiction of the suit. Mussina v. Cavazos, 6 Wall. 358 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 811]; Bondurant, Tutrix v. Watson, 103 U. S. 278 [26: 447]. Waiving the question whether the clerk of the state court could issue the writ on the allowance of the Chief Justice of that court, which, to say the least, has never yet been held by this court, McDonogh v. Millaudon, 8 How. 693 [11:787], it is sufficient to say that he never has done so, and, so far as this record shows, he [615] has never been asked to do it. Certainly it has been the prevailing custom from the beginning for the clerk of this court, or the clerk of the circuit court for the proper district, to issue the writ, and for such a writ to be lodged with the clerk of the state court before he could be called on to make the necessary transcript for use in this court. Consequently, the simple lodging of the allowance with him cannot be considered as a demand for the writ; and besides, this proceeding is not to require him to issue the writ, but to furnish a transcript to be annexed to and returned with the writ (R. S. § 997), which it is not his duty to give until there is a writ to which it can be annexed and with which it can be returned. The application for the mandamus is consequently denied.

Pending these proceedings for mandamus the British and American Mortgage Company has filed a motion to vacate the supersedeas allowed by Mr. Justice Woods. But, as no writ of error has ever been issued, that order has no legal effect. A supersedeas cannot be allowed except as an incident to an appeal actually taken, or a writ of error actually sued out. We, however, are as much without jurisdiction to vacate the order of the Justice as he was without jurisdiction to grant it.

Consequently, the motion to vacate must be denied, although the order as it stands is of no validity.

Letters patent for improvement in hydro-carbon stoves—construction of first claim.

1. The first claim of letters patent No. 177334, for an improvement in hydro-carbon stoves, must be confined to the use of a perforated top plate to the cylinder having the functions and mode of operation set forth in the specification.

2. Said first claim is not infringed by a stove in which the hot air cylinder rests on three equidistant struts, extending from its base to the wall of the water chamber.

Argued Dec. 16, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Arthur v. Briesen, for appellant.

Mr. B. F. Lee, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought for the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 177334, granted to Abner B. Hutchins, May 16, 1876, for an improvement in hydro-carbon stoves. The specification and drawings are as follows:

"The object of this invention is to produce a stove which can safely and easily be heated by the combustion of a hydro-carbon or oil in a similar manner to that in common use in illuminating lamps.

The invention consists of the following devices: The vessel or chamber containing the oil or hydro-carbon is submerged in water, so as to always keep the said oil vessel or chamber cool, and thereby free from explosive or other [632] accident. The water vessel is covered with a perforated metal plate, which forms the base of the hot air cylinder, on the top of which the culinary or other vessels to be heated are placed. Vertical tubes or flues are placed in the hot air cylinder in such positions as to act as chimneys for the burners. Mica windows are placed in the sides of these flues or chimneys in such positions as as to enable the operator to observe the flame of the burner and to regulate the same as circumstances may require.

The invention will be readily understood by reference to the accompanying drawings, of which figure 1 is partly an elevation and partly a vertical section of the improved stove. Figure 2 is partly a plan and partly a section of the same. In this view the half of the top plate only is removed, so as to disclose the construction of the hot air cylinder and the flues or chimneys. Figure 3 is a sectional plan of the stove, taken just below the top plate of the water chamber, and showing a part of the top plate of the oil vessel or reservoir broken out.

The base of the stove consists of a vessel, A, resting, for convenience, on short legs a. This vessel is intended to contain water, and has a top plate, A′, which is preferably made of cast metal, and strong enough to support all the parts of the stove which are above it. This plate A′ is annular in form if the stove is of general cylindrical construction (which is preferable to other forms), the central opening in the said plate being nearly equal in area to the sectional [634] area of the hot air cylinder C, which rests upon it. Concentrically arranged around this central opening is a series of perforations, a^1, through which atmospheric air passes down into the top part of the vessel A, and thence up through the hot air cylinder and its chimneys.

The reservoir or vessel B, in which the oil or hydro-carbon is put for use in this stove, is placed within the vessel A, and the bottom of the vessel A may likewise constitute the support for the bottom of the vessel B, and there will be an intervening chamber, B′, between the sides of the vessel B and its inclosing vessel A, and the sides of the vessel A will extend up one or two inches (more or less) above the top of the vessel B. While in use the annular chamber B′ will be filled with water, and water will also cover the top of the vessel B, which said vessel and its contained fluid will thereby be always kept at a low temperature, and accident from the ignition or explosion of the oil or hydro-carbon will thus be rendered impossible by this water covering. A tube, b, extends from the vessel B up through one of the perforations or apertures a^1, and serves as a means of filling the vessel B. A suitable screw cap closes the top end of this tube. A pipe or valve, a^2, leads from the chamber B to the outside of A, for the purpose of drawing off the water when it becomes heated, or when the occasion

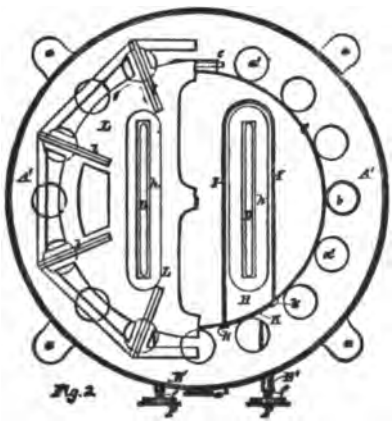

Fig. 2.

requires it. Water may easily be poured into the vessel A through the apertures a^1.

The wick tubes D are attached to the top of the vessel B, and the wick used to conduct the oil from B to the flame is operated in the usual manner of illuminating lamps. The rollers for moving the wicks up and down are inclosed in casings or housings E, and are operated by the thumb wheels F, the stems f of which pass through tubes E', that are attached tightly to the ends of the housings E, and pass through the side of the vessel A. Care must be taken to have all of the parts of D E E' that lie within the water way of A perfectly water tight, so as to prevent the leakage of the water either into the vessel B or outside of A.

The hot-air cylinder C is preferably built of sheet metal, and is hinged to its base plate A' [635] by the hinge c at the back side of the stove, so as to permit the top parts of the stove to be tipped back out of the way of trimming the wicks, or for other purposes. A finely perforated diaphragm, G, covers the central opening of the base plate A' below the hot-air cylinder, for the purpose of properly controlling the air currents that pass up from the chamber of A into the hot-air cylinder. A diaphragm H, within the hot-air cylinder C, and near its base, is fixed, by riveting or otherwise, to the sides of the said cylinder. Portions of this diaphragm are formed into conical flame caps h, for controlling and confining the flame within its proper limits in a manner similar to that in common use in illuminating lamps.

Above the diaphragms, H, tubes or chimneys I confine the hot gases and products of combustion from the flames of the burners within proper limits for the efficient action of the burners. These tubes or chimneys I extend from the diaphragm H to the top of the hot-air cylinder and are preferably made of sheet metal. The shell of the hot-air cylinder C forms one side of each of these chimneys, and in this side, which is common to both the cylinder and the chimney, a small mica window, K, is placed, so as to enable the operator, from without, to see and regulate the flame of the burners by turning the thumb wheel F, as required. For simplicity of construction I cut apertures in the side of the hot-air cylinder, suitable for the windows K, and through these apertures portions of the metal of the chimney plates are extended, which said portions are bent over in the form of grooves, k, as in figures 1 and 2, for the reception of the mica plates that are to form the windows.

The top of the hot-air cylinder is covered with a cast metal plate, L, that serves as a rest for whatever vessel is to be heated on this stove. The plate L is perforated with apertures over the chimneys, and also over the hot wells of the cylinder C, as well as in the portions lying outside of the cylinder, thus permitting all of the heat generated to reach the vessel on top of the plate L, and thereby be utilized. The intense heat imparted to the plates of the chimneys I and plate L, and reflected thence back upon the hot gases passing through and about [636] these parts, will be quite sufficient to consume all of the smoke, and there will, in consequence, be no emission of unpleasant odors from imperfect combustion. The top surface of the plate L is provided with ridges l, that keep the vessels placed thereon from obstructing the openings in the said plate."

The claims are these:

"1. The water vessel A, with its perforated top plate A' and hot-air cylinder C, hinged at c to plate A', and top perforated plate L, all arranged and connected together substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

2. The chimneys I, having one of their sides formed by the hot-air cylinder C, to which they are connected by the groove clips k, that also receive the mica windows K, as and for the purpose set forth."

It is contended that the defendants infringe the first claim. The circuit court dismissed the bill (15 Fed Rep. 919), holding that there was no infringement. The plaintiff has appealed.

One of the elements in the first claim is the "perforated top plate A'," being the top plate to the water vessel A. It is described as annular in form, if the stove is cylindrical, with a central opening. The specification then says: "Concentrically arranged around this central opening is a series of perforations, a', through which atmospheric air passes down into the top part of the vessel A, and thence up through the hot-air cylinder and its chimneys." In the defendant's stove the hot-air cylinder rests on three equidistant struts, which extend from the base of the cylinder to the wall of the water chamber, and thus the weight of the cylinder and of the utensils upon it is thrown against such wall instead of on the bottom of the water chamber. Of course, there is an open space between every two of the struts, through which spaces air passes freely. The circuit court held that the arrangement of the three struts was not the plaintiff's perforated top plate A', because the struts did not perform the office which required the plate with perforations, [637] that office being, as described in the specification, to cause the air to pass "down into the top part of the vessel A, and thence up through the hot-air cylinder and its chimneys." We are of opinion that the first claim of the plaintiff's patent must be confined to the use of a perforated top plate to the cylinder, having the functions and mode of operation set forth in the specification, and that, as the defendants do not have such a perforated top plate, or any equivalent for it, they do not infringe.

Decree affirmed.

Release of mortgage on margin of record—parol evidence, inadmissible to contradict or qualify—construction of contract.

1. Parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or qualify the entry of its discharge on the margin of the record of a mortgage.

2. Upon the facts found by the court below, the evidence in question, if given full effect, would not impeach the validity of the discharge, it not being within a special agreement set up in defense.

[No. 69.]

Argued Dec. 2, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Wyoming. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. M. Wilson and S. Shellabarger, for appellant:

It is impossible to deny that both these instruments were in the minds of the parties at the date of the release, and the question met by the rejected evidence was strictly and clearly a latent ambiguity.

Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 210 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 860), and cases cited.

It is always competent to put the court, by parol evidence, into the positions of the parties at the time the contract was made. This is especially true of instruments like a release, which is only a receipt in its nature.

See Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. 1 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 361); Confederate Note Case, 19 Wall. 548 (22: 196); Bradley v. Washington, etc. S. Packet Co. 13 Pet. 89 (10: 72); U. S. v. Peck, 102 U. S. 64 (26: 46).

Mr. W. W. Corlett, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Wyoming. The suit was brought by Edward Ivinson, the appellant, in the District Court of the Second Judicial District of that Territory, to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate, made to him by Charles H. Hutton. To the bill Joseph M. Carey and R. Davis Carey are made defendants, upon an allegation that they claim some interest in the property. The defendants made a joint answer, in which they all set up a full release of the mortgage and satisfaction of the debt by Ivinson before the defendants Carey obtained their interest in the property; and whether this be true or not is the only point in the case.

It is not denied that when the defendants, the Careys, were about to let Hutton have $10,000 on this land, and take absolute deeds of conveyance for it, they required that the title to it should be made clear and relieved of Ivinson's mortgage. Thereupon Ivinson made [605] an entry on the margin of the record of the mortgage, as follows:

"I hereby acknowledge satisfaction in full of the debt for which this mortgage was given to secure, and hereby discharge and cancel the same, this sixth day of October, 1877.

"E. IVINSON.

"Attest: J. W. Meldrum, Register of Deeds."

The Supreme Court of the Territory, from which this appeal is taken, made a finding of facts by which we are to be governed in the decision of this appeal. From this finding it appears that in April, 1873, Hutton made his promissory note to Edward Ivinson for $13,582.54, with interest, and that on the same day he executed the mortgage which is the foundation of this foreclosure suit to secure the payment of the note. Subsequent to this, Ivinson asserted that a mistake had been made in computing the balance due him in the settlement on which the note and mortgage were given, and that they should have been for $17,618.66, instead of the sum actually put in the mortgage and note, making a difference of $4036.12. Ivinson brought a suit to correct this mistake, which finally came to the Supreme Court of the United States where he prevailed, obtaining a decree for the correction of the mistake in the note and mortgage. These proceedings lasted from August, 1878, to March, 1879.

Pending this controversy, however, Ivinson and Hutton made a written agreement to adjust their differences, other than this controversy, but it was expressly agreed that the controversy, then pending in this court, was left out of the settlement by the following language: "Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed in anywise to affect the rights of the parties hereto in said suit between them now depending in the Supreme Court of the United States."

This agreement was made on the 31st of May, 1877, and is marked Exhibit D in the record before us. On the 6th day of October, 1877, Ivinson, Hutton, and Joseph M. Carey were at [606] the court house in Laramie City, for the purpose of concluding a loan of $10,000, which Carey was about to make on behalf of himself and brother to Hutton, to enable him to pay his debts, including a judgment in favor of Creighton against Ivinson and Hutton, amounting to nearly $6,000. This loan was to be secured by real estate, part of which was covered by Ivinson's mortgage. Before paying over the money to Hutton, Carey required of Ivinson and Hutton that Hutton's property should be released from all incumbrances, and Ivinson entered on the margin of the record of his mortgage the discharge which we have already transcribed.

The court then further finds as follows:

"That said discharge was not made in accordance or in pursuance of the agreement of the 31st of May, A. D. 1877, above recited, marked Exhibit D, but was an absolute, unqualified release and cancellation of the mortgage. The court further finds that the value of the property mortgaged was not less than twenty thousand dollars.

"4. On the trial of the case in the district court the testimony of eight witnesses; to wit, Edward Ivinson, M. C. Brown, J. M. Carey, Charles H. Hutton, Stephen W. Downey, Walter Sinclair, H. B. Rumsey, and J. W. Blake, which had been taken before J. W. Meldrum, master in chancery, was read in evidence. To so much of said evidence as was intended to vary, explain, or contradict or qualify the entry of the discharge on the margin of the record of the mortgage by Ivinson the defendant excepted as incompetent. This court holds that said exception was well taken, and that parol evidence was not competent for that purpose or to prove that the discharge was made in accordance with Exhibit D.

"5. But the court further holds that if said parol testimony was properly admitted for said purpose, that it is not sufficient, that it does not prove any qualification or modification of the discharge as entered on the record, nor that said discharge was made in accordance with the agreement of the 31st of May, marked Exhibit D.

"6. This court makes no finding upon the [607] question whether the $4,036.12 was paid by Hutton at the time of the discharge of the mortgage or at any other time, holding the decision of that question unnecessary to the determination of this suit."

On these findings the bill of complaint of Ivinson was dismissed. The conveyances of the property in controversy, which were made by Hutton to the Careys, are absolute deeds on their face, and both the Careys and Hutton insisted in their answer that the note and mortgage were absolutely discharged and satisfied according to the terms of the indorsement made by Ivinson on the record of the mortgage This is also the finding of the Supreme Court of the Territory. The argument used in opposition to this is that the supreme court and the court below erred in rejecting the evidence mentioned in the fourth finding of fact, and it is insisted that because of the error in this respect the entire decree should be reversed. But, in point of fact, this testimony was read in evidence in the lower court, notwithstanding the objection of the plaintiff, and was considered for what it may possibly be worth also in the supreme court; for that court, in its fifth finding, says that if said testimony was properly admitted for the purpose claimed, that it is not sufficient and does not prove any qualification or modification of the discharge as entered on the record, nor that said discharge was made subject to the agreement of the 31st of May, marked Exhibit D. It will be seen that the controversy mainly hinged upon the question whether the discharge on the margin of the record of the mortgage made by Ivinson was made subject to this written agreement with Hutton; namely, that the controversy concerning the $4,036.12 involved in the suit then pending in the United States Supreme Court was excepted out of the adjustment of their differences, evidenced by Exhibit D, and that this question should be governed by the final decision of that suit.

On this issue the court distinctly finds that said discharge was not made in accordance with or in pursuance of that agreement, but was an absolute and unqualified release and cancellation of the mortgage, and that, if said parol testimony was properly admitted, it does not prove that the discharge was made in ac- [608] cordance with the agreement above referred to. It is, therefore, entirely immaterial whether the supreme court was right in holding that the exception to the parol evidence taken in the court below was error, since it further holds that, giving full effect to that evidence, it does not prove anything to impeach the force and effect of the language of the discharge and release of the mortgage and note.

We do not think, on the finding of facts made by the Supreme Court, that there is any doubt of the correctness of its final decree, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 637-643.)

Foreclosure of mortgage—sale under latter of two decrees, valid—action for possession—validity of mortgage cannot be questioned—wife joined as codefendant—power of wife to mortgage her property to secure debt of husband.

1. Under the Laws of Oregon, a wife may be joined as codefendant with her husband in an action for the possession of real property occupied by both.

2. In an action by one holding under a sale on foreclosure to recover possession of the premises, the validity of the mortgage foreclosed cannot be questioned.

3. A sale under foreclosure is not invalid because made under the latter of two decrees, differing only in the manner of describing the property, both having been entered at the same term.

4. It seems that section 5, article XV, of the Constitution of Oregon, providing that the property of a married woman shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of the husband, does not restrict the power of a wife to mortgage her property to secure a debt due from her husband.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This was an action for the possession of a tract of land containing thirteen acres and a quarter of an acre in Multnomah County, Oregon. The plaintiff is a citizen of New York and the defendants are citizens of Oregon. In the complaint they are alleged to be husband and wife, though they are not sued as such, and no averment founded upon that relationship is made; they are sued simply as parties in occupation of the premises.

[638] The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the land and lawfully entitled to its possession, describing it; that the defendants are in its possession and wrongfully withhold it from him; and that the property is of the value of $18,000.

The defendant, Colburn Barrell, answered the complaint, setting up that the plaintiff deraigns title through a conveyance from William S. Ladd and wife, citizens of Oregon, bearing date on the 28th day of September, 1882, which was executed collusively, with the sole intent of giving the federal court jurisdiction of the action, and with the understanding that at some future time the land or its proceeds should be reconveyed to them. The defendant further answered that he defended only for two acres and three eighths of an acre of the land, and as to that he denied the ownership of the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff had any right to the possession thereof, and alleged that he is the owner himself and entitled to its possession; that as to the other part of the tract described in the complaint, consisting of eleven acres, he was merely a tenant of Aurelia J. Barrell. The answer also set up that the plaintiff deraigns title through an instrument purporting to be a conveyance absolute, executed by the defendants to Ladd, bearing date on the 18th of January, 1877, and that such conveyance was intended as a mortgage to secure the payment to him of $3,850, with interest, which sum the defendant is ready and willing to pay.

The defendant, Aurelia J. Barrell, demurred to the complaint, on the ground that, as the wife of Colburn Barrell, she was improperly joined with him in the action; and that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because, she being sued as the wife of her codefendant, there were no allegations in the complaint of a cause of action for which she, as such, was responsible.

The court overruled the demurrer, and Aurelia answered, setting up, as in the answer of Colburn Barrell, the collusive character of the conveyance of Ladd and wife to the plaintiff on the 28th of September, 1882, under which he asserts title to the premises; and, further, that she defended merely for eleven acres, as to which she denied the ownership of the plaintiff, or his right of possession, and alleged that she is the owner herself and rightfully entitled to its possession. She also set up, as in Colburn Barrell's answer, the conveyance by the defendants to Ladd, through whom the plaintiff claims the eleven acres, dated January 18, 1877, and avers that such conveyance was intended as a mortgage on her separate estate as security for the payment of the sum owed by her husband to Ladd, with interest thereon. [639]

To these answers the plaintiff replied, traversing their material averments, except that it is admitted that the conveyance of the defendants to Ladd on the 18th of January, 1877, was intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of a debt by Colburn Barrell to him, and stated that in December, 1879, he instituted a suit in the Circuit Court of Oregon for Multnomah County against the defendants, for the purpose of having that conveyance declared to be a mortgage, and for a decree foreclosing the same, and for a sale of the premises; that in that suit the defendants appeared and defended, setting up all the facts contained in their separate answers in this case; that such proceedings were had therein that, on the 19th of March, 1880, a final decree was rendered, declaring the conveyance to be a mortgage, and that its condition had been broken, and decreeing that the property be sold, and that the defendants and all persons claiming under them be barred and foreclosed of all right and interest in it; that under this decree the property was sold by the sheriff of Multnomah County after due advertisement, and in the manner directed, and at such sale William S. Ladd became the purchaser; that the sale was confirmed, and, on the 25th of August, 1880, the sheriff executed a deed of the property to him; that no part of the property has been redeemed, and that no appeal has been taken from the decree, which remains unreversed, and that the plaintiff is the immediate grantee of Ladd.

On the trial of the case, the plaintiff introduced the conveyance executed by the defendants to William S. Ladd, of the property described in the complaint, dated the 18th of January, 1877, and a certified transcript of the record of the suit brought by him against them in the state court to have the conveyance adjudged to be a mortgage, and for its foreclosure, and the sale of the premises, showing the decree and order for the sale, and the confirmation of [640] the sale. The plaintiff also introduced the conveyance by the sheriff to William S. Ladd, bearing date on the 25th of August, 1880, and also a deed of the premises by Ladd and wife to the plaintiff on the 28th of September, 1882. No evidence was offered as to the alleged collusive purpose in the execution of this deed, to give the federal court jurisdiction of the action.

The transcript of the record of the suit showed what purported to be a final decree, entered on the 19th of March, 1880, and subsequently a second decree, also purporting to be a final decree, entered on the 23d of March, 1880. The two decrees differed only in the manner in which the property to be sold was described. The difference arose in this way: At the request of counsel, it was referred to a referee to examine and report upon the propriety of offering the property for sale in parcels, so as to enhance the proceeds therefrom. The referee reported a scheme dividing the property into parcels, and the court directed it to be sold accordingly, upon the condition that after it had been sold in parcels, if anyone should bid more for it as a whole, it should be sold to him. In the first decree the metes and bounds of the seven parcels are given separately. In the second, the metes and bounds of the several parcels are given separately, and of the whole as one tract. The process under which the sale was made was a copy of the last decree. When the transcript was offered in evidence, counsel objected to its admissibility, on the ground that the record showed that the final decree was made and entered on the 19th of March, 1880, and that the court had no jurisdiction to enter the second decree, under which the sale was made. The court overruled the objection, and the defendants excepted. The defendants then offered in evidence a copy of the judgment lien docket of the state circuit court, showing that the decree was docketed on the 19th of March, 1880. No other evidence having been produced, the court instructed the jury that the sheriff's deed conveyed the estate of the defendants to the grantee therein, William S. [641] Ladd, and that the conveyance from Ladd and wife to the plaintiff vested the estate in him, and, therefore, that the verdict must be for the plaintiff. To this instruction counsel excepted. The jury accordingly gave a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered; and to review that judgment the defendants have brought the case here on a writ of error.

Messrs. W. W. Upton and W. W. Chapman, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. S. Shellabarger and J. M. Wilson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

Of the numerous points made by the defendants below, the plaintiffs in error here, only three require notice. The others are either immaterial or unsupported by the record. The three are these:

1. The ruling of the court on the demurrer of Aurelia to the complaint;

2. The ruling of the court that the decree of the state court was conclusive as to the right of Aurelia to mortgage the property for the debt of her husband; and,

3. The ruling sustaining the validity of the sale under the decree of the state court, entered on the 23d of March, 1880.

1. The objection taken by the demurrer of Aurelia is that, being the wife of Colburn Barrell, she cannot be joined with him as a co- [642] defendant in an action for the possession of real property, of which both are alleged to be in the occupation. It is founded on the theory that, by the common law, her identity is so merged in his that she cannot have possession of such property independently of him. If there be any such rule of the common law, upon which we affirm nothing, it has been abolished in Oregon. By a Statute of that State, approved on the 21st of October, 1880, all laws which impose or recognize any civil disabilities of the wife, not imposed or recognized as to the husband, were repealed, except that the right to vote and hold office was not conferred upon her. And "for any unjust usurpation of her property or natural rights," she was declared to have the same right to appeal to the courts of law and equity for redress that the husband has. In that State she can hold property jointly with him, or separately from him. There would seem, therefore, to be no sound reason why, if in possession with him of property which rightfully belongs to another, she may not be jointly sued with him for its recovery. In the present case she claimed the larger part of the land in controversy as her separate property.

2. The second objection, that the decree of the state court in the suit by Ladd against the defendants does not bar the right of Aurelia to the property, is founded upon her supposed inability to mortgage her property to secure a debt of her husband under section five of article XV of the State Constitution, which declares "That the property and possessory rights of every married woman at the time of marriage, or afterwards acquired by gift, devise or inheritance, shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of the husband." But that clause merely preserves the property of the wife from its compulsory subjection to his debts or contracts. It was not designed to control her voluntary disposal of it, and in the absence of other restrictions she could mortgage it to secure the payment of a debt owing by him.

The objection, however, is entirely disposed of by the decree in the state court. The rights of the parties under the conveyance of the defendants to Ladd, of January 17, 1877, were fully considered and determined in that case. [643] The conveyance was adjudged to be a mortgage. The rights of the defendants in the property were foreclosed, and the property was ordered to be sold, and was sold, and the sale was confirmed by the court. The conveyance to Ladd as the purchaser at such sale transferred all the estate of the defendants in the property. The question as to her ability to mortgage the property cannot be raised again in this case; it has been finally adjudged against her present contention.

3. The two decrees in the suit in the state court do not conflict in the matters adjudged. The latter decree differs from the first merely in giving the boundaries of the property to be sold as one tract, and also the boundaries of each of the seven parcels into which it was divided. This addition to the original decree could be made by the court during the term in which that decree was rendered. The court could lose jurisdiction over it only by the adjournment of the term with no motion pending respecting it. When the second decree was made, it would, as stated by the learned district judge, have been a better course, "more orderly and convenient," as he expresses it, "to have referred to the first one, and stated in what particular the latter was intended to modify, supplement or supersede the former." But this was not essential; a comparison of the two decrees discloses the additions made to the first one.

Judgment affirmed.

Habeas corpus—court refuses to issue—Act of March 3, 1885—discretion.

This court will not issue a writ of habeas corpus, even if it has the power to do so, in cases where it may as well be done in the circuit courts, in the absence of special circumstances making direct action necessary or expedient.

Motion for leave to file submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

ON motion for leave to file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

The petitioner, a citizen of the United States, being, in the year 1880, charged with murder at Alexandria, in Egypt, was there tried without indictment by a grand jury before the Minister of the United States sitting alone, and was by him convicted and sentenced to be hung. The sentence was subsequently commuted to imprisonment for life by the President, the petitioner being removed to the Penitentiary of New York at Albany where he is now confined. It is now sought to question the validity of the proceedings which led to his conviction and confinement.

Messrs. Lorenzo Ullo and Frederick W. Whitridge, for petitioner.

No opposing counsel.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. As since the Act of March 3, 1885, 23 Stat. at L. 437, an appeal lies to this court from the judgments of the circuit courts in habeas corpus cases, this court will not issue such a writ, even if it has the power—about which it is unnecessary now to express an opinion—in cases where it may as well be done in the proper circuit court, if there are no special circumstances in the case making direct action or intervention by this court necessary or expedient. In this case there are no such special circumstances, and the application may as well be made to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York as here. Our right to exercise this discretion is shown by the principles on which the decisions in Ex parte Royall, Nos. 1 and 2, 117 U. S. 241 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 868], and Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 254 [29:872], rest. This practice was suggested by us and followed in Wales v. Whitney, 114 U. S. 564 [29:277].

v.

MARK PAINE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 561-566.)

Joinder of legal and equitable defenses in state court—upon removal, admissions in equitable defense bind defendant—amendment.

1. In the courts of the United States, to legal actions legal defenses only can be interposed. This rule applies to an action removed from a state court in which legal and equitable defenses may be united.

2. Upon such removal the defendant may amend by striking out his equitable defense. If he fails to amend, an admission contained in said defense binds him to the same extent it would have done in the state court.

3. In an action to recover the value of timber alleged to have been taken from plaintiff's land, an admission in the answer, of the execution of a deed to him and its delivery to its own land commissioner, by the defendant as former owner, is sufficient proof of title in the plaintiff, although there is no evidence of the delivery of the deed; such delivery being presumed after the lapse of months.

4. A mere equitable claim, which a court of equity may enforce, will not sustain an action at law for the recovery of land or anything severed therefrom.

5. An instruction requested by the defendant, relating to a license given by it, when owner of the lands, to a lumber company to cut the logs in question, was properly refused, there being no evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge of it.

[No. 90.]

Argued Dec. 13, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. P. Clough, for plaintiff in error:

At the close of his case the plaintiff had failed to show that the title to the logs was in him.

To sustain an action of trover ownership must be of the legal title. This rule has been repeatedly applied by this court in cases of ejectment, and there is no distinction between ejectment and trover in this respect.

Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 873); Hickey v. Stewart, 3 How. 750 (11:814); Agricultural Bank v. Rice, 4 How. 225 (11:949); Smith v. McCann, 24 How. 398 (16:714).

The allegations of the answer were insufficient to make out the plaintiff's title for the purpose of an action in trover.

The equitable defense set up in the answer formed no part of the pleadings after the removal of the cause to the court below.

Messrs. Eugene M. Wilson and M. F. Morris, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [562] the court:

This case was brought by Paine, the plaintiff below, against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for taking and converting to its own use 6,180 pine saw logs, alleged to be his property, and of the value of $10,442.

The defenses set up are legal and equitable, a proceeding permissible by the laws of Minnesota, in which State the action was brought. The legal defenses were two: first, a denial of the ownership of the logs by the plaintiff, and of the conversion of them by the defendant, and of their value beyond $7,882; second, that the logs were cut by the Knife Falls Lumber Company, a corporation of the State, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, and were by that company sold and delivered to the defendant prior to the commencement of this action.

The equitable defense was substantially this. that in 1880 the defendant was the owner of the lands from which the logs in controversy were cut, and that its land commissioner, under whose charge the sales of its lands were conducted, and his clerk, conspired with the plaintiff to defraud the Company by procuring a sale [563] of the lands to be made, nominally to him, but really for the benefit of the three, at a price representing only a small fraction of the actual value of the property; that, in execution of this fraudulent purpose, the land commissioner made out a contract of sale, in the form commonly used by the Company, promising for the price named to convey the lands to the plaintiff; and that the Company, upon receiving in its preferred stock at par the amount of the consideration mentioned, and being ignorant of the facts and of the character and value of the lands, and relying upon its commissioner to protect its interests, executed a conveyance of the lands in the usual form to the plaintiff, and placed it in the hands of the commissioner for delivery to him; that the lands thus sold were pine timber lands, and the Company was ignorant of their character and value until April, 1881, when it repudiated and disaffirmed the sale, and filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota for its annulment, and the reconveyance to it of the lands, offering at the same time to return to the plaintiff the cost of the preferred stock received; which bill is now pending and undetermined.

The relief prayed in the answer was: first, that the plaintiff take nothing by his action; second, that the alleged purchase of the lands in the name of Paine be adjudged void as against the defendant; third, that an account be taken of the cost of the shares of preferred stock received in payment for the lands, and that on the repayment by the Company of such cost, the plaintiff be decreed to release and reconvey the lands to the Company.

The plaintiff filed a replication, denying the allegations of fraud and fraudulent combination stated in the equitable defense, and any license or assent by him to the lumber company to cut the logs.

The case was then removed, on application of the defendant, from the state court to the Circuit Court of the United States. In that court the equitable defense could not be made available. In the courts of the United States, to legal actions legal defenses only can be interposed. If the defendant have equitable grounds for relief against the plaintiff, he must seek to enforce them by a separate suit in equity. If [564] his equitable grounds are deemed sufficient, he may thus stay the further prosecution of the action at law, or be furnished with matter which may be set up as a legal defense to it. Upon the removal, therefore, of the action to the circuit court, the equitable defense could not be considered. It would have been entirely proper for the defendant to have amended his answer by striking out that portion embracing this defense. But he did not take that course, and the plaintiff relied upon its allegations as evidence. If the pleadings are construed as in the state court, there was an admission by them of an important fact in the case; namely, of title by a deed from the former owner of the lands. In the state courts, where an answer sets up several distinct defenses, a denial in one is held to be qualified by an admission in another. Thus, in Derby v. Gallup, 5 Minn. 119, where the action was replevin for unlawfully taking the plaintiff's goods, and the answer contained two defenses: (1), a general denial of the allegations of the complaint; and (2), a justification of the taking under a levy upon execution,—it was held that the answer admitted the taking, for the purposes of the trial, and to that extent the second defense affected the first. In Scott v. King, 7 Minn. 494 the same doctrine was declared, the court holding that a general denial in one defense, inconsistent with special matter alleged in a second defense, is to be considered as modified thereby. See also Zimmerman v. Lamb, Id. 421. The admission of the execution of a deed by the former owner, and thus of title in the plaintiff, if it could be used, obviated the want of other proof on that point. In order that the plaintiff might recover, it devolved on him to prove, not merely the value of the logs taken, but that he owned them, or was entitled to their possession. It is not contended that he acquired any title to them except as annexed to the lands from which they were cut. Standing timber is a part of the realty and goes with its title or right of possession. When severed from the soil its character as realty is changed; it has become personalty, but the title to it continues as before.

The right, therefore, to recover for what is severed from the freehold depends upon the [565] right to the freehold itself. If the plaintiff is in possession, he is presumed to be lawfully so, having the right of possession, and, therefore, entitled to what is severed. If he is out of possession, he must show a title to the land, or right to its possession. A mere equitable claim, which a court of equity may enforce, will not sustain an action at law for the recovery of the land or anything severed from it. Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574; Mather v. Trinity Church, 3 Serg. & R. 509; Harlan v. Harlan, 15 Pa. 507.

In the case at bar, no proof was offered by the plaintiff of his title to the land from which the logs in controversy were cut, or of his ownership in any other way, he relying upon the admission to that effect contained in the paragraph of the answer setting up the equitable defense. This defense was not, as already stated, available in the action at law after the removal of the case to the Circuit Court of the United States, and the answer might have been there amended by striking it out; but so long as it remained a part of the pleadings, the fact admitted by it in the state court must be considered as still admitted in the federal court. No hardship can follow from this rule, for the defendant, by amending his answer after the removal of the cause, can always avoid this result: in many cases it will obviate the inconvenience of making proof of a fact within the knowledge of the parties.

The objection that there was no evidence of a delivery of the deed, which the answer alleges was executed and placed in the hands of the land commissioner of the Railroad Company for that purpose, is not well taken. It will be presumed after the lapse of months, as in the present case, that the delivery was made as directed; if not, it was for the defendant to show it; the proof, if the fact were so, being in its power. The prayer of the special defense is for a cancellation of the contract of sale, and a reconveyance of the land to the defendants.

It only remains to consider the refusal of the court to give the instruction requested with reference to the parol license from the Railroad Company, at the time the owner of the lands, [566] to the lumber company to cut the logs in question, and the alleged knowledge of the plaintiff that it was acting upon the license. The license was proved, but the court held that there was no evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge of it. The instruction requested was as follows:

"If the jury believe that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company gave a license to the Knife Falls Lumber Company to cut logs upon the lands described in the complaint, while the said Railroad Company was the owner of the said lands, and that the said lumber company cut the logs described in the complaint, acting under such license, and that the plaintiff knew of the existence of such license, and knew that the said lumber company was cutting such logs, acting under the said license, and made no objection to such cutting; in such case the jury would be at liberty to find that the said cutting was by the license and permission of the plaintiff, and if the jury does so find, it should find a verdict for the defendant."

The instruction was properly refused for the want of evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge of the license. And by the conveyance of the lands to the plaintiff the license from the original owner was necessarily terminated.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

BANK OF KANSAS CITY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 551-561.)

Negotiable paper—action on discounted drafts—want of consideration—relation of bank to acceptor—what degree of bad faith will defeat recovery—collateral security—evidence—admissibility of newspaper articles and declarations of agent.

1. A bank in discounting commercial paper does not guaranty the genuineness of documents attached to it as collateral security.

2. The indorsement by a bank of the words, "for collection," on invoices accompanying bills of lading attached as collateral security to drafts discounted, implies no guaranty of the genuineness of said bills.

3. After discounting a draft, a bank stands toward the acceptor in the position of an original lender, and cannot be affected by a want of consideration from the drawer, or by the failure of such consideration.

4. The bad faith in the taker of negotiable paper which will defeat a recovery by him must be something more than a failure to inquire into the consideration upon which it is made or accepted, because of rumors or general reputation as to the bad character of the maker or drawer.

5. In an action by a bank on drafts discounted by it, newspaper articles, touching the conduct of the drawer in a previous transaction, are inadmissible to charge its officers with bad faith in discounting said drafts.

6. The testimony of the president of the bank, explanatory of the conduct of its officers when certain other drafts came back protested, was admissible.

7. Evidence of declarations of an agent as to past transactions of his principal are inadmissible, as mere hearsay.

Argued Nov. 24, 29, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. F. W. Cotshausen, for plaintiffs in error:

"If the maker or acceptor proves that there was fraud or illegality in the inception of the instrument, the owner must then respond by showing that he acquired it bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, while current, and under circumstances which create no presumption that he knew the facts which impeach its validity."

"The holder of a negotiable instrument, who has taken it without reasonable caution, and under circumstances which ought to have excited the suspicion of a careful and prudent man, must be held to have taken it subject to all the defenses of prior parties."

Gill v. Oubitt, 8 Barn. & C. 466.

"A person, who takes a bill under circumstances calculated to excite suspicion and, having the means of knowledge, willfully abstains from making any inquiries, must be considered as a holder with notice of the fraud, if any exists."

But express notice of the defect is not necessary.

Circumstantial evidence is admissible.

It is not necessary that a party should know of the specific fraud, or know all circumstances of it. If he suspected a fraud, and chose not to ask, lest he should know, he had sufficient notice.

Messrs. Oliver H. Dean, William Warner, James Hagerman and Finches, Lynde & Miller, for defendant in error:

The rule announced in Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343 (61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 934), defining the rights of the holder of negotiable paper, has become firmly established as a part of the commercial law of this country.

This doctrine was fully considered again in Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110 (69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 857), and is restated in the following language:

"The possession of such (negotiable) paper carries the title with it to the holder. 'The possession and title are one and inseparable.'

The party who takes it before due for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of any defect of title and in good faith, holds it by a title valid against all the world.

Suspicion of defect of title, or the knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or gross negligence on the part of the taker at the time of the transfer, will not defeat his title. That result can be produced only by bad faith on his part.

The burden of proof lies on the person who assails the right claimed by the party in possession.

Such is the settled law of this court, and we feel no disposition to depart from it."

The indorsement by the Bank of the bills and some of the accompanying papers is no guaranty of their genuineness.

The declarations of the defendant Bank's president, having been made after the event, and not being shown to be any part of the res gestæ, can in no way bind the defendant as admissions.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court: [553]

In October, 1861, the plaintiffs in error, Goetz and Luening, were partners in the business of buying and selling hides on commission, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin. At that time one Du Bois was a dealer in hides at Kansas City, Missouri. On the tenth of that month Du Bois telegraphed to them from Kansas City, inquiring what they could sell four hundred green, salt hides for; and what they would advance on a bill of lading of the shipment. The firm answered by telegram, stating the market price of light hides on that day, and that they would pay a draft "for two thirds value, bill of lading attached." On the same day, the firm sent a letter to Du Bois, repeating the message, and adding that if the hides were in good condition and number one they could sell them readily: that their commission was 2½ per cent; and that they would sell all hides that he might ship to the market at Milwaukee. Upon this understanding, and during the same month, Du Bois drew upon the firm five drafts, amounting in the aggregate to $9,395, which were accepted, and, with the exception of the fifth one, were paid. The fifth one, which was for $2,000, was protested for nonpayment. To each of the drafts were attached a bill of lading and an invoice of the shipment. The bill of lading purported to have been issued by the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, stating that it had received hides, giving the number and estimated weight, to be transported on the road from Kansas City to Milwaukee, and marked and consigned as follows: "To shipper's order. Notify Goetz and Luening, Milwaukee, Wis." The invoice purported to give the net weight in pounds of the hides shipped, [554] and the market price at Milwaukee, and their estimated aggregate value, referring to the sight draft for two thirds of the amount.

The drafts were made payable to Thornton, the cashier of the Bank of Kansas City, and were cashed as drawn, the Bank paying their full face, less the usual rate of exchange on Milwaukee. The amount, as each was cashed, was passed to the credit of DuBois, and was checked out by him in the usual course of business, within a few days.

The drafts were sent by the Bank to its correspondent at Chicago, indorsed "for collection" on its account, and by him were forwarded to Milwaukee. The invoices of some of the shipments were indorsed in the same way. The bills of lading were indorsed by Du Bois, per J. MacLellon, his clerk.

The signatures to the bills of lading proved to be forgeries, on which account Goetz and Luening refused to pay the fifth draft. The Bank thereupon brought an action against them for the amount, in the Circuit Court of the United States. They defended, and set up as a counterclaim the sums they had paid on the four drafts. At the same time, they commenced an action in the state court against the Bank to recover the money paid on those four drafts. The latter action was removed, on application of the Bank, to the Circuit Court of the United States, where the two actions were consolidated and tried as one, the same questions being involved in both. The trial resulted, by direction of the court, in a verdict for the Bank, by which it recovered against the firm the amount claimed on the unpaid draft, and defeated the claim of the firm for the return of the money paid on the other four drafts.

The contention of Goetz and Luening was substantially this: that they accepted the drafts in the belief that the bills of lading were genuine; that their genuineness was asserted by the indorsement of the Bank on the invoices accompanying them; that the bills of lading were forgeries; that no shipments as stated therein had been made; and that Du Bois bore in the community such a reputation for dishonesty, having been charged at other times with forging bills of lading attached to drafts drawn by him, that the Bank was guilty of culpable negligence, amounting to bad faith, in discounting these drafts on the faith of the bills of lading presented by him, without inquiring as to their genuineness.

The testimony offered by the firm respecting the character of Du Bois was of great length, but it would serve no useful purpose to discuss it. It is sufficient to say that it consisted of a mass of loose statements, general charges of criminality, with vague references in some instances to reported particulars, sensational articles in newspapers, surmises, insinuations, rumors, beliefs and suspicions, which might make men cautious in their dealings with him, but they were altogether of too indefinite and uncertain a character to interdict all transactions with him in the ordinary course of business.

Besides, testimony was produced by the Bank highly favorable to the standing and character of Du Bois. He is shown to have been a man of great enterprise and capacity, and, just before opening business with the Bank, to have been a member of the government of Kansas City, representing his ward in the common council, and spoken of as a prominent candidate for its mayoralty. He was a member and director of the board of trade of the city, and one of its committee on arbitration, to which business disputes of its members were referred for settlement. He had been a captain in the Union Army, and bore the reputation of a brave and gallant officer. He was received in the best society of the city and was generally popular. He commenced business with the Bank in March 1881, and drafts by him, cashed by the Bank, amounted from $20,000 to $100,000 a month. Those drafts were always accompanied by bills of lading, and not until after the discovery of the forgery of the bills of lading in this case was it known that in any of these transactions he had been guilty of dishonest conduct.

Under these circumstances it is not surprising that, when the drafts on the merchants in Milwaukee were presented for discount, the Bank made no inquiry as to the genuineness of the bills of lading attached to them. A bank in discounting commercial paper does not guaranty the genuineness of a document attached to it as collateral security. Bills of lading attached to drafts drawn, as in the present case, are merely security for the payment of the drafts. The indorsement by the Bank on the invoices accompanying some of the bills, "for collection," created no responsibility on the part of the Bank; it implied no guaranty that the bills of lading were genuine; it imported nothing more than that the goods, which the bills of lading stated had been shipped, were to be held for the payment of the drafts if the drafts were not paid by the drawees, and that the Bank transferred them only for that purpose. If the drafts should be paid the drawees were to take the goods. To hold such indorsement to be a warranty would create great embarrassment in the use of bills of lading as collateral to commercial paper against which they are drawn.

The Bank, after discounting the drafts, stood towards the acceptors in the position of an original lender, and could not be affected in its claim by the want of a consideration from the drawer for the acceptance, or by the failure of such consideration. This has been held in numerous cases and was directly adjudged by this court in Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, 12 Wall. 181 [79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 366], which in essential particulars is similar to the one at bar. There the bank had discounted drafts drawn by parties at Milwaukee on Hoffman & Company, commission merchants of Philadelphia, to which were attached bills of lading purporting to represent shipments of flour. Hoffman & Company accepted and paid the drafts. The bills of lading proved to be forgeries, and Hoffman & Company sued the bank to recover the money paid. It was contended that they had accepted and paid the drafts in the belief that the accompanying bills of lading were genuine, and that, had they known the real facts, they would not have accepted and paid the drafts, and could not have been compelled to do so, in which case the loss would have fallen on the bank; that is, that they paid the drafts under a mistake of facts. But the court answered "that money paid as in this case by the acceptor of a bill of exchange to the payee of the same, or to a subsequent indorser in discharge of his legal obligation as such, is not a payment by mistake, nor without consideration, unless it be shown that the instrument was fraudulent in its inception, or that the consideration was illegal, or that the facts and circumstances which impeach the transaction as between the acceptor and the drawer were known to the payee or subsequent indorsee at the time he became the holder of the instrument;" that, supposing the plaintiffs accepted the bills of exchange upon the faith and security of the bills of lading attached, that fact would not benefit them, as the bills of exchange were in the usual form, and contained no reference whatever to the bills of lading, and it was not pretended that the defendants had any knowledge or intimation that the bills of lading were not genuine, or that they had made any representation upon the subject to induce the plaintiffs to contract any such liability; that undoubtedly the bills of lading gave some credit to the bills of exchange beyond what was created by the pecuniary standing of the parties to them, but that they were not a part of those instruments, and could not be regarded in any more favorable light than as collateral security accompanying the bills of exchange; and that proof that the bills of lading were forgeries could not operate to discharge the liability of the plaintiffs, as acceptors, to pay the amounts to the payees or their indorsees, as the payees were innocent holders, having paid value for the same in the usual course of business.

The case of Robinson v. Reynolds, decided by the Queen's Bench, and, on error, in the Exchequer Chamber (2 Q. B. 196), is also similar, in essential particulars, to the one at bar. An action of assumpsit having been brought by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptors, they pleaded that the drawer was in the habit of delivering goods in Ireland to the City of Dublin Steam Company to be carried to Liverpool, consigned and deliverable there to his order, and of taking from the company a receipt for the goods, bill of lading, or document, which, by the custom of merchants, when indorsed for value, passed the property in the goods, and entitled the indorsee to have them delivered to him; that the drawer used to obtain advances from the National Bank of Ireland on indorsing to it such document, and drawing and delivering to it a bill of exchange on the defendants or other person to whom the [558] goods were deliverable; that the bank used to forward the indorsed document to Liverpool, and to have it presented to defendants (or such other person), and on the faith thereof, the defendants (or such other person) used to accept the bill of exchange; that the drawer, pretending to act in pursuance of such usage, fraudulently indorsed and delivered to the bank a document in the usual form, to which the signature of the agent of the steam company was forged, purporting that the goods mentioned in it had been delivered to the steam company, which was false; and the drawer at the same time indorsed the bill of exchange in controversy to the bank, which advanced him the amount on the faith of the document; that the bank indorsed the document and had it presented to the defendants with the bill of exchange, and requested them to accept the bill of exchange on the faith of, and in consideration of, the delivery of the document, which was delivered as a true one; that the defendants, in consideration of the goods mentioned in the document, and in consideration and on the faith of it, and in ignorance of its being forged, accepted the bill of exchange for and at the request of the bank; and that thus the consideration for the acceptance, which defendants had been induced to make under the mistake into which they had been led by the conduct and indorsement of the bank, wholly failed. The plea did not allege that the bank knew the document to be forged or represented it to be genuine; and on that ground, after verdict for the defendants, the plaintiffs, representing the bank, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, or for judgment non obstante veredicto. After argument the Queen's Bench made the rule absolute. In giving its decision Lord Denman said: "The plea does not show that the plaintiffs made any representation which they knew to be false; nor that they warranted the bill of lading to be genuine, nor does it disclose that the defendants accepted the bill of exchange on which the action is brought upon the faith of any assertion by the plaintiffs, further than their indorsement upon it that the bill of lading, which turned out to be forged, was genuine. On the contrary, it appears by the other averments in the plea that the drawer of the bill was the correspondent of the defendants, and that it was upon his authentication of the bill [559] of lading, as referring to goods which he professed to have consigned to them, that they acted." Judgment was accordingly ordered for the defendant, non obstante veredicto.

The case having been taken to the Exchequer Chamber, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was affirmed Tindal, Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The sole ground on which the defendant relies is that the acceptance was not binding on account of the total failure or insufficiency of the consideration for which it was given, the document, on the delivery of which the acceptance was given, having been forged, and there never having been any other consideration whatsoever for the acceptance of the defendants. And this would have been a good answer to the action, if the bank had been the drawers of the bill. But the bank are indorsees, and indorsees for value; and the failure or want of consideration between them and the acceptors constitutes no defense; nor would the want of consideration between the drawer and acceptors (which must be considered as included in the general averment that there was no consideration), unless they took the bill with notice of the want of consideration, which is not averred in this plea. Admitting that the bill was accepted by the drawee at the request of the bank, and on a consideration which turns out to be utterly worthless, the case is the same as if the bill had been accepted without any value at all being given by the bank to the defendants; and on that supposition the defendants would still be liable as acceptors to the bank, who are indorsees for value, unless not only such want of consideration existed between the drawer and acceptors, but unless the indorsees had notice or knowledge thereof. For the acceptance binds the defendants conclusively, as between them and every bona fide indorsee for value; and it matters not whether the bill was accepted before or after such an indorsement."

Many other cases to the same purport might be cited. Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 240; Munroe v. Bordier, 8 C. B. 862; Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, 1 De Gex, F. & J. 4; Hunter v. Wilson, 19 L. J. Exch. 8; Leather v. Simpson, L. R. 11 Eq. Cas. 398. [560]

The bad faith in the taker of negotiable paper which will defeat a recovery by him must be something more than a failure to inquire into the consideration upon which it is made or accepted, because of rumors or general reputation as to the bad character of the maker or drawer.

The main position of the plaintiffs in error is therefore untenable. It only remains to say a few words respecting the exceptions to the rejection and admission of testimony.

1. Articles from newspapers touching the conduct of Du Bois in drawing drafts, with alleged fictitious bills of lading attached, on a house in Buffalo two years before, were excluded as having no connection with the transactions in controversy, and it not appearing that the officers of the Bank ever saw them; and we think the exclusion was correct. The story of his conduct two years before in a different transaction, however bad or even criminal it may have been, did not show, or tend to show, bad faith in the officers of the Bank in discounting the drafts in this case.

2. The testimony of one of the plaintiffs and of one of his attorneys was offered as to declarations of the president of the Bank, made several days after the last draft had been discounted, to the effect that the Bank had become largely involved in certain wool transactions with Du Bois as early as July or August, 1881, and would have broken off its relations with him if it had not been that this wool matter remained unsettled. The testimony was excluded, and rightly so. The declarations had no bearing upon the good faith of the officers of the Bank in the transactions in this case; and, if they had, being made some days after those transactions, they were not admissible as part of the res gestæ, any more than if made by a stranger. Evidence of declarations of an agent as to past transactions of his principal are inadmissible, as mere hearsay. Luby v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 17 N. Y. 133; Adams v. Hannibal & St. J. R. R. Co. 74 Mo. 553.

3. The testimony of the president of the Bank, explanatory of the conduct of its officers when certain drafts came back protested, was admissible. The witness had testified, upon examination by the plaintiffs, that the Bank never had any knowledge of a forged bill of [561] lading by Du Bois until October 31, 1881; and that it was not a fact that he had purposely remained ignorant of the facts and circumstances attending the protests of certain other drafts of Du Bois, to which bills of lading were attached, which the Bank had discounted; and that he could only explain why no particular pains were taken in the matter by stating what the usage of the Bank was in such matters. As the witness was about to state such usage, the counsel of the plaintiffs interrupted him, and called his attention to the question put, whether any special pains had been taken, but the court said: Let him state the usage as to such papers. The witness then answered as follows: "No, sir; I did not take any special pains, for the reason that it is a matter of very common occurrence. A merchant will ship a lot of grain to New York, the drafts come there, and for some reason a commission merchant won't pay them; it may be that he is not in a position to do it; it may be he thinks they are drawn for too much, and he refuses to pay; the drafts come back, or are held under directions of the Bank for settlement or other arrangement. That is a very common occurrence on shipments with bills of lading attached." There could be no just objection to the court's receiving this explanation.

We see nothing in the other exceptions which requires notice.

Judgment affirmed.

CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. WIGGINS FERRY COMPANY. [615]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 615–624.)

Constitutional law—decisions of state courts upon general law, not reviewable by this court—state courts, not charged with knowledge of laws of other States—rule applies in this court on appeal from state courts—contract—ultra vires.

1. The decision of a state court holding a contract valid or void upon principles of the general law of the land, independent of anything peculiar in the jurisprudence of another State, cannot be reviewed by this court as within article V, section 1 of the Constitution, which requires full faith and credit to be given in each State to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State.

2. A state court is not charged with knowledge of the laws of another State, such laws being only known to it as facts, to be proved as such.

3. Whatever was matter of fact in the court below is so treated by this court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

4. In an action brought by the defendant in error in a state court of Missouri, to recover damages for an alleged breach of a contract by the defendant, an Illinois corporation, in not employing the plaintiff to transport persons and property across the river at St. Louis, it is held, that it is not enough to give this court jurisdiction to say in the pleadings, or elsewhere in the course of the proceedings, that the contract was beyond the powers of the Company under its charter as construed and given effect by the law and usage of Illinois. The record must show that the acts presented for adjudication made it necessary for the court to give effect to the charter in view of some peculiar jurisprudence of Illinois rather than the general law of the land.

Argued Oct. 22, 25, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

Motion to dismiss heard with the case on its merits. Dismissed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. C. Beckwith, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error is a corporation created by and organized under laws of the State of Illinois, authorizing it to transport persons and property to and from St. Louis, Missouri. The Acts of incorporation are contained in the record and are expressly declared to be public Acts. They are alleged in the petition, admitted in the answer, and were offered and read in evidence without objection. No question arises as to their authentication, and all federal courts are required to take judicial notice of them.

The interpretation of such Acts is as much a part of the same as if it were, by express language, incorporated therein. The interpretation of the public Acts of the State of Illinois by the courts of that State is not required to be authenticated, but judicial notice thereof will be taken in the same manner and to the same extent as if the interpretation formed part of the Acts themselves.

The plaintiff in error claims that by the public Acts of the State of Illinois, as interpreted by its courts (of which interpretation this court is required to take judicial notice), it was not allowed to surrender and was prohibited from surrendering its power to transport persons and property to and from St. Louis, Missouri, or to employ others so to do, as the exigencies and convenience of the public might require; and that it was not allowed to make, and was prohibited from entering into any contract undertaking perpetually to employ any person or persons, and particularly the defendant in error, to transport persons and property to and from St. Louis, Missouri, to the exclusion of any other person or persons.

The plaintiff in error further claims that by the public laws of the State of Illinois, as interpreted by its courts, it was required to make such arrangements as the public exigencies and convenience might require, to transport persons and property across the Mississippi River, with all companies or persons authorized by the Legislature of that State to perform such services, and at any and all places where the exigencies and convenience of the public might so require.

If the claim of the plaintiff in error in respect of the laws of the State of Illinois, and the interpretation thereof, is correct, it follows that the contract sued upon was ultra vires and void. Further, the plaintiff in error insists upon its right to have full faith and credit given in the State of Missouri to these Acts of the State of Illinois, as interpreted by its courts.

See Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 598 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 429); Green v. Van Buskirk, 5 Wall. 307 (72 U. S. 18: 599); S. C. 7 Wall. 139 (74 U. S. 19: 109); Orapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 610 (83 U. S. 21: 430); Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3 (27: 346).

If from the record it appears that the right was necessary to be considered, no particular form of its assertion was required.

Oscanyan v. Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 539); Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 (24:760).

Under the Laws of Illinois, its courts can require a specific performance of the duty which the plaintiff owes to the public (Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 378; Chicago & R. I. R. R. Co. v. Coal Co. 68 Ill. 489); and under the laws of Missouri, damages, it is claimed, can be recovered for so doing. By the laws of Illinois the plaintiff in error is not allowed to discriminate unjustly in favor of the defendant in error, or against other ferry companies; but, by the laws of the State of Missouri, the plaintiff in error is obliged to make such discrimination or pay damages for not so doing.

Messrs. Henry Hitchcock, and G. A. Finkelnburg, for defendant in error:

The fact that defendant below claimed that a certain construction should be placed by the Missouri court upon public Acts of Illinois does not make the denial of such claim by that court a federal question, nor confer upon this court jurisdiction to review such decision.

This court has no jurisdiction to review the decisions of state courts construing state statutes admitted to be valid, even though erroneously construed, unless a construction is given by the state court to such statute which would make it repugnant to the Constitution or Statutes of the United States.

Commercial Bank v. Buckingham, Lawler v. Walker, Hoyt v. Sheldon, and Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Co. supra.

This court has repeatedly held that the question whether a given contract is or is not void as against public policy is not a federal question; also, that it has no jurisdiction to review the decision of a state court founded upon principles of general law alone; also, that where a decision of the highest court of a State in a case is made on its settled pre-existent rules of general jurisprudence, such decision is not reviewable in this court.

The federal question which it is claimed arises on this record is whether the Supreme Court of Missouri in its judgment gave "full faith and credit" "to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings" of Illinois.

The facts are these: The Wiggins Ferry Company was incorporated by the State of Illinois in 1853, and given the exclusive and perpetual right of maintaining and operating a ferry across the Mississippi River between its own lands in East St. Louis, on the Illinois side, and St. Louis in Missouri. It owned Bloody Island and substantially controlled two miles and a half of ferry landing on the Illinois shore. [617]

The Chicago and Alton Railroad Company is likewise an Illinois corporation, having authority to own and operate a railroad between Chicago and Bloody Island, opposite the City of St. Louis, and to "take, use, and make arrangements for the transportation of freight and passengers carried or to be carried upon said railroad, or otherwise, * * * to St. Louis, Missouri, and for this purpose to construct, own and use such boat or boats as may be necessary."

The Alton and St. Louis Railroad Company was also an Illinois railroad corporation, authorized to construct and operate a railroad from Alton, Illinois, to any point opposite St. Louis. On the 28th of April, 1864, this company entered into a contract with the Wiggins Ferry Company, by which, among other things, the Ferry Company agreed "to furnish and maintain good and convenient wharf boats and steam ferry boats to do with promptness and dispatch all the ferrying required for the transit of passengers and freight coming from or going to said railroad (or the assignee hereinafter mentioned) over the river," at reasonable rates of ferriage; and the railroad company covenanted and agreed that it would "always employ the said ferry to transport across the said river all persons and property which may be taken across the said river, either way, to or from the Illinois shore, either for the purpose of being transported on said railroad, or having been brought to the said river, Mississippi, upon said railroad. So that the said Ferry Company, its legal representatives or assigns, owners of the said ferry, shall have the profits of the transportation of all such passengers, persons and property, taken across said river either way by said railroad company; and that no other than the Wiggins Ferry shall ever, at any time, be employed by the said party of the second part, or the assignee herein mentioned, to cross any passengers or freight coming or going on said road."

[618] And it was also agreed and understood that the Alton and St. Louis Company should have the right to transfer and assign the agreement to the Chicago and Alton Company, in which event all the covenants, stipulations and agreements therein contained should be as binding on the said Chicago and Alton Company as on the Alton and St. Louis Company.

On the same day that the contract was entered into the Alton and St. Louis Company transferred to the Chicago and Alton Company all its right, title and interest in and to the lands, tenements and easements mentioned therein, and the Chicago and Alton Company became bound to the Ferry Company in all respects the same as the Alton and St. Louis Company was.

This suit was brought by the Ferry Company in a state court of Missouri against the Chicago and Alton Company to recover damages for not employing the Ferry Company for the transportation of persons and property across the river, as by the contract it was bound to do. The Railroad Company set up by way of defense, among other things, that "it had no power or authority to make or enter into any agreement whatever, perpetually obliging itself * * * not to cross persons and property, nor not to employ others to do so in the manner alleged in the petition; and that, if the provisions of said articles of agreement contain, by construction, any such provision, the same were and are in violation of the laws of the State of Illinois, and contrary to the public policy thereof, and are void and of no effect."

The answer further alleged that the Railroad Company, at the time of the transfer of the contract to it, "was a public, common carrier as a railroad company, duly incorporated by law, with power and right to construct and operate its railroad, and to transport persons, [619] passengers, freight and property to and from the City of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, across and over said river, and on or over its railroad, as the public interest required; that it was and still is the legal right and duty of defendant to furnish and supply the mode and means of transportation needed and required from time to time by the public welfare for passengers and property to and from said city over said river, and to, on, and over defendant's railroad; that the public welfare and the necessities of shippers of property and freight to and over said railroad, and to and from said city, required that certain freights and property, to be transported by defendant to and from said city, should be transported by it to and from said city across said river, and to and from and along defendant's railroad, in the cars in which it might be, and over and across said river, without breaking bulk and without being removed from such cars, and without being taken by hand or by wagons or other appliances, in packages, from or to the cars, from or to ferry boats, to be ferried across said river; and that since said assignment other and improved modes of transportation across said river, without breaking bulk, and at other points on said river opposite the City of St. Louis, were and have been provided and established, and it was and became the duty of defendant, as such common carrier, to accommodate the public by the use of such other modes of transportation; and that any provision of said contract which would prohibit defendant from using the same for the benefit and convenience of the public was and is against public policy and void, and defendant was not and is not bound thereby."

Upon the trial the statutes under which the Railroad Company was incorporated and from which it derived its corporate powers were offered in evidence. They confer upon the Company all the usual powers of railroad corporations, and, either expressly or by implication, subject it to corresponding obligations to the public. No testimony was offered, so far as the record discloses, to show that the courts of Illinois had decided, or that it had been established by law or usage in that State, that this Corporation, or any other having similar powers, could not make such a contract as had been entered into.

After the evidence was all in, the Railroad Company asked the court to rule, among other things, as follows:

"If, at the time the contract sued on was made and was assigned to defendant, the plaintiff was a common ferry, incorporated under the laws of Illinois, with power to have and use a ferry within limits opposite to a portion only of the City of St. Louis, and the Alton [620] and St. Louis Railroad Company was a common carrier, incorporated under the laws of Illinois, in evidence, with authority and franchise to have and to use a railroad in said State to a point opposite to the City of St. Louis, Missouri, and defendant was a common carrier, incorporated under the laws of Illinois, in evidence, with franchises and authority to have and use a railroad from Chicago, by way of Alton, in said State, to the Mississippi River, opposite to said City of St. Louis, and carry persons and property to and from St. Louis, and to and from and over such railroad, and to have or use boats for such purpose, then the provisions of said contract between plaintiff and the Alton and St. Louis Railroad Company, that said railroad company would always employ plaintiff or its ferry to transport across the Mississippi River all persons and property which might be taken across said river, either way, to or from the Illinois shore, either for the purpose of being transported on its railroad, or having been brought to said river on said road, so that plaintiff, its representatives or assigns, should have the profits of the transportation of all such persons, passengers and property taken across the river either way, by said Alton and St. Louis Railroad Company, and that no other than plaintiff (or its ferry) should ever, at any time, be employed by said Alton and St. Louis Railroad Company, or the assignee therein mentioned.

to cross any passengers or freight coming or going on said road, were and are illegal; and defendant had no legal right or authority to bind itself to comply with or perform the same, and plaintiff cannot recover herein for nonperformance thereof by defendant."

There were other requests of a similar character, but this contains the substance of all that was asked, so far as the questions for our consideration are concerned. These requests were refused, but the trial court did rule that the railroad company "Did not covenant or contract that all persons and property coming on its road to St. Louis, or going from St. Louis to be carried on its road, should be crossed over the Mississippi River by plaintiff, or at plaintiff's ferry, but only such as said railroad company, or its assignee, should employ or procure the ferriage for or have ferried; and that if other persons than * * * the [621] defendant caused, employed, did, or procured the ferriage or crossing over said river of persons or property coming on the road of * * * defendant to St. Louis, or going from St. Louis to be carried on said road, by other means or ferry than plaintiff or its ferry, defendant is not liable therefor, and defendant was not bound to cause or procure such persons or property to be crossed at plaintiff's ferry." The court also ruled that the contract was not "void as being in restraint of trade," nor "as being beyond the powers of the Corporations parties thereto," "nor as beyond the powers of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company to become the assignee thereof and be bound thereby," nor "as being contrary to public policy."

Under these and other instructions, not important for the purposes of the present inquiry, the cause was sent to a referee to take testimony and report the damages. The referee in his report construed the contract to mean that "where the defendant received and billed freights for carriage over its own road at places or for destinations beyond the termini of its road, so that a ferry had to be used to transfer the freights between the City of St. Louis and the Illinois shore, it was the duty of the defendant, whether acting as carrier or forwarder, to give the ferriage to the plaintiff, and good faith required the defendant to conform its acts and contracts of carriage to this obligation." He then said: "If the contract has the above scope and meaning, I am convinced that the defendant has not acted in good faith towards the plaintiff;" and the damages were found and reported on this theory of the case.

The trial court confirmed the referee's report and gave judgment accordingly. The case was then taken to the St. Louis Court of Appeals, where the judgment of the trial court was reversed, because, in its opinion, the referee did not proceed on a correct legal theory and held the Railroad Company too strictly to the letter of the contract, without looking sufficiently to the facts surrounding it when made. This judgment of the court of appeals was reversed, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the State, and that of the trial court [622] affirmed, on the ground that the contract was interpreted correctly by that court, and that, being so interpreted, it was not "ultra vires, condemned by public policy or in restraint of trade." To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought, on the ground that full faith and credit was not given to the Acts of incorporation of the Railroad Company, construed in the light of the judicial decisions and the accepted public law of Illinois.

A motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction was made at the last term and continued for hearing with the case on its merits.

This motion is first to be considered. The Railroad Company set up in its answer, as a defense to the action, that it had no authority to make the contract sued on, and in support of this defense put in evidence its Illinois Acts of incorporation. Without doubt the constitutional requirement, article IV, section 1, that "Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," implies that the public Acts of every State shall be given the same effect by the courts of another State that they have by law and usage at home. This is clearly the logical result of the principles announced as early as 1813 in Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481 [11 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 411], and steadily adhered to ever since. The claim of the Railroad Company is that by law and usage in Illinois the operative effect of its charter in that State is to make such a contract as that now sued on ultra vires.

Whenever it becomes necessary under this requirement of the Constitution for a court of one State, in order to give faith and credit to a public Act of another State, to ascertain what effect it has in that State, the law of that State must be proved as a fact. No court of a State is charged with knowledge of the laws of another State; but such laws are in that court matters of fact, which, like other facts, must be proved before they can be acted upon. This court, and the other courts of the United States, when exercising their original jurisdiction, take notice, without proof, of the laws of the several States of the United States; but in this court, when acting under its appellate jurisdiction, whatever was matter of fact in the court whose judgment or decree is under review, is [623] matter of fact here. This was expressly decided in Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 1 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 585], in respect to the faith and credit to be given by the courts of one State to the judgments of the courts of another State, and it is equally applicable to the faith and credit due in one State to the public Acts of another.

Whether the charter of this Company, in its operation on the contract now in suit, had any different effect in Illinois from what it would have, according to the principles of general law which govern like charters and like contracts, in Missouri and elsewhere throughout the country, was, under this rule, a question of fact in the Missouri court, as to which no testimony whatever was offered. The case from the beginning to the end, both in the pleadings and in the requests for rulings, seems to have been considered by the parties and by the court as involving questions of general law only, which were not at all dependent upon anything peculiar to the jurisprudence of Illinois. Thus, while in the answer it is alleged, in effect, that the contract is "in violation of the laws of the State of Illinois and contrary to the public policy thereof," no proof was offered to support the averment, and the whole case was made to rest, so far as the testimony was concerned, on the further general allegation that the contract "was and is contrary to public policy and void." So, in the requests for findings, no special reliance was had on any peculiar law or usage in Illinois, but on the general claim that the contract "was illegal, and the defendant had no legal right or authority to bind itself to comply with and perform the same." And in the trial court the ruling was that the contract was "not void as being in restraint of trade," nor "as being beyond the powers of the Corporations parties thereto," nor "as beyond the power of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company to become the assignee thereof, and be bound thereby," nor "as being contrary to public policy." In the supreme court, whose judgment we are asked to review, the ruling and decision was even more general, for it was there held that the contract as interpreted was [624] not "ultra vires, condemned by public policy or in restraint of trade." It thus appears conclusively, as we think, that both the parties and the court understood, as they certainly might from the way this case was presented, that the decision was to be made, not upon anything peculiar to the State of Illinois, but upon the general law of the land applicable to the facts established by the evidence. Such evidently was the ground of the decision, and that being so it is well settled we have no power to bring it under review. The decision would have been the same upon the case as made, whether the Constitution had contained the provision relied on or not. Bethel v. Demaret, 10 Wall. 537 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1007]; West Tennessee Bank v. Citizens' Bank, 13 Wall. 432 [*80 U. S. 20:514]; Delmas v. Ins. Co. 14 Wall. 661 [81 U. S. 20:757], in which it was expressly held that this court cannot review the decision of a state court holding a contract valid or void when "made upon the general principles by which courts determine whether a consideration is good or bad on principles of public policy." Tarver v. Keach, 15 Wall. 67 [82 U. S. 21:82]; Rockhold v. Rockhold, 92 U. S. 129 [23:507]; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Hendren, 92 U. S. 286 [23:709]; U. S. v. Thompson, 93 U. S. 587 [23:983]; Bank v. McVeigh, 98 U. S. 333 [25:111]; Dugger v. Bocock, 104 U. S. 601 [26:848]; Allen v. McVeigh, 107 U. S. 433 [27:572]; San Francisco v. Scott, 111 U. S. 768 [28:593]; Grame v. Ins. Co. 112 U. S. 278 [28:716]. It is not enough to give us jurisdiction to say in the pleadings, or elsewhere in the course of the proceedings, that the contract, whatever it might be in Missouri, was beyond the powers of the Company under its Acts of incorporation as they were construed and given effect by law and usage in Illinois. It must somehow be made to appear on the face of the record that the facts as they were actually presented for adjudication made it necessary for the court to consider and give effect to the Act of incorporation in view of some peculiar jurisprudence of Illinois rather than the general law of the land. That, as we have seen, was not done in this case. Consequently we have no jurisdiction, and the motion to dismiss is granted.

Dismissed.

*Same decision again reported in 14 Wall. 9, as cited in brief for defendant in error.

TOWN OF ENFIELD, Plff. in Err., [680]
v.
C. N. JORDAN

*Municipal bonds—Illinois Statutes—construction of—"town" and "village," used synonymously—*lis pendens as affecting subsequent bona fide holders of negotiable paper—to what extent this court follows the highest court of a State in the construction of its Constitution and statutes—estoppel—practice.

1. Under section 10 of the Act of the General Assembly of Illinois of February 24, 1869, amending the charter of a certain railroad company, the Town of Enfield, Illinois, had authority to issue and donate its bonds to the railroad company, said "town" being held to be a "village" within the meaning of the Act.

2. While this court follows the construction uniformly given by the highest court of a State to its Constitution and statutes, where their construction by such court has not been uniform, it decides for itself.

3. This court follows the Supreme Court of Illinois in holding that the proviso of the section of the Constitution of Illinois of 1870, which prohibits municipal corporations from making subscriptions to the capital stock of private corporations, or donations to them, saves the power to make such donations.

4. Under the jurisprudence of Illinois the purchaser of municipal bonds, illegally made payable at some other place than the office of the treasurer of the municipality, is only chargeable with notice that such bonds are not payable at the place named, and is not put upon such inquiry as to charge him with notice of prior proceedings against a former holder.

5. The pendency of a suit relating to the validity of negotiable paper, not yet due, is not constructive notice to subsequent holders thereof before maturity. This rule cannot be so changed by state laws or decisions as to affect the rights of persons not residing and not being within the State.

6. Upon a division in opinion between the judges of the court below, it is bad practice to base a question for the consideration of this court upon a reported case not found in the record.

Submitted Nov. 24, 1886. Decided Jan 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles H. Patton, for plaintiff in error:

It is settled law in Illinois that to authorize a municipal corporation to issue bonds there must be express statutory power granted.

Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471; Pitzman v. Freeburg, 92 Ill. 114; Gaddis v. Richland Co. 92 Ill. 123; Bissell v. Kankakee, 64 Ill. 249.

The authority to issue bonds by a municipal corporation is an extraordinary power and, if it is claimed, it must be shown by those who assert it to be clearly and expressly given by the statute; because as to laws extending the burdens of taxation, or statutes in derogation of common rights of property, the rule of strict construction prevails.

Chestnutwood v. Hood, 68 Ill. 139; People v. Hulburt, 46 N. Y. 118; People v. Smith, 45 N. Y. 772; Sharp v. Speir, 4 Hill, 79; Beatty v. Knowler, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 152 (7:813); Vanhorn v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 316 (1:396); Doe v. Shunn, 1 Blackf. 336; Farrington v. Morgan, 20 Wend. 207.

It was contended in Welch v. Post, supra, that the question had been settled by the Supreme Court of Illinois in Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524, that "town" and "village" are the same; but the court decided that no such point was involved; hence, there has never been but one decision in Illinois on that point and that was that "town" and "village" are not the same.

The federal courts will follow the highest court in a State in the construction given by such state court to its own Constitution and statutes.

And this is the case even where, as in this case, the state court has rendered its decision construing the state statute after the United States Circuit Court has made a prior decision construing it the other way.

Moores v. Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625 (26:870).

And the Supreme Court of the United States will also recede from a former decision to follow the subsequent decision of the state court construing its own statutes.

Leffingwell v. Warren, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 599 (17:261); Fairfield v. Gallatin Co. supra.

If, then, the power to issue bonds was not given under said section 10 of the Act of 1869, the vote taken could only have authorized a donation to be paid by taxation as provided by section 11 of the said original charter of said railroad company, passed in 1867. But the power to vote a donation under either of the said Acts of 1867 or 1869 did not carry the power to pay the donation in bonds.

Bissell v. Kankakee, 64 Ill. 249; Shaeffer v. Bonham, 95 Ill. 368; Lippincott v. Pana, 92 Ill. 24.

And if these bonds were void for want of power to issue them, then subsequent payment of interest is no ratification of them.

Flack v. Hughes, 67 Ill. 384; Lippincott v. Pana and Shaeffer v. Bonham, supra.

An absolutely unanswerable reason why these bonds are void was stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Concord v. Savings Bank, 92 U. S. 625 (23:628), where the court says, referring to the proviso in the "separate section" of the Constitution of Illinois above quoted, "This article, in our opinion, makes a clear distinction between subscriptions to the capital stock of a railroad company * * *, and donations or loans of credit to such corporations. The latter are prohibited under all circumstances."

Plaintiff in error insists that it is not estopped by the former judgment between these parties on coupons detached from the same bonds, because to make said judgment binding as res judicata there must be complete identity of parties and subject matter of litigation.

Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 (24:195).

And if in the second suit there be, as in this case, a new and wholly different cause of action (a different lot of coupons are sued upon), and a defense based upon a materially new and different state of facts, then the former judgment is no estoppel.

Cromwell v. County of Sac, supra; Gould v. Evansville & C. R. R. Co. 91 U. S. 526 (23:416).

Where the face of commercial paper itself carries a defect, the purchaser must make inquiry and is chargeable with notice of whatever that inquiry would have or might have led to.

Wade, Notice, § 90, citing Ayer v. Hutchins, 4 Mass. 370; Hall v. Hale, 8 Conn. 336; Goodman v. Simonds, 61 U. S. 20 How. 343 (15:934).

Messrs. James A. Connolly and T. C. Mather, for defendant in error:

The Supreme Court of Illinois in deciding the case of Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 528, clearly shows that the charters of "incorporated towns" and of "villages" are, in all their material and distinguishing characteristics, the same. This is proof that the Legislature could have had no motive or reason for using the words otherwise than merely as interchangeable.

All that can be said of the case of Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, in this connection is that it is not competent for the courts or Legislature, by a change in their rulings or constructions, to deprive parties of their rights, acquired whilst the legislative or legal constructions were favorable to the validity of such rights.

Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 206 (17:525); Butz v. Muscatine, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 583 (19:493); Olcott v. Supervisors, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 690 (21:386); Chambers Co. v. Clews, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 324 (22:520); Elmwood v. Marcy, 92 U. S. 289 (23:710); Mitchell v. Burlington, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 270 (18:350); Havemeyer v. Iowa Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 294 (18:38); Lee Co. v. Rogers, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 181 (19:160).

While there was no decision of the Illinois Supreme Court upon the point in controversy at the time the bonds were issued, there was an unbroken line of legislative construction arising from special Acts of incorporation in which the words "village" and "incorporated towns" had been interchangeably used.

This is not a case where the United States Supreme Court is called upon to follow the latest decision of the state supreme court and ignore the earlier one and the legislative construction referred to.

The Welch judgment cannot affect the rights of defendant in error, especially as it cannot be shown which one of the seven bonds was involved in that litigation, nor that defendant in error knew anything about it.

Carroll Co. v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556 (28:517); Warren Co. v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 96 (24:977).

There seems to be no restriction as to the place of payment in the law under which these bonds were issued, and therefore the authority of this court is that they can be made payable elsewhere.

Lynde v. The County, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 6 (21:272); Thomson v. Lee Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 327 (18:177); Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 178 (17:520).

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court: [681]

This is a suit brought by C. N. Jordan against the Town of Enfield to recover the amount of twenty-two interest coupons for $50 each, made by the Town on the first of January, 1871, and payable in January and July, 1881, 1882 and 1883. The defendant pleaded nonassumpsit, and on the trial a jury was waived, and the cause was tried by the court, consisting of the circuit and district judges. A finding of the facts was made, and the judges being divided in opinion as to certain questions of law arising thereon, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, in accordance with the opinion of the presiding judge. The principal question of law was whether an "incorporated town," as Enfield was, had power to make a donation of its bonds to the railroad company. Questions of estoppel were also raised, as hereafter noticed.

The facts found by the court, in accordance with an agreed statement presented by the parties, are substantially as follows:

1. That the Town of Enfield was incorporated under an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved March 15, 1869. This Act is set out in full, and is entitled "An Act to Extend the Corporate Powers of the Town of Enfield." It is an ordinary town charter, making the town a corporation by the name and style of "The Town of Enfield." Its territorial limits were then prescribed, being one mile square, and the usual corporate powers were conferred. A town council, consisting of five trustees, together with a police magistrate, a treasurer, and a town constable, were directed to be elected annually, on the first Monday of May. The powers given to the town council were similar to those usually conferred upon municipal bodies; as, the power to levy and collect taxes; to appoint a clerk, supervisor of streets, and other officers; to appropriate moneys to pay the debts and expenses of the Town; to make regulations for securing the general health; to provide a supply of water; to make sidewalks, and to open, grade, pave and repair streets; to establish markets, to regulate the public grounds; to organize a fire department; to regulate the police, etc.

[682] The findings next set forth at large an Act of Assembly of Illinois, incorporating the Illinois Southeastern Railway Company, approved February 25, 1867. This Act authorized the company to construct a railroad from a point on the Illinois Central Railroad, by way of Fairfield in Wayne County, to the Ohio River. The route designated would naturally pass in the neighborhood of Enfield, and the railroad, when built, did pass through the Town. The seventh section authorized counties through which the road might pass to donate to the company any sum not exceeding $100,000, and to give its bonds therefor. The ninth section authorized any town in any county under township organization to donate not to exceed $30,000; but such donation was payable only by taxation, no authority being given to issue bonds. This section related, not to incorporated towns, but to townships forming the territorial subdivisions of counties. The eleventh section authorized "any incorporated city or town" through or by which the railroad might run to make donations not exceeding $10,000, on the same terms, propositions, conditions, and under the same restrictions, as provided for townships.

The findings next set forth an amendment to the railroad charter, approved February 24, 1869, by the tenth section of which authority was given to "Any village, city, county or township organized under the township organization law, or any other law of the State, along or near the route of the railway, * * * or anywise interested therein," to subscribe to the stock of the railroad company, or make donations to it to aid in the construction and equipment of its road, provided such subscription or donation was sanctioned by an election of the people. This section gave power to issue bonds for such subscriptions or donations; but towns are not included therein by name.

The court further found that, on the first of January, 1871, the Town of Enfield issued and delivered to the officers of the Springfield and Illinois Southeastern Railway Company, a company formed by consolidation with the Illinois Southeastern Railway Company, the bonds and coupons now in controversy, copies of which are attached. That said bonds and coupons were issued by said Town by virtue of the power (if any) contained in the Acts aforesaid, [683] approved February 25, 1867, and February 24, 1869; and that afterwards said bonds and coupons came to the plaintiff through mesne transfers from said Springfield and Illinois Railway Company; and that the bonds were registered in the state auditor's office.

The findings further set forth copies of the order of the town council of Enfield, made June 10, 1870, appointing judges of election to be held in the Town on the 11th of the same month, and a copy of the returns of the vote at said election for the purpose of determining whether the Town would donate the sum of $7,000 to the Springfield & Illinois Southeastern Railway Company, the result of which was —for donation sixty-four votes, against it, one vote; and that this was the only election held in relation to said donation.

The court further found that at the June Term, 1880, of that court, judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant was rendered upon coupons then due, detached from the same bonds from which the coupons now sued on were taken. It was also admitted by the plaintiff that the Enfield town bond represented by Post in the case of Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. p. 471, was one of the series of seven bonds in controversy in this suit, but which bond it was the plaintiff disclaimed any knowledge.

Upon these facts the judges who tried the cause have certified a difference of opinion upon the following questions, to wit:

1. Whether the incorporated Town of Enfield had power to vote and issue the bonds and coupons in controversy under any of the provisions of the Acts above specified.

2. More particularly, whether said Town had said power under the tenth section of the amendment of the railway company's charter, approved February 24, 1869.

3. Whether said Town was not estopped from further defense by the litigation theretofore had between it and plaintiff.

4. In case there was power in the Town under said laws to vote and issue said bonds and coupons, whether one of said bonds and the coupons thereto belonging were void in the [684] hands of plaintiff in this suit by reason of one Post having litigated it in the state courts of Illinois.

1. As to the first question, it is clear that the Town derived no authority to issue the bonds from anything contained in its own charter. But, by the eleventh section of the Act incorporating the railway company, power is given to any incorporated city or town through or by which the railroad might run to make donations to the company, and to pay the same by taxes assessed by the county clerk at the request of the company. No authority, however, was given to issue bonds in payment of such donations. The tenth section of the amending Act, approved February 24, 1869, contains the only authority which can be invoked for that purpose. But that section does not mention towns by name. It declares "That any village, city, county, or township * * * along or near the route of said railway or its branches, or that are in anywise interested therein, may in their corporate capacity subscribe to the stock of said company, or make donations to said company, to aid in constructing and equipping said railway;" with a proviso for holding an election on the subject, and authorizing the issue of bonds in payment, "said bonds to be signed, in case of a village, by the chairman of the board of trustees thereof; in case of a city, by the mayor thereof," etc. The Town of Enfield is not a township, nor a county, nor a city. If it is within the purview of the Act it must be because it is a village. The question then arises, Is the incorporated Town of Enfield a village within the meaning of the Act?

This question depends upon the use of the words "town" and "village" in the laws of Illinois. The general and popular distinction between them in English speech will not carry us far towards a solution. The dictionaries tell us that the word town signifies any walled collection of houses. (Johnson.) But that is its antique meaning. By modern use, it is said to be applied to an undefined collection of houses, or habitations; also to the inhabitants; emphatically to the metropolis. (Richardson.) Again, a town is any collection of houses larger than a village; or any number of houses to which belongs a regular market, and which is not a city. [685] (Johnson, Webster, Ogilvie.) The same authorities define a village as a small collection of houses in the country, less than a town. According to this distinction, the law, in giving power to "any village, city, county or township" to make donations and issue bonds to the railroad company, confers the power upon bodies of higher and lower degrees of municipal organization than towns, and leaves them out. This is an incongruity which we can hardly suppose was intended. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in a recent decision against the power, to which we shall presently refer, is obliged to say, "Why incorporated towns were omitted in that Act cannot now be known."

In seeking aid from collateral sources, we shall probably derive more light from the political use of the terms "town" and "village" in this country, than from general lexicography. In New England and New York towns are the political units of territory into which the county is subdivided, and answer, politically, to parishes and hundreds in England, but are vested with greater powers of local government. In Delaware the counties are divided into hundreds, the words town and village being indiscriminately applied to collections of houses. In Maryland and most of the Southern States, the political unit of territory is the county, though this is sometimes divided into parishes and election districts for limited purposes. The word "town" is used in a broad sense to include all collections of houses from a city down to a village. Thus, in Virginia, by an Act passed in 1778, on the death or removal of "any one of the trustees and directors of the several towns within this State, not incorporated," provision is made for filling the vacancy; by Act of 1793, "electors of towns entitled to representation in the House of Delegates" are authorized to vote at their respective court houses for representatives in Congress; by Revised Code of 1819, "trustees of the respective unincorporated towns of this Commonwealth" are empowered to make by-laws to prohibit horseracing in the streets of the town; by the Revised Code of 1849, in the chapter entitled "Of Towns," the council and [686] board of trustees of any town, heretofore or hereafter established, may cause to be made a survey and plan of the town, showing each lot, public street, etc., to lay out, alter, improve and light the streets, and to adopt various municipal regulations relating to public grounds, markets, health, nuisances, supply of water, fire departments, etc. Most of these towns were nothing but villages. The close connection between Virginia and Kentucky and the early settlement of Illinois renders this use of the word "town" in the mother State apposite to the question under consideration.

In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Illinois, the subdivisions of a county, answering to the towns of New England and New York, are called townships, though the word "town" is also applied to them in Illinois. In these States the words "town" and "village" are indiscriminately applied to large collections of houses less than a city.

These results are gathered from an examination of the laws and constitutions of the States named; and we should have no hesitation in saying that in Illinois an incorporated town and an incorporated village were one and the same thing, were it not for the decision of the Supreme Court of that State to the contrary in the case of Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, already alluded to, which decision was made in relation to the identical bonds in question in this suit.

That case arose upon a bill filed in the Circuit Court of White County by citizens, property owners, and taxpayers of the Town of Enfield against the village and county collectors of taxes and the unknown holders of the bonds, to restrain the collection of taxes for their payment, on the ground that there was no authority of law to issue them. The bill prayed that the bonds might be declared null and void in whosesoever hands they might be. A decree was taken for confessed in April Term, 1877; but at the October Term, 1879, one Post, of New York, presented a petition, stating that he was the owner of one of the bonds, and praying that the cause might be reinstated, which was done. The cause was then tried upon an agreed statement of the facts (much the same as in the present case), and the circuit court decided against the plaintiffs, and dismissed the bill. This decree was reversed by [687] the supreme court in June, 1881. The ground of this judgment, as stated in the opinion of the court, was that the Town of Enfield had no authority to issue the bonds; that no such authority was given in the charter of the Town, because none was expressed, and the making of donations to railway corporations, and issuing interest-bearing bonds in payment thereof, is not among the usual or implied powers possessed by municipal corporations; that it was not given by the Act of 1867, incorporating the railway company, because the donations authorized by that Act to be made by incorporated cities or towns, were directed to be paid by taxation, and no authority was given to issue bonds; that it was not given by the amending Act of February 24, 1869, because that Act only gives the power to villages, cities, counties and townships, and does not mention incorporated towns, and the Act cannot be extended by implication. The court says: "Keeping in mind, as must be done, there is no implied authority in municipal corporations to make donations to railway companies, and to issue interest-bearing bonds in payment, it must appear there is express enabling legislation to that effect before municipal corporations can properly assume to exercise such extraordinary powers. No such authority is to be found anywhere in any public or private law of this State, applicable to the Town of Enfield, at the time that Corporation undertook to and did issue the bonds held and owned by the respondent; and having been issued without authority of law, such bond constitutes no valid obligation that can be enforced against the Municipality."

Two justices, Dickey and Sheldon, dissented from this opinion, and adhered to an earlier ruling of the court made in 1877, in the case of Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524, in which it was adjudged that the terms "towns and villages" are used synonymously in the laws of Illinois. The proceeding in that case was instituted by the collector of Cook County, for the collection of certain special assessments levied by the Town of Lake upon the real estate within its bounds, the mode of collection pursued being that pointed out in article IX of the Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Incorpora- [688] tion of Cities and Villages," approved April 10, 1872, conferring upon all cities, towns and villages which might adopt it (as all were authorized to do) municipal powers of a very comprehensive character. It was contended on the part of the defendants that, as to towns, the Act was unconstitutional and void because "towns" are not mentioned in the title, but only "cities" and "villages." The Supreme Court of Illinois, however, did not concur in this view, but held that an incorporated town and incorporated village, in the laws of that State, are one and the same thing. The court says: "The word 'town,' as found in our statutes, is not always used in the same sense. In the Act relating to township organization, it is provided that counties adopting that system for the management of county affairs shall be divided 'into towns' (sec. 5, p. 1067, R. S. 1874), consisting, generally, of a township according to the government surveys. These towns are a species of municipal incorporations, and constitute an integral part of the county, and are closely interwoven with the management of county affairs. In the statute found in Revised Statutes of 1845, page 111, the word 'town' is used in a very different sense. It there plainly means a village, or a small collection of residences; and by that Act it is provided that the inhabitants of any such town may under certain circumstances 'become incorporated for the better regulation of their internal police,' under the management of a board of trustees, with capacity to sue and be sued, to keep a record of their proceedings, and with power to make by-laws and ordinances, to prevent nuisances, to prohibit gambling and other disorderly conduct, to prevent fast driving and indecent exhibitions, to license public shows, to regulate markets, sink wells, to keep open and repair streets, to protect the town from fires, to levy and collect taxes, to enforce their ordinances, etc. Such an organization, in our statutes, was formerly always called an 'incorporated town,' but in later statutes they are sometimes called villages, and their trustees are called village trustees. An examination of the special charter of the Town of Lake (Vol. 4, Special Laws 1869, p. 824), shows it to be a municipal corporation of the latter character, and, in so far as its organization under that charter is concerned, it is merely an incorporated town, or, in other words 'an incorporated village.' Before that [689] charter was enacted, the Town of Lake was merely a municipal corporation under the laws relating to township organization. By this charter, the inhabitants of that town took another form of corporate existence, and became also, in contemplation of law, what, in the Revised Statutes of 1874, is known as a village." The court then, after enumerating the powers conferred by the town charter, adds: "All the powers are of the kind usually conferred upon cities or villages, and of the character conferred upon cities or villages by the general law of 1872, of which this article IX is a part. Before the adoption of our present Constitution, many special charters, conferring like powers, were granted by the General Assembly, and in most cases such corporations are called towns, but in some cases they are called villages; but the character and nature of these corporations, whether called in their charters towns or villages, were in all cases substantially the same." After referring to a number of these charters, the titles of which ran, "An act to incorporate the village of A., or B.," but in the body of which the several communities were called villages and towns indiscriminately, the court concludes as follows: "We therefore hold that the Town of Lake was, and is, a village in the sense in which that word is used in section 168 of the general Act of 1872 relating to cities and villages; that it, therefore, is one of the municipal incorporations which, by that section, are authorized to avail themselves of the provisions of article IX of that Act as an amendment to their charters."

We have quoted more fully from the judgment in this case, because it is not only directly in point, but it shows historically the use of the terms "town" and "village" in the legislation of Illinois. Its bearing on the present case is enhanced by the fact that the Towns of Lake and Enfield were incorporated at the same session of the Legislature, and invested with like powers and form of organization.

Both of the cases to which we have referred arose after the bonds and coupons now in controversy were issued, and neither of them can [690] control our decision upon the rights of the parties here, any further than as they address themselves to our judgment upon the true construction of the law; and we feel compelled to say that we regard the views expressed in the case of Martin v. People [supra], as the most sound and convincing of the two. It seems to us that the Legislature of Illinois, in the Act for the incorporation of cities and villages, intended to avoid hereafter the use of the ambiguous word "town," as applied to the smaller class of incorporated municipalities, and to designate them by the single term of "village." This conclusion is, on the whole, so obvious that we do not hesitate to adopt it, and to hold that the Town of Enfield is a village within the meaning of the amending Act of February 24, 1869. We may add, as a strong corroboration of what has been said, that in the ninth section of that Act, the word "town" is used indiscriminately with the word "village." The language is: "It shall be lawful for the incorporate authorities of any incorporate city or village through which said railway shall be located to donate or lease to said railway company, as a right of way, the right to lay a single or double track through said city or incorporated village, or any portion of the same, or any street or highway, that the said railway company shall elect for that purpose, except at the option of the said railway company and corporate authorities of such towns or cities."

An additional point, however, is made in relation to the authority of the Town to issue the bonds under consideration. Supposing that such authority is found in the Acts referred to, it is still contended that it was abrogated by the Constitution of the State adopted on the second day of July, 1870. By a section of that Constitution it is declared that "No county, city, town, township or other municipality, shall ever become subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or make donation to or loan its credit in aid of such corporation; Provided, however, That the adoption of this article shall not be construed as affecting the right of such municipality to make such subscriptions where the same have been authorized, under existing laws, by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption." It is urged that whilst the proviso of this section saves the power to make sub-[691] scriptions to the capital stock of private corporations, it does not save the power to make donations to them. We did so decide in the case of Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625 [23:628], but in the subsequent case of Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U. S. 47 [25:544], that decision was overruled in deference to several decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois, to the effect that donations as well as subscriptions were within the meaning of the proviso. The authorities are collected in the latter case, and need not be repeated here. We held, as we had often held before, that this court will follow the construction which has been uniformly given by the highest court of a State to its Constitution and laws.

To the first and second questions, therefore, our answer is that the Town of Enfield had power under the tenth section of the amending Act approved February 24, 1869, to vote and issue the bonds and coupons in controversy.

The third question is whether the Town was not estopped from further defense by the previous litigation in this (the circuit) court upon the pleadings and facts stipulated and judgment rendered therein. The stipulation and finding on which this question is raised is as follows, to wit: "That at the June Term, A. D. 1880, of this court judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant herein was rendered upon coupons then due, detached from the same bonds from which the coupons in evidence in this suit were taken." The coupons on which said former judgment was rendered were different coupons from those involved in the present suit. This suit, therefore, was brought upon a different cause of action from that upon which the former suit was brought. Whether the same issues were raised and passed upon in that suit which are raised in this, the stipulation does not inform us. The question [692] is too general in its terms to admit of a precise answer. If the defendant sought to set up in this suit some new defense, which was not made in the former one, and not necessarily decided therein, it should have been allowed to do so, under the ruling of this court in Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 354 [24:198]. But we are left in entire ignorance on the subject. As no proper answer can be given to a question stated in such broad and indefinite terms, which admits of one answer under one set of circumstances and of a different answer under another, we must necessarily pass it by as immaterial to the decision of the case in this court.

The fourth and last question propounded by the judges below is whether one of the bonds and the coupons thereto belonging are void in the hands of the plaintiff in this suit by reason of one Post having litigated it in the state courts of Illinois. The finding on which this question is based is as follows; to wit, 'It is admitted by the plaintiff in this suit that the Enfield town bond represented by Post in the case of Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. p. 471, was one of the series of seven bonds now in controversy in this suit; but in making said admission plaintiff disclaims any knowledge of which one it was, or any connection with said suit." It is rather a singular proceeding to refer this court to a volume of reports to eke out the record on which it is to pass judgment. The reported case is not even printed in the record before us, and we do not feel called upon to give it a very critical examination in reference to the point now raised, and might well refuse to consider it at all. It consists merely of the opinion of the court already referred to and commented on. The nature and object of the suit and the principal proceedings had therein have already been stated. For the purpose in hand, it is sufficient to remark that the bond held by Post was not matured, and will not mature till the year 1891, and, therefore, a decree against Post has no binding effect on a subsequent holder of the bond purchasing the same before maturity and without notice. To have made the decree effectual against the bond itself, Post should have been required to produce it in court in order that it might have been canceled. If he parted with the bond pending suit, it would make no difference. The subject of notice by lis pendens in relation to negotiable securities was considered by this court in the cases of Warren Co. v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 96 [24:977], and Carroll Co. v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556 [28:517], and needs no further discussion. The general rule announced in those cases is that the pendency of a suit relating to the validity of negotiable paper not yet due is not constructive notice to subsequent holders thereof before maturity. This general rule cannot be changed by state laws or decisions so as to affect the rights of persons not residing and not being within the State, any more than publication of suit can be made constructive service of process upon such persons. Rights to real property and personal chattels within the jurisdiction of the court, and subject to its power, may be affected by lis pendens, but not those acquired by the transfer of negotiable securities or by the sale of articles in market overt in the usual course of trade. See Brooklyn v. Ins. Co. 99 U. S. 362 [25:416]; Empire v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 87 [25:878]; Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 545 [27:430].

But it is contended by the plaintiff in error that the bonds on their face show an illegality as to the place of payment sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry, and, therefore, to subject him to notice of the proceedings by which the bond held by Post was declared void. This argument is based upon the fact that the bonds are payable, not at the office of the treasurer of the Town of Enfield, but "at the First National Bank of Shawneetown, Illinois," the principal town in the adjoining county, about thirty miles distant, and the terminus of the railroad passing through Enfield. As the statute which gave the authority to issue the bonds is silent as to the place of their payment, we are at a loss to see how the place named therein can have the effect supposed. Counsel admit in argument that it does not render the bonds void, but insist that the Town had no power to make them payable at any other place than the office of the town treasurer. For this they cite People, ex rel. Peoria and Oquawka R. R. Co. v. County of Tazewell, etc. 22 Ill. 147; Pekin v. Reynolds, 31 Ill. 529; and Sherlock v. Village of Winnetka, 68 Ill. 530. In these cases, it is true, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that a municipal corporation cannot lawfully make its obligations payable at any other place than the office of its treasurer; but the court also held that the making of them payable elsewhere does not affect their validity. The case last cited was a bill by taxpayers to enjoin the collection of taxes levied to pay interest on certain bonds of the village, the validity of which was questioned. They had been issued to pay for erecting a building for educational purposes, which the court held the village had no power to erect. The question of the place of payment of the bonds only came up incidentally, as one of the arguments of counsel used against their payment. On this point the court says: "The objection that the bonds are illegally made payable at a bank in Chicago does not invalidate them, as was held in Johnson v. Stark Co. 24 Ill. 75. The agreement to pay at that place is void, but the balance of the coupons and bonds are not rendered invalid for that reason. In paying the interest, the treasurer should not obey that agreement in the bond, but pay it at the village treasury. If he were to deposit the money in the bank for the purpose, and it were to break, or the money should otherwise be lost, he and his sureties would no doubt be liable for the loss growing out of his illegal act in placing the money in a place unauthorized by law." The court did not regard this as a ground for enjoining the collection of taxes; but enjoined their collection upon other grounds.

Now, giving to these cases all the effect due to them, we do not see how the fact that the bonds and coupons of the town of Enfield were made payable at Shawneetown can prejudice a bona fide holder thereof, or charge him with notice of prior proceedings against other parties who once held them. The most that can be said is that a person purchasing the bonds may be bound to know that the place named for payment therein is not binding on the county and that, though made payable elsewhere, their legal place of payment is at the office of the treasurer of Enfield. The question whether a municipal corporation, authorized to issue bonds, may or may not make them payable at a place other than its own treasury (there being no statutory direction on the subject), is one of general jurisprudence, in reference to which the courts of Illinois take a particular view. Other courts take a different view. There is nothing in the constitution of the municipal bodies of that State, so far as this particular power is concerned, different from that of similar bodies in other States. When the bonds of an Illinois municipality are offered for sale in the market, and on their face are made payable at a different place from the treasury of such municipality, even though it be conceded that a purchaser is bound to know that, by the jurisprudence of Illinois, the bond is legally payable at such treasury, that is all he is bound to know. The same jurisprudence informs him that the naming of a different place for payment does not affect their validity nor the obligation of the municipality to pay them. At all events, we are of opinion that the place of payment named in the bond, which was formerly in the hands of Post, did not affect the present holder with notice of the proceedings in which Post was a party. Those proceedings are an estoppel against Post, even though, in our judgment, the decision was based on an erroneous view of the law; and they would be an estoppel against Jordan if he had notice of them when he took the bond. But there is no evidence that he had any such notice, and we think that the fact of the bond being payable at a place where the Town of Enfield had no authority to make it payable—a fact which it is admitted does not affect its validity—was not sufficient to put Jordan on inquiry. Though made payable in Shawneetown, it is legally payable at Enfield, and is as valid and binding on the Town as if it were in terms made payable there.

[695]

The answer to the fourth question, therefore, is that one of the bonds and the coupons thereto belonging, are not void in the hands of the plaintiff by reason of Post having litigated the bond in the state courts of Illinois.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

[643] ALBERT BALDWIN, Subrogated for JOSEPH C. KEYSER, Appt.,

v.

JOHN W. BLACK.

Sequestration of mortgaged property under Code of Practice of Louisiana—release by plaintiff and delivery to and use by agent—possession of agent, lawful—agent not liable for use or earnings.

In an action under the Code of Practice of Louisiana to enforce a mortgage on a tug, held under a writ of sequestration, the plaintiff procured the release of the tug and delivered it to his agent who, pending the proceedings, used it in towing for hire. Upon a libel subsequently filed against the agent, it is held:

1. That the possession of the agent was lawful.
2. That he is not liable, either in contract or tort, for the use or earnings of the tug.
3. That, if the suit were to be regarded as against the agent's principal, upon the facts disclosed, nothing is due the libelant.

[No. 71.]

Argued and submitted Dec. 2, 3, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. H. Marr, for appellant.

Messrs. R. H. Browne and Henry C. Miller, for appellee.

[644] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in admiralty, in personam, brought in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, by Joseph C. Keyser against John W. Black. The substance of the libel is that Keyser was the owner of the steam tug C. C. Keyser; that, in October, 1877, the firm of Neafie & Levy, holding a mortgage on the tug, brought suit in a state court in Louisiana, against Keyser, and obtained a writ of sequestration therein, and caused the sheriff to seize the tug and hold it, until, on the application of Neafie & Levy, it was released on bond; that thereupon Black took possession of it, though he had no lawful right to do so, and used it in towing for hire, on the Mississippi River, injuring it and deteriorating its value; that the value of the use and services of the tug, as made use of by Black, "for his own behoof and benefit," is $25,000; [645] and that Black, by taking possession of and using the tug, is liable to Keyser for that amount "as in an implied contract." The libel prays for a decree that Black pay it to Keyser.

The answer sets up in defense the facts hereinafter recited as those found by the circuit court, and denies that there is any contract or obligation, implied or otherwise, on the part of Black to Keyser.

On a hearing, the district court pronounced for the libelant and, on the report of a commissioner, entered a decree that A. S. Baldwin and J. Levy & Co., "subrogated to the rights of the libelant on undivided halves," recover from Black $506.86. Black appealed to the circuit court, as also did Baldwin and Levy & Co. The circuit court made a finding of facts, of which only the following are material in the view we take of the case:

1. In October, 1877, Neafie & Levy, of Philadelphia, were creditors of Keyser, the libelant, for $18,164, with interest, for which amount they had a mortgage upon the tug, the debt being for the price of the tug built by them for Keyser.

2. On October 11, 1877, they began suit in the Third District Court for the Parish of Orleans to collect that debt. They sequestered the tug in accordance with the law, and in due course recovered judgment against Keyser for the full amount of their debt, with interest, and issued execution against him. The tug was sold under the execution to them, the judgment recognizing their mortgage, for $16,075, the amount was credited on their debt, and there remained due to them by Keyser, on the judgment, after giving him credit for all that was made on the execution, $3,887, with interest.

3. During the pendency of that suit, the tug not having been bonded by Keyser during the ten days allowed by law to him to bond her, Neafie & Levy afterwards bonded her and she was discharged, under the order of the court, into their possession, under the release bond furnished by them under and in accordance with the 279th and 280th articles of the Code of Practice. Black, the defendant, was the surety of Neafie & Levy in the release bond, and was their agent to receive and hold possession of the tug and, under the order of release, did receive and hold possession of her for them.

4. The tug was held under the release bond [646] by Neafie & Levy, through the defendant, as their agent, from October 25, 1877, to January 10, 1878, on which date she was returned to the custody of the sheriff. She was held by him under the writ of sequestration in the suit of Neafie & Levy against Keyser, until May 6, 1878, when she was sold under the execution, issued in that suit, to satisfy the judgment therein.

5. From October 25, 1877, to December 29, 1877, the tug was in actual use in the business of towing vessels by Black, with the authority and under the direction of Neafie & Levy, to whom he accounted for all her earnings; and he acted throughout, in becoming surety, and in receiving, holding and using the tug, as agent for Neafie & Levy.

6. The net amount of earnings so accounted for and paid to Neafie & Levy by Black, over expenses and disbursements incident to the employment of the tug, was $2,588.88.

7. When the tug was seized by Neafie & Levy under their mortgage, she was incumbered with lien and privileged debts to the amount of $4,488.17, all of which, taking precedence of their mortgage, were paid by them under subrogations, legal as well as express, to the rights of the creditors holding those debts, the debts having been created by Keyser, and being his debts, discharged by them, between the date of the seizure of the tug under their sequestration and the day of the sale by the sheriff to them.

On those facts the court found, as conclusions of law:

1. That Black was lawfully in possession of the tug as the agent of Neafie & Levy, who were lawfully in control of her under the order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

2. That there was no liability on the part of Black ex contractu or ex delicto, to account to the libelant for the use or earnings of the tug.

A decree was entered dismissing the libel, and the interest of Levy & Co. having been transferred to Baldwin, the latter has appealed to this court.

The Code of Practice of Louisiana (art. 269) provides for a mandate of the court called a judicial sequestration, "ordering the sheriff, in certain cases, to take into his possession and to keep a thing of which another person has the possession, until after the decision of a suit, in order [647] that it be delivered to him who shall be adjudged entitled to have the property or possession of that thing." By article 271, "all species of property, real or personal," may be sequestered. By article 275, a plaintiff in a suit "may obtain a sequestration in all cases where he has a lien or privilege on property." Article 279 provides for the giving by the defendant of an obligation, with surety to the sheriff, to set aside the mandate of sequestration, the obligation to be in an amount equal to the value of the property to be left in the possession of the defendant; and also enacts that whenever the defendant shall not execute such obligation within ten days after the seizure of the property by the sheriff, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff "to give similar bond and security to the sheriff as that required by law from the defendant, and to take the property sequestered into his possession."

Articles 280 and 281 are in these words: "Art. 280. The security thus given by the defendant, when the property sequestered consists in movables, shall be responsible that he shall not send away the same out of the jurisdiction of the court; that he shall not make an improper use of them; and that he will faithfully present them, after definitive judgment, in case he should be decreed to restore the same to the plaintiff. Art. 281. As regards landed property, this security is given to prevent the defendant, while in possession, from wasting the property, and for the faithful restitution of the fruits that he may have received since the demand, or of their value in the event of his being cast in the suit."

(1.) The proceedings of Neafie & Levy to obtain possession of the tug were strictly in accordance with these provisions of law. They being lawfully in possession and control of the tug, under the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, Black, as their agent, was in lawful possession of her. But he was in possession only as such agent, and no cause of action against him, in favor of Keyser, could arise, either in contract or in tort, in respect to any earnings of the tug or any compensation for or value of her use. Whatever claim there could be could be only against Neafie & Levy. [648]

(2.) The statute seems to make a distinction between movables and landed property, by prescribing in regard to the former that no "improper use" shall be made of them by the party bonding them, thus implying that a proper use may be made of them; and by providing in regard to landed property that the value of its fruits is to be restored. And this distinction is recognized by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, for, in Segassie v. Piernas, 26 La. Ann. 742, which was a suit against the sureties on a release bond given by the defendant in sequestration, where the question arose whether, in a suit on the bond, the sureties were "liable for the fruits and revenues of movable property sequestered and released on bond," the court, after citing articles 279, 280 and 281, said: "From these provisions of the law we conclude that the surety on such bond is responsible only for the value of movables, when not delivered according to the stipulations of the bond, after judgment in favor of the plaintiff. It is only where the property is land that the law fixes the responsibility for revenues." There is no good reason why this rule should not equally apply where the plaintiff gives what the statute designates as "similar bond and security to the sheriff as that required by law from the defendant," in order to be able, "to take the property sequestered into his possession."

(3.) If the suit were to be regarded as one against Neafie & Levy, to be determined on an accounting with them, it clearly appears that nothing is due to the libelant, when the deficiency in the net proceeds of the sale of the tug to pay the mortgage debt and the other lien and privileged debts is taken into account. This results from the provisions of article 2207 et seq., of the Louisiana Civil Code, in regard to compensation.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment in this case. The defendant, Black, is treated in all respects as if he had lawful possession and use of the steam tug in question; whereas, in my judgment, his possession and use were entirely without law or right. He could have no better [649] right than his principals, Neafie & Levy, and they had no right, pending the suit, but that of holding the tug in their possession as a pledge for the payment of their debt. They had a mortgage upon it, and brought a suit to recover the debt due, and, under article 275 of the Code of Practice, they sued out a sequestration of the tug. The defendant, Keyser, having failed to give a release bond, Neafie & Levy gave such a bond under the Act of 1842, and the tug was delivered by the sheriff into their possession. This did not give them any right to use it. A sequestration is in the nature of a deposit, and is so treated in the old law, as well as in the Civil Codes of France and Louisiana. See Code Nap. Liv. III, Tit. XI, Du Dépôt et du Sequestre; Louis. Code, 1808, Book III, Tit. XI, Of Deposit and Sequestration; Code 1825, Book III, Tit. XIII, ditto; Œuvres de Pothier, Tom.

VI, Du Contrat de Dépôt. One of the first rules relating to a deposit is that the depositary cannot use the thing deposited. Civ. Code, art. 2940. A sequestration, if gratuitous, is subject to all the rules which apply to a deposit. C. C. art. 2975. It is true that the Code of Practice declares that the judicial sequestration "does not mean judicial deposit, because sequestration may exist together with the right of administration, while mere deposit does not admit it." Art. 270. But this right of administration is no more than the right (as well as the duty) of taking due care of the thing, as a prudent father of a family would do, to prevent it from deterioration. Some things would deteriorate without use. A railroad or a plantation would go to destruction. But these cases, and some others, are exceptional. As a general thing, movables are different. Without the owner's consent they cannot lawfully be used for lucrative purposes by the person who has the mere custody of them. When the plaintiff obtains possession, they become in his hands a pledge for the payment of his debt. His lien or mortgage is converted into a pledge; and a pledge does not give the pledgee the right to use the thing pledged. The exceptions are stated by Lord Holt in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 916, 917, and summarized in Addison on Contracts, § 1090, where it is said: "If the pawn be something that will be the worse for wear, as clothes, the pawnee can not [650] use it; but if it will not be the worse for wear, as jewels, the pawnee may use them; but then it must be at his peril; for, if he is robbed in wearing them, he is answerable. Also, if the pawn be of such a nature that the keeping is a charge to the pawnee, as if it be a cow or horse, the pawnee may milk the cow, or ride the horse; and this is in recompense of the keeping." The rule is derived from the civil law. The Institute says: "Theft is committed not only when one man removes the property of another to appropriate it to himself, but also generally, where one man uses the property of another against the will of the proprietor; thus if a creditor uses a pledge, or a depositary the deposit left with him, etc." Lib. IV, Tit. I, § VI. Mackeldey says of the pledgee: "He is liable for every wrong; he dare not use the pledge without special permission, otherwise he is liable for casual damages resulting to it." Roman Law, Book II, 1, 4.

The right of administration referred to in article 270 of the Code of Practice is vested in the sheriff who takes possession under the mandate of sequestration; but he cannot use sequestered movables except to prevent their deterioration. See Witkouski v. Witkouski, 16 La. Ann. 232; Owens v. Davis, 15 La. Ann. 22, 25; Parish v. Hozey, 17 La. 578; Asart v. King, 14 La. 62. And if he delivers them to the plaintiff, upon receiving the bond prescribed by the Act of 1842, the latter obtains no greater right. If the defendant bonds them, as he may do, he may use them, because they are his own property; but even he can make no improper use of them, so as to destroy their value to answer the judgment that may be rendered against him. Article 280 expressly provides that "The security given by the defendant, when the property consists in movables, shall be responsible that he shall not send away the same out of the jurisdiction of the court; that he shall not make an improper use of them; and that he will faithfully present them after definitive judgment, in case he should be decreed to restore the same to the plaintiff." This is entirely different from what is said in regard to the plaintiff when he bonds the goods. The only [651] right given him is "To take the property sequestered into his possession." Code Pr. 279; Act. 1842. Possession is all that the plaintiff acquires pending suit. And the reason is very apparent; the movables do not belong to him; he only holds them as a pledge, and the property in them remains in the defendant until they are sold under execution upon the judgment.

There can be no question that a steam tug is such a movable as may be safely kept without use, or that a pledge of it confers no right of use without a special agreement with the owner.

If this is a correct view of the law, neither Neafie & Levy, nor their agent or lessee, Black, acquired any right to use the steam tug, but were guilty of a tort in using it without Keyser's consent. They became liable to him, not only for all benefit and advantage they derived from its use, but for all deterioration and wear and tear occurring by such use. They are to be treated as tort feasors, and not as lessees under Keyser.

Now, it appears from the findings that Black realized over $14,000 from the use of the tug, either from her actual earnings in towing, or by virtue of the position she occupied, in his name, in the squadron of the Towing Association; whilst his actual expenses, including insurance, coal, commissions, and everything he could count up, amounted only to $4,429. Yet Keyser received credit from these disinterested users of his property for only $2,600. It seems to me that this one-sided settlement, made by the tort feasors themselves, ought not to receive the sanction of a court of justice. The plaintiff sues as upon an implied contract, it is true; but that does not prevent his recovering all that, in equity and justice, he ought to recover. I think that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial directed.

FELIX A. BORER, Admr. of JOHN GORDON, Deceased, ET AL., Appts., [587]

v.

GEORGE M. CHAPMAN, EXR. of Eunice Chapman, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 587-603.)

Administration in State other than that of domicil, ancillary—bill by judgment creditor to marshal assets of estate—creditor in another State, not bound to make himself a party to such administration, but may reach assets in forum of primary administration—former action at law—equity jurisdiction of federal courts—judgment nunc pro tunc may be entered, when—with reference to Statute of Limitations, given effect as of actual date of entry.

On January 4, 1864, the appellee recovered judgment in a New York court against John Gordon and others. In 1867 Gordon died testate in Minnesota, where he and his legatees resided. The will was proved in Minnesota, but the estate was administered in California where most of the property of Gordon was situated. The appellee did not make himself a party to the proceedings in the probate court in California, but brought suit on his judgment in the court below against Snow and Clark, the executors named in the will. Service was had upon Snow against whom a personal judgment was rendered. This judgment was reversed by this court, on the ground that it should have been rendered against the defendant de bonis testatoris. The court below then entered judgment nunc pro tunc against Snow, as executor upon its former decision and findings. Upon a bill subsequently filed in the court below against the appellants to marshal the assets of the estate of said Gordon, it is held:

1. That the judgment in the action at law is conclusive that Snow is chargeable as executor of Gordon's will.

2. That said judgment was properly entered nunc pro tunc against Snow as executor, although he was dead at the time of its entry; the failure to enter it at the proper time being due to an error of the court.

3. That the entry of said judgment was a valid exercise of the power and discretion of the court.

4. That the administration of Gordon's estate in California was merely ancillary, the primary administration being that of his domicil; that the assets distributed in California remained assets in Minnesota for the payment of any unpaid creditor choosing that forum; that such assets were impressed with a trust in favor of any such creditor; that it is upon the ground of such a trust that jurisdiction in equity rests; and that this jurisdiction in the federal courts is independent of that conferred upon state courts, and not subject to interference by state legislation.

5. That a judgment nunc pro tunc may have effect from different dates for different purposes; that the bill in this case is not barred by the Statute of Limitations of Minnesota, said judgment being given effect from the actual date of entry for this purpose; and that it is unnecessary to decide whether said statute applies to a bill filed in the court below by a citizen of another State.

Argued Dec. 13, 14, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. P. Clough, for appellants:

The relief prayed by the bill, and awarded by the court, was barred by the proceedings and decrees of the Probate Court for the City and County of San Francisco.

Re Garraud's Estate, 36 Cal. 277; Reynolds v. Brumagim, 54 Cal. 254; Re Hudson's Estate, 63 Cal. 454.

When these legacies were removed from the State of California, and brought into the State of Minnesota, they were there held by the same title, and with the same absolute ownership, by which they had previously been held within the State of California.

After having established his claim according to law, Chapman was limited to the period of one year in which to institute suit against Gordon's legatees, under the Statutes of Minnesota.

While the form of the judgment of July 10, 1871, was such that it erroneously gave a remedy against Snow personally, it was also one which afforded a collateral remedy against the assets of the estate, by proceedings under the provisions of the statute upon which the present bill is based.

Mr. Charles W. Hornor, for appellee:

The complainant was not bound in law to go to the ancillary administration in California of the estate of John Gordon to get payment of his judgment.

Story, Eq. § 533; Story, Conflict of Laws, §§ 512, 519; Mackey v. Coxe, 59 U. S. 18 How. 100 (15: 299).

Until the debts of John Gordon were paid the assets of his succession could never become in law free from the lien of his creditors.

Wheeler v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 34; 1 Atk. 495.

The only qualification to the doctrine of nunc pro tunc in judicial proceeding is that the the thing ought to be done; that it be done by leave or order of the court, perhaps in the presence of the parties interested; and that it be done to answer the purposes of justice, and not to do injustice.

State v. Alverez, 7 La. Ann. 284; Fishmongers v. Robertson, 54 E. C. L. 970; Matheson v. Grant, 43 U. S. 2 How. 282 (11: 268); Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117 (24: 395); Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 62 (26: 369); Ex parte Moryan, 114 U. S. 174 (29: 135).

The proceedings in the Probate Court of California are binding upon Snow, but not upon Chapman, for the latter had no notice and was no party to them.

Ray v. Norseworthy, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 128 (23: 116).

This is a bill in equity filed on the 20th of [589]
August, 1879, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, by George M. Chapman, a citizen of the State of New Jersey, executor of the last will and testament of Eunice Chapman, deceased, against Felix A. Borer, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of John Gordon, deceased, Edson R. Smith, executor of the last will and testament of George D. Snow, deceased, Elizabeth Hewitt and Thomas P. Hewitt, her husband, Harriet Cecilia Snow, Sarah Ann Powell, and Georgiana Smith; the defendants being all citizens of the State of Minnesota. The object and prayer of the bill were to marshal the assets of the estate of John Gordon, deceased, alleged to have been received by the defendants either as his representatives or legatees, for the purpose of applying them to the payment of a judgment recovered by the complainant against George [590]
D. Snow, as executor of John Gordon. The case was heard upon the pleadings and proofs, and a decree rendered in favor of the complainant below, to reverse which the defendants prosecute the present appeal.

The facts in the case on which the decree is predicated are as follows: On January 4, 1864, George M. Chapman, executor of Eunice Chapman, recovered judgment in the Supreme Court of the State of New York against John Gordon and two others in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $4,759.80, damages and costs. On May 14, 1867, Gordon, then a citizen of Minnesota, having his domicil in the County of Le Sueur in that State, made and published his last will, and within a few days thereafter died in that county. On July 1, 1867, his will was duly presented to the probate court of that county for proof and allowance, by George D. Snow, and was duly admitted to probate and record; and letters testamentary in the usual form were made out and recorded, directed to Snow and Clark, his executors. By that will Gordon made numerous bequests and devises, among which was one of $30,000 in money to Harriet Cecilia Snow, wife of George D. Snow; another of $6,000 in money to Sarah Ann Kniffen, now Sarah Ann Powell; another of a like amount to Georgiana Kniffen, now [591] Georgiana Smith; three small tracts of land in Le Sueur County, Minnesota, with certain personal property then situated thereon, to Margaret Elizabeth Hewitt and, in addition thereto, the sum of $2,000 to Margaret Elizabeth Hewitt and her heirs; and the residue of the estate, after the payment of debts, funeral expenses, costs of administration, and legacies, to George D. Snow. The legatees resided in Le Sueur County, Minnesota. Gordon had previously lived in San Francisco, California, where nearly the whole of the estate was situated. The executors named in the will were George D. Snow and Pomeroy D. Clark, the latter a resident of San Francisco. In the bequests to the Misses Kniffen, and the cash portion of that to Mrs. Hewitt and her heirs, it was provided that the money should be paid into the hands of George D. Snow, to be held and managed by him as their trustee for certain designated periods. It does not appear from the records of the Probate Court of Le Sueur County that either Clark or Snow ever accepted letters testamentary, or took the oath, or gave the bond required from executors by the Statutes of Minnesota, or ever filed in that court any inventory of Gordon's estate, or ever did any other act in respect to the estate under such letters.

After proof of the will in Le Sueur County, Minnesota, a properly authenticated copy of the same, together with the proof and allowance thereof, was forwarded to Clark in San Francisco, who took such proceedings thereon in the Probate Court of San Francisco that the will was there admitted to record, and letters testamentary thereon issued to Clark solely on August 5, 1867. Snow never in any manner appeared in the California proceedings, except to receive and receipt for his legacy. Clark, as executor in California, took the usual and necessary proceedings under the laws of that State for the collection and distribution of the estate. An inventory and appraisement of the property were filed, and notice given by publication to creditors to present their claims to the executor for payment. On November 5, 1868, Clark presented to the probate court his final accounts as executor, with his petition for their allowance, the hearing of which was set for November 17, 1868, and public notice given thereof in accordance with the local law. On December 10, 1868, the probate court made its order allowing and confirming the accounts, on which date Clark filed a further petition in the probate court, praying for a decree of distribution and a final order discharging him from the office and trust of executor of Gordon's will. The court thereon made an order calling on all persons interested in the estate of John Gordon to appear before the court on January 11, 1869, to show cause why an order should not be made distributing the residue of the estate to George D. Snow, the residuary legatee. In pursuance thereof, and on the date fixed for the hearing, the court made its final decree of distribution, in which, among other things, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed that all the acts and proceedings of the said executor, as reported to that court and appearing upon the records thereof, should be and thereby were [592] approved and confirmed, and that the residue of the estate should be and was thereby assigned to the said George D. Snow. On January 12, 1869, the court made its further and final order in the proceedings, discharging Clark from the executorship, the will having been fully and completely executed to the satisfaction of the court. Clark's accounts, filed with the probate court, show the payment of all the money legacies hereinbefore mentioned, to the respective legatees prior to August 1, 1868. The residue decreed to George D. Snow, as residuary legatee, had been turned over to him by Clark prior to January 12, 1869. The indebtedness from Gordon and his associates to Chapman, arising upon the judgment in New York, has never been paid, and no claim based thereon was ever presented to Clark or to the probate judge for the City and County of San Francisco. A transcript of the judgment was procured by Chapman and forwarded to Snow in Minnesota about October 23, 1867, and, after some correspondence between them in respect to its allowance and payment, an action at law was brought thereon in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota by Chapman, as executor, against George D. Snow and P. D. Clark, described as the executors of the last will and testament of John Gordon, deceased. In that action process was served upon Snow, but Clark was not found. Snow appeared and defended, denying in his answer that he was or ever had been the executor of Gordon's will, and pleading that Clark, as executor in California, had fully administered the assets which had come to his hands, and had been discharged by the probate court of that State from his said office. At the June Term, 1871, of the circuit court the issues were found in favor of the plaintiff and against Snow, and judgment rendered thereon for the sum of $7,264.25 and costs. In that action, although brought against Snow and Clark as executors in their official capacity, judgment was finally rendered against Snow personally, and execution awarded de bonis propriis. A writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse that judgment was sued out, pending which, in the year 1873, Snow died testate, [593] leaving Edson R. Smith as the executor of his will, who was thereupon substituted as plaintiff in error in this court. At the October Term, 1876, a decision was rendered in this court, reversing the judgment of the circuit court on the ground that it was erroneous in form, inasmuch as the action was debt on judgment recovered against the deceased testator of the defendant, and nothing was alleged in the declaration to show that the defendant had become personally liable for the judgment debt. Smith, Exr. v. Chapman, Exr. 93 U. S. 41 [23:795] The cause was therefore remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to take further proceedings therein in conformity with the opinion. The mandate of this court having been filed on June 7, 1877, in the circuit court, the cause came on to be heard at the December Term, 1878, upon an order theretofore granted the plaintiff, George M. Chapman, executor, etc., on his petition, directed to Edson R. Smith, as executor of Snow's will, and Felix A. Borer, who had been appointed administrator de bonis non with will annexed of John Gordon, deceased, to show cause why the said Borer, administrator aforesaid, should not be substituted as such administrator in the place of George D. Snow, deceased, as defendant in said cause; and why judgment should not be entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the previous findings of the court in the premises; and said Felix A. Borer, administrator as aforesaid, having objected to said substitution, it was ordered by the court that he should not be required against his objection to be substituted as defendant as aforesaid, and the motion of the plaintiff for such substitution was for that reason denied. The judgment of the circuit court then proceeds as follows: "And it is further ordered, considered and adjudged that judgment shall be, and the same is hereby, entered in favor of said plaintiff, George M. Chapman, executor of the last will and testament of Eunice Chapman, deceased, nunc pro tunc, upon the said decision and findings of the court as of the 10th day of July, A. D. 1871, against the said George D. Snow in his capacity as executor of the last will and testament of John Gordon, deceased, for the sum of $7,264.25, and costs, taxed at $62.76, to be paid and enforced out of the effects of the [594] testator, John Gordon, deceased, with interest on said sum of $7,264.25 from said 10th day of July, 1871, and that said judgment be also certified by this court to the Probate Court of the County of Le Sueur, Minnesota, as a claim duly allowed and adjudged against the said estate of John Gordon, deceased."

Felix A. Borer had been appointed administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of John Gordon, by the Probate Court of Le Sueur County, on July 7, 1874, upon the petition of Chapman setting forth the recovery of his judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States, the pendency of the writ of error from the supreme court, and the fact that Clark had never qualified in the Minnesota proceedings, and that Snow in his lifetime had denied the acceptance of the executorship of Gordon's will. Borer has ever since remained administrator by virtue of said appointment.

Upon these facts the cause came on for final hearing in the circuit court, where a decree was rendered in favor of the complainant, the court being of the opinion:

"1. That George D. Snow, appointed executor by the will of John Gordon, deceased, accepted the trust and had the will proved in Le Sueur County, Minnesota.

"2. That this court has jurisdiction to grant the relief asked for by complainant's bill, for the reason that a court of equity can decree that a legatee under a will, after distribution, holds property in trust when valid debts of the decedent remain unpaid, and follow the property or its proceeds in the legatee's hands.

"3. That the estate of George D. Snow is liable for the debt set up in the complaint; and if the estate of Snow is not sufficient to respond to the full amount, the deficiency can be supplied out of the estate of the residuary legatee, Mrs. Snow.

"4. That the complainant's debt is not barred by the Statute of Limitations."

It was found by the decree that no assets of the estate of John Gordon had come into the hands of Felix A. Borer, as administrator; that on the 12th day of January, 1869, George D. Snow, after payment of all debts, funeral ex- [595] penses, legacies, and all claims owing or payable by the estate of John Gordon, except the claim or debt owing to Chapman, received under the will of Gordon property belonging to said Gordon of the value of $10,777; that by the will of George D. Snow, his wife, Harriet Cecilia Snow, was made his residuary legatee; and that the estate of Snow is solvent, and sufficient to pay all his debts and to fulfill all the provisions of the will, with an excess of assets therein of not less than $100,000 in value, including over $20,000 in cash, for said Harriet Cecilia Snow as such residuary legatee; and that she has, as such residuary legatee, received from Edson R. Smith, as executor of the will of George D. Snow, an amount more than sufficient to pay the claims of the plaintiff, with interest and costs. That upon the death of George D. Snow, Edson R. Smith, as the executor of his will, collected and received the sum of $2,824.83, being the proceeds of a claim or debt owing to the said John Gordon at the time of his death, and a part of the estate of the said John Gordon. It also appears that there are no outstanding and unpaid claims against the estate of Gordon, except that due on the judgment in favor of the complainant below.

The errors assigned by the appellants are as follows:

1. The circuit court erred in holding that the said George D. Snow had ever in any manner become executor of Gordon's will or chargeable as such.

2. The court erred in holding that the judgment in the suit at law of Chapman against Snow, entered on December 18, 1878, nunc pro tunc, as of July 10, 1871, was of any force or effect whatever, as against the estate of said John Gordon, or that of the said George D. Snow.

3. The court erred in holding that the relief prayed in the bill had not been barred by the proceedings and decrees of the Probate Court for the City and County of San Francisco, in the State of California.

4. The court erred in holding that the relief prayed by the bill had not been barred by laches and the lapse of time, and the several Statutes of Limitations set up and referred to in the answers of the defendants to the bill of complaint.

5. The court erred in holding and adjudging that the estate of the said George D. Snow is [596] liable for the claim or debt owing to the said George M. Chapman, executor.

6. The court erred in holding that if the estate of the said George D. Snow should not be sufficient to respond to the full amount of said claim or debt, the deficiency should be paid by the said Harriet Cecilia Snow.

The first error assigned is that the court erred in deciding that George D. Snow was chargeable as executor of Gordon's will. It is too late to raise that question in this cause. It was one of the matters in issue in the action brought by Chapman, executor, against Snow, executor, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, wherein it was expressly held and adjudged that George D. Snow was executor of John Gordon, deceased. The judgment in that case was reversed upon the application of Snow's personal representatives, on the express ground that it was made payable out of the personal effects of Snow, when it ought to have been de bonis testatoris. That judgment concludes the question in this cause.

It is next contended, however, that that judgment is of itself void as having been rendered on the 18th of December, 1878, against Snow, as executor, who was then dead, although the entry was made to take effect as of July 10, 1871. The law on the subject of entries nunc pro tunc was fully considered and stated by this court in the case of Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 62, 64 [26:369, 370]. It was there stated, "that, where the delay in rendering a judgment or a decree arises from the act of the court, that is, where the delay has been for its convenience, or has been caused by the multiplicity or press of business, or the intricacy of the questions involved, or for any other cause not attributable to the laches of the parties, but within the control of the court, the judgment or decree may be entered retrospectively as of a time when it should or might have been entered up. In such cases, upon the maxim Actus curiæ neminem gravabit, which has been well said to be founded in right and good sense, and to afford a safe and certain guide for the administration of justice, it is the duty of the court to see that the parties shall not suffer by the [597] delay. A nunc pro tunc order should be granted or refused, as justice may require, in view of the circumstances of the particular case."*

This rule was applied in the case of Coughlin v. District of Columbia, 106 U. S. 7, 11 [27:74, 75]. In that case, a judgment rendered upon a verdict in favor of the plaintiff had been erroneously set aside in the same court. A new trial was had, and a judgment for the defendant was reversed by this court, which affirmed the original judgment for the plaintiff as of the date when it was rendered, in order to prevent the action from being abated by the intervening death of the plaintiff.

In the present instance, upon the findings as originally made by the circuit court, judgment should have been rendered against Snow de bonis testatoris; the error of the court was in making it payable de bonis propriis. For this error it was reversed on the application of Smith, executor of Snow, who had procured himself to be substituted as plaintiff in error for that purpose. The mandate of this court was sent to the circuit court, in form reversing the original judgment, but, in substance, simply requiring its correction in the one particular in which the error had been committed. The manner in which this duty of the circuit court was performed, under the mandate of this court, was to enter the judgment nunc pro tunc, as of the time when it should have been entered in proper form. The reversal of the judgment in the circuit court, by the operation of the mandate of this court, and the execution of that mandate by the circuit court in entering the new judgment, was one continuous judicial act, and to that Smith, as executor of Snow, was a party, for he was a party to the record as plaintiff in error in this court. It cannot, therefore, be said that the action of the circuit court was ex parte, or that it was void, because it was directed against a deceased person not represented. This objection, if valid, would prevent, in all cases of the death of one of the parties, the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc. It is the fact of such intervening death that creates the necessity by which the power is justified, in order to prevent a failure of justice, for which the other party is not responsible, and by which, therefore, he should not suffer. The action of the court in making the entry, in the form in which it was made was also, we think, a proper exercise of its discretion upon the circumstances of the case, as the object of the proceeding was to fix the liability of the estate of Gordon, as represented by his executor, Snow, in order that the judgment of Chapman might furnish ground for a creditor's bill, seeking to apply the assets of Gordon's estate to its payment. We hold therefore that the entry of the judgment against Snow, as executor of Gordon, was a valid and effectual exercise of the power and discretion of the court, and that the validity of the judgment itself cannot be impeached. [598]

It is insisted, however, that the relief prayed for by the bill and awarded by the court was barred by the proceedings of the Probate Court for the City and County of San Francisco. The Statutes of California (Gen. Laws of Cal. 1850, 1864) provide that if a claim against the estate of a decedent, in course of distribution in the probate court, shall not be presented within ten months after the first publication of the notice to creditors, it shall be barred forever; unless when it shall be made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant, to the satisfaction of the executor and administrator and the probate judge, that the claimant had no notice, as provided by the Act, by reason of being out of the State, in which case it may be presented at any time before a decree of distribution is entered. 5828, § 130. It is also provided (5944 § 246) that when the accounts of the administrator or executor have been settled, and an order made for the payment of debts and distribution of the estate, no creditor, whose claim was not included in the order of payment, shall have any right to call upon the creditors who have been paid, or upon the heirs, devisees or legatees, to contribute to the payment of his claim; but, if the executor or administrator shall have failed to give the notice to the creditors, as prescribed by the Act, such creditor may recover on the bond of the executor or administrator the amount of his claim, or such part thereof as he would have been entitled to [599] had it been allowed. It is further provided (5977, § 279) that when an estate has been fully administered, and it is shown by the executor or administrator, by the production of satisfactory vouchers, that he has paid all sums of money due from him, and delivered up, under the order of the court, all the property of the estate to the parties entitled, and performed all the acts lawfully required of him, the court shall make a decree discharging him from all liability thereafter.

It is argued that Chapman, as a creditor of Gordon's estate, was bound to make himself a party to the proceedings in the Probate Court of San Francisco, for the purpose of obtaining payment and satisfaction of his claim; that, failing to do this, he is barred from any right to recover, either from the executor of that estate or from any legatee; that the defendants in this bill, as legatees of Gordon, received what was due them under his will under the sanction and by the order and judgment of the Probate Court of San Francisco, which vested them with an indefeasible title which must be respected in every other forum, if full faith and credit, according to the Constitution of the United States, is to be given in other States to the public Acts and judicial proceedings of the courts of California.

But these positions are not tenable. The administration of the estate of Gordon, in California, under the orders of the Probate Court of San Francisco, was merely ancillary; the primary administration was that of the testator's domicil, Minnesota. Chapman was not a citizen of California, nor resident there; he was no party to the administration proceedings; he was not bound to make himself such. If he had chosen he could have proved his claim there and obtained payment, but he had the right to await the result of the settlement of that administration, and look to such assets of Gordon as he could subsequently find in Minnesota, whether originally found there or brought there from California by the executors or legatees of Gordon's estate. The assets in California finally distributed there, and brought into Minnesota by the executor or by any legatee, remained assets in Minnesota for the payment of any unpaid creditors choosing that forum. Such assets were impressed with a trust which such creditor had a right to have [600] administered for his benefit. Aspden v. Nixon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 467 [11: 1059]; Stacy v. Thrasher, 47 U. S. 6 How. 44 [12: 337]; Hill v. Tucker, 54 U. S. 13 How. 458 [14: 223]; Mackey v. Coxe, 59 U. S. 18 How. 100 [15: 299]. It is upon the ground of such a trust that the jurisdiction of courts of equity primarily rests in administration suits, and in creditors' bills brought against executors or administrators, or after distribution against legatees, for the purpose of charging them with a liability to apply the assets of the decedent to the payment of his debts. As a part of the ancient and original jurisdiction of courts of equity, it is vested, by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress in pursuance thereof, in the federal courts, to be administered by the circuit courts in controversies arising between citizens of different States. It is the familiar and well settled doctrine of this court that this jurisdiction is independent of that conferred by the States upon their own courts, and cannot be affected by any legislation except that of the United States. Suydam v. Broadnax, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 67 [10:357]; Hagan v. Walker, 55 U. S. 14 How. 29 [14:312]; Union Bank of Tenn. v. Jolley's Admrs. 59 U. S. 18 How. 504 [15:473]; Hyde v. Stone, 61 U. S. 20 How. 170 [15: 874]; Green's Admrx. v. Creighton, 64 U. S. 23 How. 90 [16:419]; Payne v. Hook, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 425, 430 [19:260.]

In Payne v. Hook, ubi supra, the rule was declared in these words: "We have repeatedly held 'that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over controversies between citizens of different States cannot be impaired by the laws of the States which prescribe the modes of redress in their courts, or which regulate the distribution of their judicial power.' If legal remedies are sometimes modified to suit the changes in the laws of the States and the practice of their courts, it is not so with equitable. The equity jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts is the same that the High Court of Chancery in England possesses; is subject to neither limitation or restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different States of the Union."

The only qualification in the application of this principle is that the courts of the United States, in the exercise of their jurisdiction over the parties, cannot seize or control property while in the custody of a court of the State. Williams v. Benedict, 49 U. S. 8 How. 107 [12:1007]; Yonley v. Lavender, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 276 [22:536]; Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 [16:749.]

This exception does not apply in the present [601] case, for the assets sought by this bill to be marshaled in favor of the complainant are not in the possession of any other court; they are in the hands of the defendants, impressed with a trust in favor of the complainant, a creditor of Gordon, and subject to the control of this court by reason of its jurisdiction over their persons.

It is further contended, however, on the part of the appellants, that if the relief sought in this bill is not barred by the administration proceedings in California, it is, nevertheless, defeated by the application of the Statute of Limitations of the State of Minnesota. The Statute of Minnesota (1878, p. 826, chap. 77) gives to unpaid creditors of the testator an action against the legatees, in which the plaintiff, in order to recover, is required to show that no assets were delivered by the executor or administrator of the deceased to his heirs or next of kin; or that the value of such assets has been recovered by some other creditor; or that such assets are not sufficient to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff. In the last case he can recover only the deficiency. The whole amount of the recovery shall be apportioned among all the legatees of the testator in proportion to the amount of their legacies respectively; his proportion only being recoverable against each legatee. In respect to this statutory right of action, however, it is provided in the same Act, section 16, that no such action shall be maintained unless commenced within one year from the time the claim is allowed or established. It is maintained that, according to the judicial decisions of Minnesota, the creditor is required, first, to establish his claim by a separate judicial proceeding, and in a subsequent suit obtain the recovery provided for against the legatees. Bryant v. Livermore, 20 Minn. 313. It is admitted that the suit brought by Chapman in the Circuit Court of the United States against Snow, for the purpose of establishing his claim against Gordon's estate, answers the first of these conditions, but that, in order to fulfill the second, the present bill should have been filed within one year from the date of the final judgment in that action. The date of the judgment as originally rendered against Snow was April 19, 1872; the present bill was filed August 20, [602] 1879; and we are asked to hold that the right to sue was at that time barred by the Statute of Limitations. But the judgment rendered April 19, 1872, was not the end of the litigation; Snow himself sued out his writ of error to reverse it, and upon his death, in 1873, his executor, Smith, became a party, as plaintiff in error, and prosecuted the writ until the reversal of the judgment at the October Term, 1876. The mandate of this court was filed in the circuit court June 7, 1877, and on December 18, 1878, the final judgment was entered against Snow as executor, to be paid and enforced out of the effects of the testator, John Gordon, deceased, as of July 10, 1871. The present bill was filed within twelve months after the date of that entry. If, for the purpose of determining the application of the Statute of Limitations, this judgment may be considered as dating from December 18, 1878, the bar was not complete. It is contended, however, that, as the entry of the judgment was made on that date nunc pro tunc as of July 10, 1871, the latter must be considered as the effective date of the judgment for all purposes. We are not, however, of that opinion. The date of that entry is by a fiction of law made and considered to be the true date of the judgment for one purpose only, and that is to bind the defendant by the obligation of the judgment entered as of a date when he was in full life; but the right of the complainant in this bill to enforce that judgment by the present proceeding certainly did not begin until after the judgment in that form was actually entered. Until that time the right was in abeyance; the litigation had, until then ended, been continuously in progress. It cannot be that the Statute of Limitations will be allowed to commence to run against a right until that right has accrued in a shape to be effectually enforced.

In Tapley v. Goodsell, 122 Mass. 176, it was held that a judgment entered nunc pro tunc was the final judgment in the action, so as to charge sureties on an attachment bond, on whose behalf it was urged that they could not be considered in default by reason of not paying, for thirty days after its date, the amount of a judgment which had no actual existence until long after the thirty days had expired. And it was there pointed out that a judgment may have effect from one date for one purpose and from another date for another purpose. As in the case of judgments at common law, which had relation to the first day of the term, so as to bind the lands of the debtor of which he was then seised, even though he had aliened them bona fide before judgment actually signed and execution issued; and the statute (29 Car. II, c. 3, §§ 13-15), providing that, as against bona fide purchasers, they should be deemed judgments only from the time when they were actually signed, did not restrict their validity or effect, in law or equity, by relation to the first day of the term, as against the debtor or other persons. Odes v. Woodward, 2 Ld. Raym. 766; S. C. 1 Salk. 87; Robinson v. Tonge, 3 P. Wms. 398.

It follows, therefore, that, if this were a suit brought in a state court of Minnesota under the statute in question, it would not be barred by the limitation sought to be applied. Whether that statute has any application to this bill in equity, filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, by a citizen of another State, is a question which need not be considered or decided. It is enough to say that the right of the complainant is not barred by force of the state statute, and that, according to the principles of equity, there has been no such voluntary delay as would make his claim stale. On the contrary, the complainant has shown himself to be diligent, active and eager in the prosecution of his claim and the pursuit of his remedy. He has been guilty of no laches; the delay has been caused by the action of his adversaries, or by the necessary delays of litigation. He is an unpaid creditor of Gordon's estate, who has sought by every means in his power, both at law and in equity, to obtain satisfaction of a just claim The defendants are shown to be in possession of the assets of Gordon's estate, which ought to have been applied in its satisfaction: they should be held as trustees for that purpose.

Such was the decree of the Circuit Court, which is hereby affirmed.

Removal of causes—prejudice or local influence—citizenship.

A suit cannot be removed under subsection 3 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes on the ground of "prejudice or local influence," unless all the plaintiffs or all the defendants are citizens of the State in which it was brought, and of a State other than that of which those petitioning for the removal are citizens.

Submitted Dec. 13, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from decision of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, remanding to state court cause removed thence. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Rouse and William Grant, for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas J. Semmes and Robert Mott, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The order remanding this case is affirmed.

A suit cannot be removed from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States under subsection 3 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes on the ground of "prejudice or local in- [587] fluence," unless all the plaintiffs or all the defendants are citizens of the State in which the suit was brought, and of a State other than that of which those petitioning for the removal are citizens. Here it appears that Hancock, the plaintiff, on whose petition the removal was had, is a citizen of New York; and Eliza Jane Holbrook and George Nicholson, two of the defendants, and those principally interested in the litigation, citizens of Mississippi; while R. W. Holbrook and Richard Fitzgerald, the other defendants, are alone citizens of Louisiana, where the suit was brought. These Louisiana defendants are necessary parties to the suit, but, according to the record, those who are citizens of Mississippi are the real parties in interest.

[664] STEWART HARTSHORN, Appt.,

v.

SAGINAW BARREL COMPANY ET AL.

Validity of reissued letters patent, and original letters—improvements in shade rollers—infringement—mistake—abandonment.

1. Where, through the mistake of their common solicitor, one of two inventors secured a patent covering an invention of which the other was the first inventor, and the latter secured a patent limiting his claim to his particular form of the device, it is held that reissues, in which the mistake is corrected by an exchange of claims, obtained more than nine years after the issue of the original patents, are invalid; the first, because the original was invalid, and the second, because the patentee's long acquiescence amounts to an abandonment.

2. The first claim of reissued letters patent No. 7367, for an improvement in shade rollers—the invention claimed in the original patent—is invalid.

3. Reissued letters patent No. 7370, also for an improvement in shade rollers, is invalid for want of novelty, there being nothing novel either in the panel or ratchet, or the mode in which they jointly co-operate to produce the desired result.

4. In the construction of letters patent No. 69189, also for an improvement in shade rollers, the claims must be confined, by reference to the specification, to the use of the devices named in a shade roller, where the pawl or detent is upon the roller, moving with it, and the ratchet, or engaging part, is separated by being placed upon a journal box or bracket, or other fixed part of the mechanism, and that it must also be limited to the particular form of the arm or detent described. Said patent is not infringed by a panel and ratchet of a different form, both being upon one end of the roller.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James T. Law and S. D Law, for appellant:

The statute only requires that the reissue shall be "for the same invention," and does not, directly or by implication, impose any condition that the description or claims should be the same in the reissue as in the original.

"The specification may be amended so as to make it more clear and distinct; the claim may be modified so as to make it more conformable to the exact rights of the patentee, but the invention must be the same. * * * The danger to be provided against was the temptation to amend a patent so as to cover improvements which might have come into use, or might have been invented by others, after its issue."

Rich v. Close, 4 Fish. 279.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court dismissing the complainant's bill, which was a bill in equity for the purpose of enjoining the alleged infringement of three several letters patent for improvements in shade rollers, designated as follows: 1. Reissued patent No. 7370, dated October 31, 1876, granted to the complainant, called the Hartshorn reissue. 2. Reissued patent No. 7367, dated October 31, 1876, granted to the complainant as assignee of William Campbell, called the Campbell reissue. 3. Patent No. 69189, dated September 24, 1867, [665] granted to Jacob David, and assigned to the complainant, called the David patent.

The questions in the case involve the validity of the reissued patents and the alleged infringement of the David patent. The Hartshorn re-issue was the reissue of original letters patent No. 68502, dated September 3, 1867. The Campbell reissue was the reissue of original letters patent No. 69176, dated September 24, 1867. In each case there was, therefore, a delay of about nine years in obtaining the reissue.

In order to understand and resolve the questions arising in the case it will be necessary to consider the state of the art at the time of the issue of the patents. This may be briefly stated as follows: The inventions in question are in that class of shade rollers which are rolled up by the unwinding of a coiled spring; the roller was hollow and the spring placed within it, one end being attached to the roller and the other end to the shaft or rod on which the roller revolved. Sometimes this rod passed entirely through the roller, and sometimes only partially through. As the curtain was drawn down the spring was wound up, and when the tension upon the curtain was released and the curtain allowed to roll up, the spring was unwound, thereby producing the desired result. The upward movement of the curtain was controlled by a pawl and ratchet at one end of the roller, the pawl or the ratchet being attached to the bracket. The pawl might be operated by a cord hung at the side of the window; by pulling down on this cord the pawl was disengaged from the ratchet, and the curtain immediately rolled up under the action of the spring. Hartshorn, the appellant, obtained a patent, not in controversy in this suit, but to be considered in reference to the state of the art, dated October 11, 1864. The invention described in that patent consisted in the application of a pawl and ratchet or notched hub arranged in such a manner that the shade may be stopped and retained at any desired height or point within the scope of its movement by a single manipulation of the shade, the usual cord for operating or turning the shade roller being dispensed with entirely, as well as counterpoises, which had in some instances been employed, in connection with spring rollers, for holding the shade at [666] the desired point. He made a ratchet with two notches, one on each side in the periphery of the ratchet wheel, and constructed a pawl to engage with such notches. The pawl was on the bracket, and the ratchet was on the roller. When the curtain was drawn down the spring in the roller was wound up, and when the curtain was released, while the pawl rested on the perimeter of the ratchet wheel, the curtain would roll up, and continue so to do as long as the velocity of the curtain was sufficient to carry the notches in the ratchet past the pawl before it could fall into them.

Such was the condition of the art when Campbell obtained his original patent dated September 24, 1867. He described his invention as having "for its object to furnish an improved device, by means of which the spring roller of a window shade may be made to hold the shade stationery at any desired elevation, and yet allow the same to be drawn down or run up, without obstruction or stoppage, as far as may be desired, and it consists in the combination of the loose or sliding pins or bolts, having heads formed upon them, with the flattened shaft of the roller, as hereinafter more fully described." The description, as contained in the specifications, is as follows, having reference to the annexed drawings: "A is the window shade. B is the hollow roller, one end of which is pivoted to the bracket C, and the other end of which revolves upon the shaft D, that carries the coiled spring, and the projecting end of which is secured in the jaws of the bracket E, so that, by drawing down the shade A, and thus revolving the roller B, the coiled spring may be wound closer around the shaft D. In the block, or part of the roller B that closes or forms the end of the said hollow roller B, and forms its bearing upon the shaft D, are formed two holes leading, upon opposite sides, from its outer or convex surface to a little at one side of its center, as shown in figure 2. The outer ends of these holes are countersunk, as shown. The two opposite sides of the shaft D within the block or part b' are flattened or notched as shown in figure 2. F are two pins or bolts, the bodies of which fit into the holes in the block b', and their heads fit into the countersunk parts of said holes. The bolts or pins F [668] are of such a length that when their heads rest against the case or shell of the roller B, their points may be free from the shaft D, and when their heads rest upon the bottom of the countersunk part of the said holes, their inner ends or points may overlap the flattened sides of the shaft D, so as to bind said shaft and prevent its revolution. Whenever the shaft D is drawn down or allowed to run up with a little rapidity, the centrifugal force engendered by the revolution of the roller B projects the pins F outward, so that their heads rest against the case or shell of the roller B, leaving the block b' free to revolve upon the shaft D, but when the motion of the roller B is checked, the pin F that happens to be uppermost drops down, so that its point or forward end rests upon the shaft D, and as soon as the said point reaches the flattened side of said shaft, it drops down a little further, so as to overlap the said flattened side of the said shaft and hold it securely in place.

"Having thus described my invention, I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent:

"The combination of the loose or sliding pins or bolts F, having heads formed upon them, with the flattened or notched shaft D, substantially as herein shown and described, and for the purpose set forth."

On the third of September, 1867, Hartshorn, the appellant, also obtained his original patent for an improved shade fixture. In that specification he describes his invention as relating "to a new and useful improvement in that class of shade fixtures in which the shade roller is provided with a spiral spring for automatically winding up the shade. The present invention is an improvement on a shade fixture of this class, for which letters patent were granted to me, bearing date October 11, 1864, and is designed to obviate an objection attending the original device, which consists in the unwinding of the spring whenever the shade roller is removed from its brackets or bearings, a contingency which involves the necessity of winding up the spring previous to the replacing of the roller in its bearings, and which cannot be done by an unskilled person without considerable difficulty." He then proceeds to describe in the specification, by reference to the [669] illustrations, the device which embodies this invention, and adds as follows: "The difference, however, between the within described arrangement and that of the original invention is essential. In the original plan, the spring unwinds immediately as soon as the roller is removed from its bracket or bearings, as the pawl, instead of being attached to the roller or any part connected therewith, is attached to the bracket, the notched hub being attached to the journal of the roller, and when the notched hub is removed from the pawl the spring immediately unwinds. In my present improvement the pawl and notched hub, being both connected with the roller, the spring is retained or prevented from unwinding equally as well when the roller is removed from its brackets or bearings as when adjusted in them." His claim is as follows: "The attaching of a pawl and a ratchet or notched hub to a window-shade roller, provided with a spring, or to parts connected with said roller, in such a manner that the tension of the spring will, without any manipulation or adjustment of parts whatever, always be preserved, whether the roller be fitted in the brackets or bearings or removed therefrom, substantially as set forth."

The principle embodied in the Hartshorn patent of 1864 was that of an automatic pawl or ratchet, or a pawl so constructed and arranged, with respect to the ratchet, that the pawl would be caused to engage with the ratchet to stop and hold the shade at any desired height or point, or would be prevented from engaging with the ratchet by merely varying the speed of the revolution of the roller, which was effected through the simple manipulation of the shade alone by the hand of the operator, the pawl engaging with the ratchet when the roller was revolved slowly, and not engaging when the roller was made to revolve quickly. He thus dispensed entirely with cords for operating the roller, and with counterpoises, and with the old spring pawl and ratchet which required the use of both hands in manipulating the roller and controlling the shade in its ascent under the force of the spring, as by its use the shade could be raised or lowered by the manipulation of the shade alone in the hands of the operator. In what was previously known as the coach fixture, it was necessary, while one hand of the operator lifted the pawl from the ratchet by means of the cord, [670] to hold the shade with the other hand, or else the shade would quickly fly up for its whole extent. The particular construction or arrangement of pawl and ratchet described by Hartshorn, in his patent of 1864, as his invention, consisted of a ratchet or notched hub on the end of the roller and revolving with it, and a pawl placed upon the bracket or stationary part of the fixture and dropping into the ratchet or notched hub by gravity. The pawl being mounted on a different part of the fixture from that on which the ratchet was mounted, the latter being on the revolving roller and the former on the stationary part of the bracket, it was the necessary result, from such a construction, that when the roller as a whole was removed out of its bearings there would be a disconnection and disengagement of the pawl and ratchet, and the spring would uncoil or run down, necessitating the winding up of the spring before the roller was again replaced in its bearings, which was a difficult thing to be done, particularly by those having the fixture in use. It was also inherent in the arrangement of the pawl and ratchet used in this roller —the pawl being stationary and resting on the upper side of the revolving notched hub or ratchet as the roller and its notched hub or ratchet revolved under the stationary pawl— that there would be more or less noise in its operation, caused by the notched hub striking against and throwing up the pawl.

It will, therefore, be perceived that the Hartshorn patent of September 3, 1867, and the Campbell patent of September 24, 1867, are for improvements upon the invention described in the Hartshorn patent of 1864, and in any comparison between the two former the invention embodied in the original Hartshorn patent of 1864 must be eliminated as common to both. The circumstances relied upon to justify and make valid the reissues in 1876 of the Hartshorn patent of 1867, and the Campbell patent of the same year, are conceded to be as follows: In 1873 a suit was brought in the District of Massachusetts upon the David patent by the Salem Shade Roller Co., then the owner of it, against one William G. Harris, who was selling [671] rollers made by Hartshorn, the present appellant, who assumed the defense of that suit. The rollers sold by Harris had the pawl arranged so as to move towards and away from the axis of the roller, as described and claimed in the David patent, but this pawl was different in form from that shown in the David patent, and engaged with the spindle instead of with the bracket. The transcript of the record in that suit is in evidence in this, and shows that it was made to appear, in the effort to fix the dates of the inventions described in the three patents of David, of Campbell, and of Hartshorn, that Campbell made his invention on the first of May, 1867, while Hartshorn was not able to fix the date of his invention as earlier than about the first of August, 1867. It was thus shown that while Hartshorn had the elder patent he was the junior inventor, and as the claim in the Hartshorn patent of 1867 covered the invention described in the Campbell patent, there was a conflict between the two which it was sought to reconcile by reissues, Hartshorn becoming the owner by assignment of the Campbell patent. Accordingly, in the reissue of the Hartshorn patent of 1867, made October 31, 1876, being one of the patents now sued upon, the patentee enters the following disclaimer. He says: "I do not claim generally the arrangement of both the pawl and ratchet upon or in connection with the roller, so that the roller can be removed from its brackets without permitting the spring to unwind, as I believe such an arrangement of pawl or detent and ratchet, as shown in the patent of William Campbell granted to him September 24, 1867, had been known previous to being made by myself." He then adds his claim, modified as follows: "In a spring shade roller having a pawl or detent and ratchet, or their equivalent, constructed and arranged so as to engage automatically for holding the shade at any desired point or height, the combination with a ratchet, or its equivalent, upon the stationary spindle or stationary part of the fixture, of a hinged or pivoted pawl placed upon the end of the roller and acting substantially at right angles to the ratchet or notched hub."

In the Campbell reissue of October 31, 1876, the claims are stated as follows:

[672] "1. In a spring shade roller, having a pawl or detent and a ratchet, or their equivalent, so arranged as to allow the shade to be drawn down or run up without obstruction, and which engage automatically with each other to hold the shade in any desired position, the arrangement of such pawl or detent on the roller which carries the notched spindle or ratchet, so that, when the roller is removed from its brackets, the tension of the spring will be preserved.

"2. In a spring shade roller, having a detent and ratchet, or their equivalent, constructed and arranged to engage automatically with each other for holding the shade, the combination, with the ratchet, or its equivalent, of a loose pawl or detent, moving in a chamber or guide, and adapted to engage with the spindle.

"3. The combination of the loose or sliding pins or detents F, constructed as described, with the flattened or notched shaft or spindle substantially as herein shown and described."

It thus appears that the third claim of the reissued Campbell patent of 1876 is identical with the entire claim of the original Campbell patent of 1867, the first and second claims in the reissued patent being entirely new.

In the original Hartshorn patent of September 3, 1867, he characterizes the invention as an improvement upon that contained in his patent of 1864, in this, that the pawl and notched hub, being both connected with the roller, the spring is retained or prevented from unwinding equally as well when the roller is removed from its brackets or bearings as when adjusted in them; and he states his claim as follows: "The attaching of a pawl and a ratchet or notched hub to a window-shade roller provided with a spring, or to parts connected with said roller, in such a manner that the tension of the spring will, without any manipulation or adjustment of parts whatever, always be preserved, whether the roller be fitted in the brackets or bearings or removed therefrom, substantially as set forth." This claim in the reissued patent of October 31, 1876, is changed so as to read as follows: "In a spring shade roller having a pawl or detent and ratchet, or their equivalent, constructed and arranged so as to engage automatically for holding the shade at any desired point or height, [673] the combination with a ratchet, or its equivalent, upon the stationary spindle or stationary part of the fixture, of a hinged or pivoted pawl placed upon the end of the roller and acting substantially at right angles to the ratchet or notched hub."

In the case of Hartshorn v. Eagle Shade Roller Co. et al. 18 Fed. Rep. 90, decided in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, the validity of the Campbell reissue of 1876 was questioned and affirmed. It appears also in that case that the original patent of Hartshorn of 1864 had been surrendered and a reissue obtained, No. 2756, August 27, 1867, being the same in evidence in this cause, for the purpose of showing the state of the art at that time. This reissue, No. 2756, was also questioned in the case just referred to, and held to be invalid, on the ground that the reissued patent extended the claim of the original patent, so as to cover a shade roller where the pawl and the ratchet are both affixed to the roller, so that the roller might be detached from the bracket without unwinding; and that, within the decision of Miller v. Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 [26:783], there had been an unreasonable delay in obtaining the reissue, amounting to laches. That reissue was accordingly held void, but the Campbell reissue of 1876 was held valid, notwithstanding the admitted enlargement of the claim and the delay in obtaining the reissue for nearly ten years. The ground of the decision was that the patentee did not discover until in 1874 that he was entitled to a priority of invention over Hartshorn, whose patent of 1867 covered the same claim. His solicitor, who was also the solicitor for Hartshorn, in obtaining the two patents, had assumed that Hartshorn was the first inventor, because his application was received first, and had framed the application of Hartshorn accordingly, and caused that of Campbell to correspond, limiting his claim to the particular form of the device, and granting to Hartshorn the broad claim now found in the Campbell reissue. This mistake seems to have been discovered, as already stated, by the taking of the testimony of the parties in the case of the Salem Shade Roller [674] Co. v. Harris, ubi supra, the proceedings and decree in which are in evidence in this cause. The reissue of both patents was applied for and obtained within two years after the discovery of this alleged mistake, and as the exclusive right to the invention was apparently covered by the claim of the Hartshorn patent of 1867, it was inferred and held by the learned Circuit Court of the Massachusetts District that there was no laches in the delay, and no evidence of an abandonment to the public of the invention. In the opinion of that court it is said (18 Fed. Rep. 92): "Campbell, misunderstanding perhaps his rights, or the true state of things, acquiesced through his solicitors, who were common to both parties, in the broad claim of Hartshorn. When the mistake was discovered, it was corrected by a simple exchange of claims. We are of opinion that, under these unusual circumstances, the lateness of the application is explained and shown to have been brought about by an actual mistake without fraud, and to have been one from which no innocent person could have suffered."

We are not satisfied, however, with either this reasoning or the conclusion. Campbell's acquiescence in Hartshorn's claim must be regarded, so far as he is concerned, as an abandonment of any right on his part to a patent for the same invention, and having deliberately rested in that acquiescence for a period of between nine and ten years, it is too late, according to the settled course of decisions in this court, to resume his rights. It is, accordingly, no answer to this view to say that, in the meantime, the invention was not dedicated to the public by Campbell's abandonment, because it was covered by Hartshorn's claim; for, according to the supposition, Hartshorn's was a false claim, and though it may not be regarded as [675] fraudulent, but founded upon an honest mistake, nevertheless the validity of his patent must have failed whenever called in question, and the facts were made known, as they did become known, in the suit against Harris. The mutual mistakes of the two parties cannot be considered as correcting each other. Hartshorn claimed an invention to which he now confesses he was not entitled, and for that reason his original patent was invalid. Campbell contented himself with the narrow claim originally contained in his patent of 1867, and thereby acknowledged that he was not entitled to the broader claim which he now asserts under his reissue. He had the means and the opportunity at the time the application for his original patent was pending to have asserted his claim to priority of invention; he chose not to do so. He acquiesced in the claim of his adversary; he cannot now claim what he then abandoned.

The question of laches is perhaps immaterial, for the reissue of the Campbell patent was not for the same invention described and claimed in the original. This does not rest merely on the enlargement and change in the nature of the claim. The specification itself was substantially altered. The alterations, it is said in argument, had the effect only of giving a more full, complete, and accurate description of the same mechanism; but, in point of fact, the alterations changed the shape of the specification in such a way as to admit the new and enlarged claim in a manner in which it could not have been made upon the original description. A comparison between the original and reissued patents shows that the specification of the latter has been materially changed so as to cover, as the invention of the patentee, that function of the structure by which the spring will be locked when the roller as a whole is removed from the brackets, in respect to which the original patent is entirely silent. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the first claim of the Campbell reissue, the only one alleged to be infringed in this case, is void.

We are also of opinion that the Hartshorn reissued patent, No. 7870, of October 31, 1876, is void on a different ground. That reissue disclaims what was claimed in the original patent, viz.: the arrangement of both the pawl and the ratchet upon or in connection with the roller, so that the roller can be removed from its brackets without permitting the spring to unwind, for the reason that such an arrangement had been previously invented by Campbell; and, instead of that claim, the reissued patent is confined to claiming "the combination with a ratchet, or its equivalent, upon the stationary spindle or stationary part of the fixture, of a [676] hinged or pivoted pawl placed upon the end of the roller, and acting substantially at right angles to the ratchet or notched hub." But, according to the admission of all the parties, Campbell was a prior inventor of the arrangement by which the pawl and ratchet were combined upon the roller in such a way as to allow the roller to be removed from its brackets without permitting the spring to unwind. Such a combination therefore was not the subject of a subsequent patent of itself, unless some additional novelty and utility were introduced into the combination by reason of some substantial change in the form or mode of operation of the parts. But in this reissued patent of Hartshorn there is nothing novel, either in the pawl or the ratchet, or the mode in which they jointly cooperate to produce the desired result. The fact that the pawl is described as acting substantially at right angles to the ratchet or notched hub does not seem to introduce any new or useful element. The combination covered by the claim in the reissued patent is, in law and in fact, merely a mechanical equivalent for that which was already covered by the Campbell patent, which had the priority of invention. For this reason, therefore, we hold the Hartshorn reissue of 1876 to be invalid.

It remains now only to consider the question of the alleged infringement of the David patent, No. 69189. The invention is claimed to have been made in December, 1866, though the patent was granted on September 24, 1867. It is for an improvement upon the original invention of Hartshorn, as described in his patent of 1864, and must be construed with reference to that. It seems to have had for its object to do away with the noise produced in the Hartshorn roller by the contact of the pawl with the ratchet. That objection to the Hartshorn roller, David says in his testimony, was what incited him "to invent something that would do away with the noise." He gave a new form to the pawl and ratchet used, and also shifted the ratchet from the roller and made it a part of the bracket, which was a stationary part of the fixture, and applied the pawl or engaging part to the revolving roller. His pawl was "an arm or detent," hinged or pivoted in a radial slot in, and arranged in the plane of the axis of, the roller; the free end of the arm projecting be- [677] yond the end of the roller, so that, as the latter revolved rapidly, the free end of the pawl or arm would be carried away from the axis of the roller by the motion of the roller itself. By this movement, when the roller was rapidly turned, sending the detent outward, it would pass over the elevated side of the journal box, which constituted the ratchet. When the roller moved slowly or was in a state of rest, the action of gravity brought the detent toward the center of the roller when the detent was above the center, and at such time the detent engaged the elevated side of the journal box or ratchet, and the revolution of the roller was arrested. His roller was also made of wood bored out at one end to receive the spring, and he placed at one and the same end of the roller the spring which caused the shade to rise, the stationary spindle to which one end of the spring was attached, and the arm or pawl, whereby he was able to saw off the other end of the roller to fit any width of window. As the pawl was on the revolving roller and the ratchet on the bracket, when the roller was removed from its brackets the pawl and the ratchet became disconnected, so that the spring would uncoil instead of holding the parts in place. The claims of the David patent are as follows:

"1. The arm or detent k, arranged upon the roller in such a manner that it moves toward and away from the center or axis of the roller a by the action of gravity and centrifugal force, substantially as described.

"2. The combination and arrangement, at the same end of a shade roller, of a spring, c, rod d, and arm or detent k, or their mechanical equivalents, substantially as described."

The device is illustrated by drawings accompanying the specification of the patent, as follows:

It is to be observed that in these claims nothing is said about the combination of the arm or detent k with the elevated side of the journal box, which is a distinct and separate part of the mechanism; and yet it is perfectly obvious that it is only in combination with that separate ratchet that the arm or detent k performs any useful function at all. The fact that the arm or detent k, arranged on the roller in the manner described, moves toward and away [679] from the center or axis of the roller in consequence of the motion of the roller itself, is not patentable independently of any useful combination in which it performs a necessary part. Any arm or detent, pivoted at one end and loose at the other, would necessarily follow the motion of the roller, the loose end flying outwardly. The same remarks apply to the second claim of the combination and arrangement of the roller and spring, the rod, and the arm or detent at the same end of the roller. They perform no function by reason of the circumstance of their being at the same end of the roller, except in conjunction with the ratchet on the bracket, and there is no novelty in such a combination and arrangement, as the same thing was found in the original Hartshorn patent. It follows, therefore, that in the construction of the David patent the claims must be confined, by reference to the specification, to the use of the devices named, in a shade roller, where the pawl or detent is upon the roller, moving with it, and the ratchet or engaging part is separated by being placed upon a journal box or bracket, or other fixed part of the mechanism, and that it must also be limited to the particular form of the arm or detent described. It follows from this that the shade roller manufactured and used by the defendants is not an infringement of the David patent. In the defendants' roller, the pawl and the ratchet are both upon one end of the roller, the pawl being upon the revolving part and the ratchet upon the fixed part of the roller, and the pawl and ratchet are of a different form from those covered by the David patent.

We hold, therefore, upon this part of the case, there was no infringement.

The decree below was therefore right, and is affirmed.

v.

JOSEPH B. SARGENT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 652–668.)

Reissued letters patent—improvement in door bolts—claims invalid as not for the same invention as original patent—laches in applying for reissue—rule as to diligence required.

1. The third and fourth claims of reissued letters patent, No. 9901, for an improvement in door bolts, with the corresponding alterations in the specification, constitute such an expansion of the original patent as to destroy its identity, and to that extent to avoid the reissued patent.

2. Said reissue as to said claims is also void because of the laches of the patentee and his assignee, in failing to apply for the reissue until more than two years after the issue of the original patent.

Argued Dec. 15, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry T. Blake, for appellant:

The neglect by a lawyer of his client's cause does not constitute unreasonable laches on the part of the client.

In Stutz v. Armstrong, 20 Fed. Rep. 843, it was held that nothing should be predicated against the inventor through the acquiescence of his solicitor in the rejection of the broad claim, when such acquiescence arose from the solicitor's misunderstanding of the nature of the invention; the inventor being of foreign speech, and so possibly "Not having been able fully to explain the matter."

Where some of the ingredients or devices are new, though claimed in a general combination only, if these new ingredients or devices are found described and clearly shown in the specifications, drawings or models of the original patent, such distinct inventions may be segregated from the combination and made the subject of a reissue "In order to give effect to the real invention."

Mr. John S. Beach, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellant to restrain the alleged infringement of the complainant's rights, as the assignee of Frank Davis, of reissued letters patent No. 9901, for an improvement in door bolts. The original patent was No. 202158, dated April 9, 1878. The application for the reissue was filed April 1, 1881, the reissued letters patent being dated October 18, 1881. The alleged infringement is of the third and fourth claims. As the case turns wholly upon the validity of the reissued patent it is important, for purposes of comparison, to set out the original and the reissue in parallel columns. So much of the original as is excluded from the reissue is marked in brackets, and the additions made by the reissue are in italics. They are as follows: [653]

Original.

"Specification forming part of letters patent No. 202158, dated April 9, 1878. Application filed January 29, 1878.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, FRANK DAVIS, of North Adams, in the County of Berkshire and State of Massachusetts, have invented certain new and useful improvements in door bolts; [and I do hereby declare that] the following is a [full, clear, and exact] description [of my invention, which will enable others skilled in the art to which it appertains to make and use the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, and to letters of reference marked thereon, which form a part of this specification.]

[This invention is an improvement] on letters patent [No. 190,561,] granted to [the undersigned] May 8, 1877.

The [nature of said] invention consists [chiefly] in combining a cylindrical outer casing with an inner [casing] constructed and recessed as hereinafter described, said [casings] combining to inclose the operating mechanism, and to form a fulcrum and guide therefor; [and] in combining with said [casings] a bolt, pitman, and [hub, so constructed and arranged as to operate in the same without pivot pins or any additional devices, all as] hereinafter more fully [described] and claimed.

In the accompanying drawings Fig. 1 [represents the device as a whole] in perspective. Fig. 2 [represents] a perspective view of the inner [casing and contents.] Fig. 3 is a [detail] view of the bolt [and its attachments]. Fig. 4 is a detail view of the inner [casing.] Fig. 5 is a detail view of the outer casing.

A designates a cylindrical metallic outer casing or sleeve, which is provided with opposite openings a a near its rear end, and with a hole a^1, for attachment by means of screw a^2 to inner casing B.

Reissue.

"Specification forming part of reissued letters patent No. 9901, dated October 18, 1881. Original No. 202158, dated April 9, 1878. Application for reissue filed April 1, 1881.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, FRANK DAVIS, of North Adams, in the County of Berkshire and State of Massachusetts have invented certain new and useful improvements in door bolts, of which the following is a description.

The improvements are on the door bolt, for which letters patent were granted to me May 8, 1877.

The invention consists in combining a cylindrical outer case with an inner [654] case, constructed and recessed as hereinafter described, said cases combining to inclose the operating mechanism, and to form a fulcrum and guide therefor; in combining with said cases a bolt, pitman, and crank; and in a pitman or connecting rod performing the functions of both pitman and spring, as the above are hereinafter more fully set forth and claimed.

In the accompanying drawings Fig. 1 shows the bolt in perspective. Fig. 2 is a perspective view of the inner case and portions of some of the working parts. Fig. 3 is a view of the bolt, spring, and crank. Fig. 4 is a detail view of the inner case, and Fig. 5 is a detail view of the outer case.

To enable others to make and use my improvements in door bolts, I will describe them in detail.

A, Figs. 1 and 5, is a cylindrical metallic outer case, having the holes a a near its rear end, and hole a^1, through which a screw, a^2, Fig. 1, passes into the inner case B, to hold the two cases together.

It is obvious that any [655] known equivalent fastening may be substituted for said screw. Said casing A is preferably a mere shell of steel, but both the material and thickness can be considerably varied without departing from my invention.

Inner casing B is of brass, cast iron, or other cheap metal, and has such diameter as allows it to pass readily into said outer casing or sleeve, and to be conveniently withdrawn therefrom. It is provided at the front end with a disk, which has a central opening, b, for the passage of the bolt, and an annular flange, [656] b^1, which prevents it from being forced back too far within said exterior casing. The bottom of said inner casing B has a broad longitudinal slot, b^2, extending from end to end, and communicating with a similar longitudinal slot, b^3, in the top of said casing B, which extends about two thirds of the length of said casing, beginning just behind said front disk. The interior of the forward part of said inner casing is thus entirely removed, leaving vertical walls b^4 b^4 on each side of the space thus produced. This space is separated by a transverse partition, b^5, from a transverse groove, b^6, in the bottom of which is a longitudinal slot, b^7. A transverse partition, b^8, at the rear of said groove and slot, forms part of the rear end of casing B, and has in its top screw-threaded hole or socket b^9, for the reception of fastening screw a^2.

C designates the door bolt, having guide pins c on its side, and near its rear end a recess, c', in which works the lower end of crank arm D', formed in one piece with flat hub D. Said lower end of crank arm D' is connected by pitman E to the front part of said bolt. Said hub D, when
'65. in position for use, extends up through said slot b^7, so that its square or similarly shaped central hole is in a line with transverse groove b^6 of inner casing B, and opposite holes a a of outer casing A. The prismatic shank of the key is passed through said holes and groove, and operated as usual to shoot or draw the bolt.

I do not confine myself to the exact details of construction shown, as these may be somewhat modified in various ways without departing from the spirit of my invention.

The working parts of my mechanism are more firmly secured and more perfectly protected than in my former patent, as hereinbefore recited. I also deem the shape of my new hub and crank preferable for practical working.]

Having [thus] described my [invention], what I claim as new, and desire to protect by letters patent, is—

1. The combination, with a door bolt and operating mechanism, of a cylindrical exterior [casing,] and a recessed inner [casing,] said [casings] combining to inclose the operating mechanism, and to form a fulcrum and guide therefor substantially as set forth.

2. The combination of [casing] A, having opposite holes a a, with inner [casing] B, having transverse groove b^6 and slot b^7, [flat hub] D, [having crank arm D,'] and the bolt and pitman, substantially as set forth.

[3. The combination of cylindrical outer casing A with inner casing B, having annular front flange b^1, side walls b^4 b^4, transverse partitions b^5 and b^8, transverse groove b^6, and slot b^7, said casings being securely fastened together and adapted to receive the bolt and working mechanism, substantially as set forth.]"

The inner cylindrical case, B, Figs. 2 and 4, is made to fit closely into the outer case, and has on its front end a disk in which is the central opening, b'. On its front end the flange b' is formed, against which the outer case comes. A slot, b^2, Fig. 4, extends from the disk on the front end the whole length of the case. Another slot, b^3, opposite the slot b^2, extends backward from the end disk, as shown in Fig. 4. These slots leave the parts b^4 b^4 of the inner case, as shown in Fig. 4. A groove, b^6, extends across the case between the parts b^5 and b^8 of the case. A longitudinal slot, b^7, bisects this groove and is cut through the case.

C, Fig. 3, is the bolt, made with the lugs c c, only one of which is used. The projecting end is round, the part within the case is rectangular, one of the narrower sides fitting into the slot b^2, and the other into b^3. Its rear end is made narrower and thinner to make room for the crank, as shown in Fig. 3.

The crank D is made in the usual form, and is arranged in a position to bring the hole through its larger end in line with the groove b^6 on the inner case and with the openings a a in the outer case.

The pitman and spring E, Fig. 3, is a straight hard-drawn wire, and is connected to the bolt and crank by suitable pivotal connections. As shown in the drawings, its ends are bent at right angles to its length and pass into holes in the bolt and crank, the spring being made long enough for the purpose. The lug c on the bolt is so arranged relative to the connections of the spring as to give it the required degree of tension or "set up," as it is called. The tension bends the spring over the lug c, as shown in Fig. 3. The key has its shank square to fit the hole in the crank, with a round part near the handle to turn in the case, as shown in Fig. 1.

Having described my improved bolt and its mode of operation, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is—

1. The combination, with a door bolt and operating mechanism, of a cylindrical exterior case and a recessed inner case, said cases combining to inclose the operating mechanism, and to form a fulcrum and guide therefor, substantially as set forth. [658]

2. The combination of case A, having opposite holes a a, with inner case B, having transverse groove b^6 and slot b^7 crank, D, and the bolt and pitman, substantially as set forth.

3. The combination of the bolt C, provided with the lug c, pitman E, operating as a pitman and spring, and crank D to hold the bolt, substantially as set forth.

4. In a cylindrical door bolt, the pitman E, arranged and adapted to operate as a pitman and spring, substantially as set forth."

It will be observed that the first and second claims of the reissued patent are substantially the same as the first and second claims of the original patent; but as there is no allegation or proof of any infringement by the appellee, of either of these, they may both be dismissed from further consideration. The third claim of the original patent is omitted from the reissue, its place being taken by the third and fourth claims of the latter. The whole question is whether the patentee and his assignee are entitled, under the circumstances of the case, to claim the pitman E, operating as a pitman and spring in a door bolt, as a distinct and separate invention, irrespective of its combination with the exterior and interior cases mentioned in the first and second claims. This right is affirmed by the appellant and denied by the appellee.

The invalidity of the reissued patent is maintained by the appellee on two grounds: (1) that the reissue embraces a different invention in the third and fourth claims from any described [659] or contained in the original specification; and (2) that, if it were otherwise, the patentee and assignee had, at the time of the application for a reissue, lost their rights to correct the defects in the original by their own laches. It was upon the latter of these grounds that the circuit court proceeded in dismissing the bill. The undisputed facts on this part of the case are stated by the circuit court in its opinion and are as follows:

"The inventor, a carpenter by trade and not an educated man, invented the device in November, 1877, and applied, in January, 1878, to Mr. Terry, a patent solicitor in New Haven, to procure him a patent, specifying, as the invention to be patented, the pitman, which, in connection with the crank, held the bolt and answered the double purpose of pitman and spring. Terry, being in ill health and therefore not then doing business, sent the case to his agent in Washington, with Davis' instructions. In due time the papers were returned to Terry and were signed by Davis, who read them and supposed that the application 'covered the spring which he intended to be patented.' Terry did not read the application. The patent was received by Davis in April, 1878. It does not appear whether it was then examined or not. The plaintiff did not see the patent until after it was assigned to him, on May 28, 1879. Whether he then read it or not he does not know; but in the latter part of 1880, after the defendant had begun to infringe, he did read it and supposed, from the drawings, that the pitman spring, as a separate invention, was secured by the patent, until he was undeceived by Mr. Terry. In the spring of 1878 the plaintiff received from Davis a license to use the pitman spring upon another than the patented bolt. In September, 1880, Sargent & Co. commenced work upon the patterns for the infringing bolt, and made the first bolts December 1, 1880." Ives v. Sargent, 21 Blatchf. 417.

The application for the reissue was not made until after the lapse of nearly three years from the date of the original patent; that is, from April 9, 1878, until April 1, 1881. It may be assumed, as the effect of the evidence, that [660] Davis in describing to his solicitor, Terry, the invention which he wished to have patented, specifically designated and described the pitman spring as his substantial invention, distinct from the combination of which it formed a part in the first and second claims of the patent. In his testimony on this point, in answer to the question, "What did you describe to him as the invention which you wished to have patented?" Davis states, "I explained to Mr. Terry that I had got the spring, answering for a spring and also for turning the bolt—a pitman spring. I didn't know the term at that time;" and also that he wished to have patented "this pitman spring, and this guard, lever, and that purchase it had in holding the bolt out or back; also, in moving the bolt out and back." Terry also, on the same point, says that Davis "brought the invention or bolt to me and stated that he wanted to get it patented. He also stated what his invention was, as he considered it, that he wanted patented, and the thing that he wanted patented particularly was the pitman or connecting rod, which answered the double purpose of pitman and spring, and in connection with the crank held the bolt when it was shoved out of the case and when it was drawn within the case." Terry also states that he sent "a letter of instructions with the model, setting forth Mr. Davis' wishes as he had expressed them to me." The specification, as prepared by the solicitor in Washington, was returned to Terry and by him exhibited to Davis, who signed the application, as he states, after he had examined it and supposed it to be right, "covering the spring which I intended to be patented." Mr. Terry states that he does not recollect whether he himself read over the specification and examined the claims at the time Mr. Davis signed the papers, or not. On this application the patent was issued, and it does not appear to have been read or examined by any of the parties in interest until after the appellee commenced making the bolts now alleged to be an infringement. It was then discovered for the first time that the original patent did not cover the claim as now made, and the reissue was obtained to effect that purpose.

It is admitted in argument by the counsel for the appellant that there was negligence; it is [661] contended, however, that it was not the negligence which in law is imputable to the patentee or the appellant, but the negligence of the solicitor employed by the patentee to obtain the patent. Counsel say, "It was the Washington solicitor's disobedience to instructions which caused the mistake, and Terry's neglect to revise the application before sending for Davis to sign it, which prevented its discovery."

The rule of diligence required in such cases, as the result of previous decisions of this court, is stated in Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96, 99 [29: 350, 351.] in these words: "It follows from this, that if, at the date of the issue of the original patent, the patentee had been conscious of the nature and extent of his invention, an inspection of the patent, when issued, and an examination of its terms, made with that reasonable degree of care which is habitual to and expected of men in the management of their own interests in the ordinary affairs of life, would have immediately informed him that the patent had failed fully to cover the area of his invention. And this must be deemed to be notice to him of the fact, for the law imputes knowledge when opportunity and interest, combined with reasonable care, would necessarily impart it. Not to improve such opportunity, under the stimulus of self interest, with reasonable diligence, constitutes laches, which in equity disables the party who seeks to revive the right which he has allowed to lie unclaimed from enforcing it to the detriment of those who have in consequence been allowed to act as though it were abandoned."

In Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354, 362 [28: 665, 668], it was stated that "If a patentee has not claimed as much as he is entitled to claim, he is bound to discover the fact in a reasonable time or he loses all right to a reissue; and if the Commissioner of Patents, after the lapse of such reasonable time, undertakes to grant a reissue for the purpose of correcting the supposed mistake, he exceeds his power, and acts under a mistaken view of the law; the court, seeing this, has a right, and it is its duty, to declare the reissue pro tanto void in any suit founded upon it."

662] It is also settled that while no invariable rule can be laid down as to what is a reasonable time within which the patentee should seek for the correction of a claim which he considers too narrow, a delay of two years, by analogy to the law of public use, before an application for a patent, should be construed equally favorable to the public, and that excuse for any longer delay than that should be made manifest by the special circumstances of the case. Wollensak v. Reiher, and Mahn v. Harwood [supra].

In the present case no special circumstances in excuse for the delay are alleged. The excuse proffered is simply an attempt to shift the responsibility of the mistake, as originally made, from the patentee to his solicitor; but no excuse is offered why the patentee did not discover the negligence and error of his solicitor in due time. On the contrary, he assumed, without examination, that the specification and claims of his patent were just what he had desired and intended they should be, and rested quietly in ignorance of the error and of his rights for nearly three years, and then did not discover them until after others had discovered that he had lost the right to repair his error by his neglect to assert it within a reasonable time.

We are therefore of opinion that the circuit court was clearly in the right in deciding the reissue void as to the third and fourth claims, on the ground that the right to apply for it had been lost by the laches of the patentee and his assignee.

We are also of opinion, however, that the reissue is void on the other ground; viz., that it contains new matter introduced into the specification, and that it is not for the same invention as that described in the original patent. In support of the reissued patent, on this ground, it is contended, on the part of the appellant, that the invention of the pitman-spring device is shown in the drawings, which are the same both in the original and the reissued patents. All that can be said in respect to the drawings is that they show the pitman-spring device as a part of the bolt intended to be covered by the patent, and described as a combination of which that device forms a part. There is nothing whatever in the drawings to [663] show that the patentee claimed to be the inventor of that part separate from the combination, as a distinct novelty, useful by itself, or in any other combination; neither is it so described in the specification. The operating mechanism of the bolt, as distinct from the casings, which are described as forming a fulcrum and guide to it, is described as "a bolt, pitman, and hub so constructed and arranged as to operate in the same (said casings) without pivot pins or any additional devices." It is argued, on this language, that the only additional device usual in such cases is a spring, and that, therefore, the meaning of the specification is that no separate spring was required, and from that the inference is to be made that the pitman should operate both as a pitman and a spring; but this inference is entirely too obscure and remote. It is not obvious that the additional device referred to was a spring, and there is nothing in the language to suggest, what is clearly and fully expressed in the amended specification, that "the pitman and spring E, figure 3, is a straight, hard-drawn wire, and is connected to the bolt and crank by suitable pivotal connections." So that in the original description there is nothing to show of what material the pitman is made so as to operate as a spring, and there is no assertion in it of its performing the double function of pitman and spring.

In this view, therefore, the case comes within the rule as stated in Coon v. Wilson, 113 U. S. 268, 277 [28: 933, 966]. There, as here, the lapse of time and laches based upon it were considered immaterial, because the reissued patent was for a different invention from that described in the original. "The description had to be changed in the reissue, to warrant the new claims in the reissue. The description in the reissue is not a more clear and satisfactory statement of what is described in the original patent, but is a description of a different thing."

We are therefore constrained to the conclusion that the addition of the third and fourth claims, with the corresponding alterations in the specification, is such an expansion of the invention as originally described as to destroy its identity, and to that extent to avoid the reissued patent.

For these reasons, the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

v.

NEW YORK, NEW ENGLAND AND WESTERN INVESTMENT COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 696-702.)

Contract—construction of—suit for commissions on sale of railroad—review of evidence—instruction to find for defendant, sustained.

In an action by a representative of the defendant Company to recover commissions on the sale of a railroad, this court holds, upon a review of the entire evidence, that the business did not originate in the territory controlled by the plaintiff and included within his contract; that he is not entitled to recover, either under his contract or the common counts, and that the court below properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Argued Dec. 17, 20. 1886. Decided Jan. 17, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William Warren Vaughan and Robert Dickson Smith, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Hugh Porter, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by the plaint-ill in error a citizen of Massachusets, against the defendant in error, in the Supreme Judicial Court of that State for the County of Suffolk, and removed by the defendant, a corporation and citizen of the State of Illinois, into the Circuit Court of the United States for that District. The New York, New England and Western Investment Company is a corporation chartered by the State of Illinois under the name of the Edgar County Land and Loan Company, its name having been subsequently changed. It has an authorized capital stock of $100,000, subject to be increased to $200,000. Its powers were conferred by the third section of an Act approved March 8, 1867, which reads as follows:

"Section 3. The said Corporation shall have power to borrow money and to receive money in deposit and pay interest thereon, and to loan money within or without this State at any rate of interest not exceeding that now or hereafter allowed by law to private individuals, and to [697] discount loans; and in computation of time thirty days shall be a month and twelve months a year; and to make such loan payable either within or without this State, and to take such securities therefor, real and personal, or both, as the directors and managers of said Corporation shall deem sufficient, and may secure the payment of such loans by deeds of trust, mortgages, or other securities, either within or without this State; may buy and sell negotiable paper or other securities; may open and establish a real estate agency; may purchase and sell real estate, and shall have power to convey the same in any mode prescribed by the by-laws of such Corporation; may accept and execute all such trusts, whether fiduciary or otherwise, as shall or may be committed to it by any person or persons, or by order of any court or tribunal or legally constituted authority of the State of Illinois, or of the United States, or elsewhere; may make such special regulations in reference to trust funds, or deposits left for accumulation or safe keeping, as shall be agreed upon with the depositors or parties interested, for the purpose of accumulating or increasing the same; may issue letters of credit and other commercial obligations, not, however, to circulate as money, and may secure the payment of any loan made to said Company in any way the directors may prescribe."

The home office of the Company was at Chicago, but a branch was established in New York City, which became, and was at the time of the transactions in question in this suit, the main office at which its business was chiefly transacted. The Company also directed the establishment of branch offices at Philadelphia and Boston. The relation between the defendant and the plaintiff grew out of a contract entered into between them, having in view the establishment of the office in Boston. A contract in writing was entered into between them on the 17th day of December, 1879, the substantial parts of which are as follows: The plaintiff, Hubbard, agreed "to open and take charge of a branch office of said Corporation at Boston, Mass.; to devote his best energies and time to the interests of said Corporation, as far as may not be inconsistent with a due regard [698] for the interests of such legal clients as he may have from time to time, always considering his duties towards said Corporation as of the utmost importance; to use his best endeavors to place in New England, where it may be of greatest advantage to said Corporation, twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) of the capital stock of said party of the first part, and generally to do and perform (within his 'division,' so called,) all acts for the furtherance of the interests of said party of the first part as shall be consistent with honor, honesty, equity, and fair dealing."

On its part, the defendant agreed "forthwith to elect said party of the second part one of its directors, with the title of assistant vice president; to give said party of the second part the direction of said office designated as the Eastern Division, subject, of course, to the by-laws of said Corporation now in force or hereafter to be enacted; to furnish said office and its furniture, all the books, signs, circulars, and advertising, which said Corporation may require; to pay the salary of its book-keeper and of such other employés as may be deemed necessary and proper, and generally to pay the running expenses of said office; to pay to said party of the second part the sum of eighteen hundred dollars ($1,800) per year as 'salary,' together with all expenses of travel incurred by him on its behalf, and a further amount, as 'commissions,' to be determined as follows; to wit, all business originating in said 'Eastern Division,' which shall include the whole of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, or transacted at said Boston office, shall be 'valued' according to the amount of gross profit coming therefrom to said Corporation, or which can be rightfully claimed by it. After deducting from the aggregate of such profits for each year the sum of fifty-four hundred dollars ($5,400), plus the amount of book-keeper's salary said party of the second part shall be entitled to one third of the balance as commissions, as above. Settlement shall be made between said parties as often as once a month, said party of the second part becoming entitled to said 'commissions' pro rata as soon as the same shall have been earned and received, and shall exceed in the aggregate the amount of $5,400, plus salary of book-keeper, as above set forth, and shall be paid 'in kind.'

[699] "Said party of the first part shall favor as much as practicable said Boston office, to the end that parties within its precincts may deal directly with it. All legal services required by said party of the first part, for itself or others in suits or proceedings in court, or in the drawing of railroad deeds and mortgages, shall be entitled to extra compensation from said party of the first part."

It was also provided that "This agreement shall go into effect from and after the sale or purchase by said party of the second part at par of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) of the capital stock of said party of the first part and payment therefor, and shall be in force for one year, at the end of which time there shall be a general accounting together of said parties, and a new agreement may be made and entered into, if the mutual interests of said parties may so require."

This agreement went into effect, according to its terms, by the plaintiff taking and paying for $10,000 of its capital stock at par on the 24th of December, 1879. On the 5th of June, 1880, he was elected a director by the stockholders at their annual meeting in Chicago. The plaintiff opened in Boston the branch office contemplated, and performed all the services required of him during the year fixed by his contract; was paid his salary of $1,800, and reimbursed for all outlays, as provided in the contract of December 17, 1879, rendering monthly accounts to the New York office, as required, to which no objection was ever made; and, apart from the transaction here in question, there was no controversy as to his interest in any part of the gross profits arising under the contract.

It also appeared from the evidence—the whole of which is set out in the bill of exceptions—that, through a contract with the Kansas City, Burlington and Santa Fé Railway Company, of which W. H. Schofield was then president, the defendant had for sale certain bonds of that company, and, in order to place them before other railroads and investors, it had issued a circular, dated May 15, 1880, offering for sale these bonds, which were to cover not only the extension of that road to Burlington, Kansas, but also that portion of [700] the road already built from Ottawa to Burlington, and on this completed portion of the road of 45 miles there was already outstanding $600,000 of first mortgage bonds, which were to be taken up and canceled from the proceeds of the new bonds offered in this circular. One of these circulars was sent from the New York office to the plaintiff at the Boston office. A negotiation was commenced and carried on personally by J. C. Short, president of the defendant Company, with the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fé Railroad Company in interviews, some of which occurred at the office of the latter company in Boston. At some of these the plaintiff was present, at others not. At one of these interviews, on June 10, 1880, at which the plaintiff was not present, a preliminary agreement or memorandum between the parties was entered into, signed by the president of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company, the president of the Kansas City, Burlington and Santa Fé Railway Company, and Short, as president of the defendant Company. This memorandum contemplated the purchase by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company of the railroad of the Kansas City, Burlington and Santa Fé Railway Company, and, as a means of accomplishing that, the purchase of the mortgage bonds of the latter company with a view to a foreclosure of the mortgage and the reorganization of the company. This memorandum was supplemented by a subsequent agreement entered into on the 18th of June, 1880, to which the parties were the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company, the New York, New England and Western Investment Company, Alden Speare, Charles S. Tuckerman, and Lucien M. Sargent, the three last named to act as trustees to hold the bonds to be used in consummating the purchase. The object of this contract was to provide and declare the modes by which the property of the Kansas City, Burlington and Santa Fé Railway Company should be sold and delivered to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company, free from incumbrance, and contemplated the foreclosure and sale of the road for that purpose. The transaction was completed in accordance with the terms of the contract. It resulted in a gross profit to the New York, New England and Western Investment Company, as is alleged by [701] the plaintiff in his declaration, of $117,833.33, of which the plaintiff claims to be entitled to recover one third, on the ground that the business originated and was transacted and said contract was made in said Eastern Division or Boston office, and that the plaintiff himself procured, or was instrumental in procuring and carrying out, the same.

The cause was tried by a jury, when, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant, which was done, and a verdict rendered accordingly, and judgment thereon, to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The error assigned is in the ruling of the court in this instruction to the jury. The principal question, in our view of the case, is one of fact; it is whether, within the meaning of the contract between the parties, made December 17, 1879, the business in question, out of which these profits arose, originated in the Eastern Division, as therein described, or was transacted at the Boston office.

Upon a careful review of the entire evidence, giving to the plaintiff the benefit of all inferences which might reasonably have been drawn by the jury, we are of the opinion that the court below did not err in instructing the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. In our opinion, it clearly appears from the evidence, in which there was no conflict, that the business did not originate in the Eastern Division, and was not transacted at the Boston office. It would serve no useful purpose to go into any detail of the testimony, which, we think, admits of no different conclusion.

The plaintiff's declaration, in addition to counting on the special contract in writing, contained also common counts for work and labor done and services performed in and about the negotiation of the contract for the sale of the Kansas City, Burlington and Santa Fé Railway, under which a recovery might have been had, in the absence of a special contract, for the reasonable value of services as a broker, if any such had been performed; but in the present case no such recovery could be had, because it clearly appeared that whatever was done by the plaintiff in that behalf was done [702] under the special written contract, and not upon any implied contract for compensation.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

ARGUED AND DECIDED

IN THE

SUPREME COURT

UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1886.

Vol. 120.

UNITED STATES, Appt.
v.
F. M. SYMONDS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 46-51.)

Naval officers—executive officer of training ship entitled to sea pay—what is sea service—order of Secretary of Navy.

1. The Secretary of the Navy cannot diminish an officer's compensation, as established by law, by declaring that to be shore service which is, in fact, sea service.
2. The sea pay of officers of the navy under section 1556 R. S. may be earned by services performed in a vessel lawfully employed in active service in bays, inlets, roadsteads, or arms of the sea, under the general restrictions, regulations and requirements incident or peculiar to service on the high seas.
3. The executive officer of a training ship is entitled to sea pay while his vessel is anchored in a bay, subject to such regulations as would be enforced at sea.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. Compare the following case of United States v. Bishop, post, 558.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and F. P. Dewees, Assistant Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether certain services of the appellee, a lieutenant in the Navy of more than five years' standing, were performed "at sea," within the meaning of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes. That section provides as follows:

"The commissioned officers and warrant officers on the active list of the Navy of the United States, and the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, firemen, coal heavers, and employés in the Navy shall be entitled to receive annual pay at the rates herein stated after their respective designations: * * * Lieutenants, during the first five years after date of commission, when at sea, $2,400; on shore duty, $2,000; on leave or waiting orders, $1,600; after five years from such date, when at sea, $2,600; on shore duty, $2,200; on leave or waiting orders, $1,800."

By an order of the Secretary of the Navy, June 30, 1881, the officer commanding the United States Training Ship New Hampshire, then at Norfolk, Virginia, was authorized to enlist officers' stewards, cooks and servants, such as were allowed for a vessel with her complement of officers, the order declaring that her officers "will be considered as attached to a vessel commissioned for sea service, the same as other apprentice training vessels." On the first day of April, 1882, Symonds, in obedience to orders, assumed the post of executive officer of The New Hampshire, and thereafter discharged the duties of that position, which were similar to those performed by executive officers of cruising ships. He also discharged other duties of a character more exacting and arduous than those on board of any other class of naval vessels. There was no change in the nature of his services after he reported for duty as executive officer of The New Hampshire. He was required to have his quarters on board, to wear his uniform, to mess on the vessel, and was not permitted by the rules of the service to live with his family. When he reported on board that ship she was stationed at Narragansett Bay and, during most of his service thereon, was the flag ship of the training squadron. [48]

On the 7th day of July, 1882, the then Secretary of the Navy issued an order to the effect that "On and after the first day of August next, The New Hampshire, The Minnesota, The Intrepid and The Alarm will not be considered in commission for sea service." There was, however, no change in the status of the ship on or after August, 1882, her equipment and complement of officers being those of a cruising ship.

From April 1, 1882, to July 31, 1882, appellee was allowed sea pay, and commutation of rations at thirty cents per day; but from the latter date he was allowed only shore pay of an officer of his grade, without rations or commutation therefor.

This suit was brought by appellee to recover the difference between pay for sea and shore duty as regulated by section 1556 of the Revised Statutes.

Section 1571 of the Revised Statutes—which is a reproduction of the third section of an Act of June 1, 1860, increasing and regulating the pay of the Navy, 12 Stat. at L. 27—provides that "No service shall be regarded as sea service except such as shall be performed at sea, under orders of a department and in vessels employed by authority of law." It is not disputed that the services of Symonds were performed under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, and in a vessel employed with authority of law. If they were performed "at sea," his compensation therefor is absolutely fixed by section 1556. Does the statute confer upon the Secretary of the Navy, acting alone or by direction of the [49] President, the power to declare a particular service to be shore service if, in fact, it was performed by the officer "when at sea," under the orders of the department and on a vessel employed with authority of law? By the Navy Regulations of 1876, it was declared that "Duty on board a sea going vessel of the Navy in commission, on board a practice ship at sea, or on board a coast-survey vessel actually employed at sea, will be regarded by the department as sea service." (P. 85). Assuming that the first clause of that regulation contemplates services at sea under the orders of the department, in a vessel employed with authority of law, it is clear that all the different kinds of services described therein are services performed at sea in the meaning of section 1556. But they are to be deemed such, not because the Secretary of the Navy has announced that the department will so regard them, but because they are, in fact, services performed at sea, and not on shore. If the regulations of 1876 had not recognized services "on board a practice ship at sea" as sea services, the argument in behalf of the Government would imply that they could not be regarded by the courts, or by the proper accounting officers, as sea services; in other words, that the Secretary of the Navy could fix, by order, and conclusively, what was and what was not sea service. But Congress certainly did not intend to confer authority upon the Secretary of the Navy to diminish an officer's compensation, as established by law, by declaring that to be shore service which was, in fact, sea service, or to increase his compensation by declaring that to be sea service which was, in fact, shore service. The authority of the Secretary to issue orders, regulations and instructions, with the approval of the President, in reference to matters connected with the naval establishment, is subject to the condition, necessarily implied, that they must be consistent with the statutes which have been enacted by Congress in reference to the navy. He may, with the approval of the President, establish regulations in execution of, or supplementary to, but not in conflict with, the statutes defining his powers or conferring rights upon others. The contrary has never been held by this court. What we now say is entirely con- [50] sistent with Gratiot v. U. S., 45 U. S. 4 How. 80 [bk. 11, L. ed. 884], and Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S. 18 [25:538], upon which the Government relies. Referring in the first case to certain army regulations, and in the other to certain navy regulations, which had been approved by Congress, the court observed that they had the force of law. See also Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 181 [29:606]. In neither case, however, was it held that such regulations, when in conflict with the Acts of Congress, could be upheld. If the services of Symonds were, in the meaning of the statute, performed "at sea," his right to the compensation established by law for sea service is as absolute as is the right of any other officer to his salary as established by law. The same observations may be made in reference to the order of the Secretary of the Navy of July 7, 1882, which, without modifying the previous order that Symonds should perform the duties of executive officer of The New Hampshire, declared that that ship would not be considered as in commission for sea service after August 1, 1882. It does not appear that the Secretary had any purpose, by his order, to affect the pay of the officers of the ship as fixed by the statute. Other reasons doubtless suggested the propriety or necessity of its being issued. But his order is relied upon here as depriving Symonds of the right to sea pay after the date last named. For the reasons stated, that order could not convert the services of Symonds from sea services into shore services, if they were, in fact, performed when "at sea."

We concur in the conclusion reached by the court of claims; namely, that the sea pay given in section 1556 may be earned by services performed under the orders of the Navy Department in a vessel employed, with authority of law, in active service in bays, inlets, roadsteads or other arms of the sea, under the general restrictions, regulations and requirements that are incident or peculiar to service on the high sea. It is of no consequence, in this case, that The New Hampshire was not, during the period in question, in such condition that she could be safely taken out to sea beyond the main land. She was a training ship, anchored in Narragansett Bay during the whole time covered by the claim of appellee, and was subject to such regulations as would have been enforced had she been put in order and used for purposes of cruising, or as a practice ship at sea. Within the meaning of the law, Symonds, when per- [51] forming his duties as executive officer of The New Hampshire, was "at sea."

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
JOSHUA BISHOP.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 51, 52).

Naval officer of training ship, entitled to sea pay—what is sea service.

The executive officer of a training ship is held to be entitled to sea pay under section 1556, R. S., for service in New York Harbor, for the reasons given in U. S. v. Symonds, ante, 557.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

In connection with this case, see the preceding case of United States v. Symonds.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and F. P. Dewees, Assistant Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This case does not differ in principle from that of United States v. Symonds, just decided.

Bishop is now, and has been for more than four years, a Lieutenant-Commander in the Navy. By direction of the Secretary of the Navy, he assumed the duties of executive officer of the training ship Minnesota, on the 18th of April, 1884. During the period of such service that vessel was stationed in New York Harbor, cruising and moving about under her own power. Her machinery and equipment were kept in order, and she was perfectly seaworthy, capable, upon short notice, of being used in a protracted cruise.

The duties of Bishop, while such executive officer, were more arduous and confining than those of officers of similar grade upon vessels in foreign waters.

[52] For the reasons given in United States v. Symonds, we are of opinion that the services of appellee were, within the meaning of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, performed "at sea," and, consequently, it was rightly adjudged in the court below that he was entitled to sea pay, as established for officers of his grade, during the period of his service on The Minnesota.

Judgment affirmed.

[52] UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
HENRY R. PHILBRICK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 52-59.)

Statute, repeal of—restoration of former law by—order of Secretary of Navy relating to commutation of quarters, etc.—validity of—contemporaneous official construction of statutes.

1. Where an Act of Congress simply removes a prohibition contained in a former Act, the effect is, without formal words for that purpose, to restore the law as it was before the passage of said Act.

2. In case of doubt the contemporaneous construction of a statute by officers charged with its execution is entitled to great weight.

3. This court refuses, at this late day, to question the validity of the order issued by the Secretary of the Navy May 12, 1866, relating to the commutation of quarters, furniture, lights, fuel, etc., such order being in accordance with the former construction placed by the Executive Department upon the various Acts relating to the naval establishment, and defining the powers of the Secretary of the Navy.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and F. P. Dewees, Assistant Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

[53] Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Philbrick, having served as a carpenter in the Navy from July 8, 1861, to March 14, 1866, and again continuously after November 12, 1869, filed with the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury his claim for the benefits of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1883, providing, among other things, that "All officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous, and in the regular Navy, in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service." 22 Stat. at L. 478. The claim having been passed by the Fourth Auditor, was forwarded to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, who is the reviewing officer charged with the examination of all accounts of this class. The latter officer, while recognizing that the appellee had a valid claim under the Act of 1883, deducted from the amount which the Fourth Auditor had ascertained to be due the sum of $214.88. That amount was made up of two items, $169.50 and $45.38.

In respect to the item of $169.50—which is the only one disputed on this appeal — the Second Comptroller held that that sum had, by mistake of law, been improperly allowed and paid to appellee for commutation of quarters, furniture, lights and fuel from November 12, 1869, to July 1, 1870, although such payment was in conformity with a general order, issued by the Secretary of the Navy on the 12th of May, 1866, in reference to allowance to officers in that branch of the public service.

It is, however, insisted, on behalf of the United States, that that order was unauthorized by law and void and, consequently, that the amount allowed under it to appellee was properly chargeable against his claim for pay under the Act of 1883. [54]

So far as we are aware, the first Act of Congress providing for special allowances or compensation to officers, seamen, and marines beyond their regular pay, was that of April 18, 1814. The second section of that Act authorized the President "to make an addition, not exceeding 25 per cent, to the pay of the officers, midshipmen, seamen, and marines, engaged in any service, the hardships or disadvantages of which shall, in his judgment, render such addition necessary." 3 Stat. at L. 136, chap. 84. That section was, however, repealed by the Act of February 22, 1817. 3 Stat. at L. 345, chap. 13. The reasons which led to the withdrawal of this power from the President are not disclosed in any public document to which our attention has been called. The practice which prevailed in the Navy Department for many years after the passage of the Act of 1817, in reference to special allowances to or for the benefit of naval officers beyond their regular pay—of which practice Congress was fully informed—tends to show that the repeal of the Act of 1814 was not intended as a prohibition of allowances of every kind. In the Rules, Regulations, and Instructions prepared by the Board of Navy Commissioners, with the consent of the Secretary of the Navy, and published in 1818,—a copy of which was transmitted to Congress by President Monroe on the 20th of April of that year (American State Papers, Class VI, Naval Affairs, p. 510), will be found provisions for certain allowances, graduated according to the character of the vessel or the rank of the officer in charge. In the "Rules of the Navy Department Regulating the Civil Administration of the Navy Department," prepared under the supervision of Secretary Woodbury, and by him published in 1832 in what is known as the "Red Book," are provisions in reference to allowances for cabin furniture, chamber money, furniture of officers' houses at yards, fuel, lights, servants, etc. Chap. 10. Besides, the Naval Appropriation Acts, for many years before and after 1832, contained items in gross for all the objects covered by [55] these allowances; but none of them contained directions as to the manner in which the sums appropriated should be apportioned. The absence of such directions was no doubt due to the fact, known to Congress, that the amounts annually appropriated were used or apportioned by the Navy Department as indicated in the rules prescribed by the Secretary.

That these allowances were habitually made, and that Congress was aware of this practice, appears from a report to President Monroe by the Secretary of the Navy, transmitted to Congress on the 4th of March, 1822. That report was accompanied by a statement showing the number and grade of the officers attached to each navy yard or station, with the amount allowed each for pay, subsistence, emoluments or extra compensation. The Secretary in his report says: "The allowances to officers attached to the navy yards have, I understand, been made to them since the commencement of these establishments, and vary in some instances, according to the expense of living, house rent, etc., in the different places at which they are located. The pay and rations, authorized by law to officers, are understood to be for their maintenance on board ship, in which they are accommodated with rooms, fuel, candles, etc.; but when placed on shore at naval stations they have not such accommodations. * * * The allowances now made are regulated by a table, making them all equal, or as nearly so as practicable. * * * The allowances have, in most instances, been made by the auditor in the settlement of accounts without any reference to this department, he considering himself authorized so to do by the usage of the service from the commencement of the naval establishment, with the approbation and sanction of the Secretary of the Navy." Am. State Papers, Class VI, Naval Affairs, Vol. 1, p. 797. The subject was subsequently brought to the attention of Congress by the report of the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate, January 1,1825 (Am. State Papers, Naval Affairs, Vol. 2, p. 40); by the letter of the Secretary to the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, February 2, 1826 (Id. p. 626); by the communication of [56] the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, May 28, 1830, which was transmitted to Congress (Id. Vol. 3, p. 685), the latter being accompanied by a table showing every kind of allowance made under the regulations and orders of the Navy Department. The same facts are disclosed by the report of Amos Kendall, the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, February 5, 1835, to the Secretary of the Navy, and transmitted by the latter to the House of Representatives in conformity with a resolution of that body. The latter report embodies a statement, in detail, showing the regular pay, rations and allowances of all commissioned officers of the Navy, according to the laws and regulations then in force. Exec. Doc. 192, H. of Rep. Navy Dept. 23d Cong. 2d Sess.

Thus matters stood until the passage of the Act of March 3, 1835, regulating (and increasing) the pay of the Navy, by which allowances of every description were prohibited. The second section of that Act provided that "No allowance shall hereafter be made to any officer in the naval service of the United States for drawing bills, for recovering or disbursing money or transacting any business for the Government of the United States; nor shall he be allowed servants, or pay for servants, or clothing or rations for them, or pay for the same; nor shall any allowance be made to him for rent of quarters, or to pay rent for furniture, or for lights, or fuels, or transporting baggage. It is hereby expressly declared that the yearly allowance provided in this Act is all the pay, compensation and allowance that shall be received under any circumstances whatever, by any such officer or person, except for traveling expenses when under orders, for which ten cents per mile shall be allowed." 4 Stat. at L. 757.

This prohibition of allowances continued in force until the Act of April 17, 1866, making appropriations for the naval service. The second section of that Act provided "That so much of the second section of an Act, entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Pay of the Navy of the United States,' approved March 3, 1835, as prohibits any allowance to any officer in the naval service for rent of quarters, or for furniture, or for lights or fuel, or transporting baggage, and all Acts or parts of Acts authorizing the appointment of navy agents be and the same [57] are hereby repealed." 14 Stat. at L. 38, chap. 45.

After the passage of that Act Secretary Welles issued the order which the Government now assails as unauthorized by law. It is as follows:

"[General Order, No. 75.]

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 28, 1866.

"Congress having, in view of the call for increased compensation for officers of the Navy, repealed the law which prohibited any allowance to them 'for rent of quarters or to pay rent for furniture, or for lights and fuel, etc.' the Department, in order to prevent a recurrence of the irregularities, abuses and arbitrary allowances which occasioned the prohibition, deems it proper to establish a fixed rate of compensation in lieu of the extra allowances which were prohibited by the law now repealed. Accordingly, from and after the first day of June proximo, officers who are not provided with quarters on shore stations will be allowed a sum equal to thirty-three and one third per centum of their pay in lieu of all allowances, except for mileage or traveling expenses under orders; and those provided with such quarters, twenty per centum of their pay in lieu of said allowances.

"The Act of March 3,1865, having increased the pay of midshipmen and mates, the allowances hereby authorized will not be extended to them.

"GIDEON WELLES.
Secretary of the Navy"

This order was, no doubt, issued in the belief that the legal effect of the repeal of that part of the Act forbidding allowances "for rent of quarters, or for furniture, or for lights, or fuel, or transporting baggage," was to reinvest the department with the authority it had prior to the Act of 1835. That Act, upon its face, recognized the fact that such allowances had theretofore been made, and its object was to forbid them in the future. When the Act of 1866 simply removed the prohibition contained in [58] the Act of 1835, the effect was, without formal words for that purpose, to restore the law as it was before the passage of the latter Act. Such is the rule where the effect of the repealing statute is not by its own terms, or by some general statute, limited to the abrogation of the Act repealed. 1 Bl. Com. 90; 1 Kent, 460; Bouvier's Bacon's Abridgment, title, Statute, D; Commonwealth v. Churchill, 2 Met. 122; Van Denburgh v. Village of Greenbush, 66 N. Y. 4. The general rule was never modified by Congress until the passage of the Act of February 25, 1871, now section 12 of the Revised Statutes, which declared that "Whenever an Act is repealed which repealed a former Act, such former Act shall not thereby be revived, unless it shall be expressly so provided." 16 Stat. at L. 431, chap. 71. It is scarcely necessary to say that the Act of 1871 cannot control the present case, for the order of Secretary Welles, and the settlement under it with Philbrick, both occurred before its passage. And for the same reason this case is unaffected by the fourth section of the Act of July 15, 1870, (now § 1558, of the Revised Statutes), which provides that the pay prescribed therein for officers of the Navy shall be their full and entire compensation, and that (with certain exceptions not material to be here noticed) "No additional allowance shall be made in favor of any of said officers on any account whatever, and all laws or parts of laws authorizing any such allowances shall on 1st of July, 1870, be repealed." 16 Stat. at L. 332, chap. 295.

Notwithstanding the order of Secretary Welles was in harmony with the long-established practice of the Navy Department for many years prior to the passage of the Act of 1835, it is contended that such a practice never has had support in an Act of Congress, and that, without legislative sanction, the Secretary of the Navy was without authority to establish an arbitrary rule for the distribution of moneys appropriated in gross for specified objects connected with the naval service, and could, in no event, make allowances beyond the actual cost incurred by the officer in whose behalf they were made. It is a sufficient answer to these propositions to say that the power of the Secretary to establish rules and regulations for the ap-[59] portionment of the sums set apart by Congress, in gross, for such objects as those involved in the allowances here in dispute, having been frequently exercised prior to 1835, without objection by the legislative branch of the Government; and since that Act, as well as the one of 1866, is an implied recognition of the practice established in the Navy Department prior to 1835, we are not disposed, at this late day, to question the validity of the order of May 23, 1866. That order was in accordance with the construction which the Executive Department, for many years prior to 1835, placed upon the various statutes relating to the naval establishment and defining the powers of the Secretary of the Navy. A contemporaneous construction by the officers upon whom was imposed the duty of executing those statutes is entitled to great weight; and since it is not clear that that construction was erroneous, it ought not now to be overturned. See Hahn v. U. S. 107 U. S. 405 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 528], and Brown v. U. S. 113 U. S. 571 [28: 1080], and authorities cited in each case.

As these views lead to an affirmance of the judgment, it is unnecessary to consider whether, after the account of the appellee for commutation of quarters, furniture, lights and fuel, between November 12, 1869, and June 30, 1870, had been finally stated and closed, and after he had been paid the amount allowed him, the Second Comptroller had authority to open it upon the ground of error therein arising from mere mistake of law. Nor need we determine whether errors in accounts so stated, closed and settled by payment, could be corrected otherwise than by regular judicial proceedings, instituted for that purpose by the United States against the appellee.

Judgment affirmed.

Naval officers, graduated pay of—Acts relating to—construction of—credit of previous service.

An officer of the Navy is entitled to have his previous service credited to the lowest grade held by him after the Act of 1870 took effect, having graduated pay attached to it by that Act, and not to a lower grade which was not graduated, in respect to pay, until after he ceased to hold it.

Submitted Dec. 6, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty. Gen., and F. P. Dewees, Assistant Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Rockwell served in the volunteer Navy as Acting Master from July 15, 1862, to December 16, 1862; as Lieutenant from December 16, 1862, to April 29, 1865; as Lieutenant-Commander from April 29, 1865, to December 8, 1865, when he was honorably discharged; and as Acting Master from November 19, 1866, to March 12, 1868; in the regular Navy, as Master from March 12, 1868, to December 18, 1868; as Lieutenant from December 18, 1868, to February 26, 1878; and as Lieutenant-Commander from February 26, 1878, to March 3, 1883. He was paid for his services in those several positions in accordance with the laws in force at the time they were performed. But he claims, in this action, additional pay under the Act of March 3, 1883, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1884. 22 Stat. at L. 473, chap. 97. He obtained judgment, and upon this appeal the Government questions the construction placed by the court below upon that Act.

[61] The Act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, provides: "And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the Regular or Volunteer Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous, and in the Regular Navy; Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers." 22 Stat. at L. 287, chap. 391.

Very soon after the passage of that Act it became necessary for the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to determine, for his office, its full scope and effect. One James Nash had been appointed a boatswain in the Regular Navy on the 7th of May, 1867. Prior to that time, from July 30, 1862, to April 16, 1866, he served as master's mate and acting gunner. He claimed, under the Act of August 5, 1882, that, in ascertaining his rate of pay as boatswain, he should be credited with his former services as master's mate and acting gunner. As the pay of boatswain, prior to August 5, 1882, was fixed by the Revised Statutes (section 1556) at certain rates "during the first three years after date of appointment," and at certain other designated rates during the second, third and fourth "three years after such date," the Second Comptroller was of opinion that the services performed by Nash, in any other capacity than that of boatswain, could not be counted in determining his rate of pay even had such services been continuous and in the Regular Navy. And since that Act provided that officers should receive the credit and the benefit of services, "in all respects in the same manner as if all said services had been continuous and in the Regular Navy," that officer held that to credit Nash with the time of his service as master's mate and acting gunner would be inconsistent with those provisions of the statute fixing the salary of officers, and making the rate of pay dependent on the period of service in their particular grades. Senate Exec. Doc. 107, 48th Cong., 1st Session.

After this interpretation of the Act of 1882,
[62] Congress, in the Naval Appropriation Act of March 3, 1883, modified, in some degree, the principle upon which officers of the Navy should be credited with the time they served in the volunteer Army or Navy. The latter Act provides (the additions to the Act of 1882 being shown by italics) that "All officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the Regular or Volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service, in all respects, in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the Regular Navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service; Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer Army or Navy." 22 Stat at L. 473, chap. 97.

While Congress did not, by the last Act, give an officer in the Regular Navy additional pay "during the time of his service in the Volunteer Army or Navy," it did give him the benefit of previous service in either, as if all of such service had been continuously rendered in the Regular Navy "in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service." What, within the meaning of the statute, was the lowest grade having graduated pay held by Rockwell after he last entered the service? He re-entered the service as Master in the regular Navy on March 12, 1868. He was promoted to the position of Lieutenant on December 16, 1868. The positions of Master and Lieutenant did not, at either of those dates, have "graduated pay" attached to them. Their annual compensation was fixed by statute, and was not, during the period of his service as Master, or when he became a Lieutenant in the Regular Navy, subject to be increased by length of previous service in any particular grade. But, by the Act of July 15, 1870 (16 Stat. at L. 330, chap. 295, now section 1556 of the Revised Statutes), the pay for Lieutenants and Masters in the Navy was graduated according to the length of service in such positions. Under that Act, the salary of a Lieutenant, during the first five years after date of commission, when at sea, is $2,400; when on shore duty, $2,000; and when on leave or waiting [63] orders, $1,600. Masters, during the first five years from date of commission, are allowed annually, when at sea, $1,800; when on shore duty, $1,500; and when on leave or waiting orders, $1,200. In the case of each of those officers this annual salary, after the expiration of the first five years, is increased by $200 for the different kinds of service performed.

When the Act of July 15, 1870, took effect, Rockwell still held the position of Lieutenant. But at the passage of the Act of March 3, 1883, he was Lieutenant-Commander, the pay of which position was likewise graduated, by the Act of 1870, according to length of service. It thus appears that when the rule of graduated pay was applied by the Act of 1870, to Lieutenants, Masters, and other officers of the Navy, Rockwell held the position of Lieutenant. That was not the lowest grade held by him after "last entering the service;" but it was the lowest held by him after the pay of officers of the Navy was graduated by the Act of 1870, according to length of service. In other words: it was the lowest position held by him after that Act took effect. It seems to the court clear that the actual time of appellee's previous service must be credited to the grade of Lieutenant—that being the lowest grade held by him after the Act of 1870 took effect, having graduated pay attached to it by that Act—and not to the grade of Master, which, although the lowest held by him after last entering the service, was not graduated, in respect to pay, until after he had ceased to hold it. Such we understand to be the view taken by the court below.

That interpretation of the statute meets our approval and the judgment is affirmed.

[64] ST. TAMMANY WATER WORKS COMPANY AND CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Appts.,

v.

NEW ORLEANS WATER WORKS COMPANY.

Constitutional law—obligation of contracts, impairment of—exclusive right of the New Orleans Water Works Company, not affected by provision of State Constitution abolishing monopoly features of charters of corporations—such rights extends to water drawn from any source.

1. The provision of the Louisiana Constitution of 1879 abolishing the monopoly features in the charters of existing corporations, so far as it assumes to withdraw the exclusive privileges previously granted to the New Orleans Water Works Company, impairs the obligation of a contract and is void.

2. The exclusive right to supply the City of New Orleans and its inhabitants with water was not restricted to the water drawn from the Mississippi River, but embraced water drawn from any other stream.

3. Individual citizens cannot determine for the constituted authorities whether the public health would be better protected, or the public comfort subserved, by supplying other water than that from the Mississippi River.

[No. 74.]

Submitted Dec. 3, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. L. Hall, for the St. Tammany Water Works Company, appellant:

"It cannot be permitted that, when the Constitution of a State, the fundamental law of the land, has imposed upon its Legislature the duty of guarding by suitable laws the health of its citizens, especially in crowded cities, and the protection of their persons and property, by suppressing and preventing crime, that the power which enables it to perform this duty can be sold, bargained away, under any circumstances, as if it were a mere privilege which the legislator could dispose of at his pleasure."

Butchers Union Slaughter House etc. Co. v. Crescent City Live Stock etc. Co. 111 U. S. 746 (28:585), citing other authorities.

This litigation is between citizens of Louisiana, who framed the Constitution of Louisiana of 1879. What the Louisiana courts have decreed on the subject may be seen in New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refinery Co. 35 La. Ann. 1111, now on writ of error to this court.

Since this cause was tried in the circuit court, and since this appeal has been taken, the complainant has applied for, and obtained, most beneficial legislation from the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, convened under the Constitution of Louisiana of 1879. It has thereby accepted that Constitution in all its parts, including that which abolishes its own monopoly rights.

Messrs. J. R. Beckwith and E. H. Farrar, for appellee:

The facts in this case are substantially the same as in New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674 (29:525), decided at the last term of this court, the only substantial difference being that in Water Works v. Rivers, Rivers, a hotel keeper sought to invade the exclusive right of the New Orleans Water Works Company by laying a pipe to the Mississippi River, while the appellant company in this case organized under the general law of the State, and attempted to construct and operate a rival system of water works for the supply of the City of New Orleans, in competition with the appellee.

The appellee relies on Water Works v. Rivers as conclusive, and precluding any further discussion of the questions determined and settled in that case.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties to this appeal are corporations of the State of Louisiana. The New Orleans Water Works Company was created by a special Act of the General Assembly of Louisiana, passed March 31, 1877, and was given the exclusive right, for fifty years from the date of its charter, "Of supplying the City of New Orleans and its inhabitants with water from the Mississippi River, or any other stream or river, by means of pipes and conduits, and for erecting and constructing any necessary works or engines or machines for that purpose." It was vested with authority to construct canals and trenches for conducting "the water of the rivers from any place or places it may deem fit, and to raise and construct such dykes, mounds and reservoirs as may be required for securing and carrying a full supply of pure water to said City and its inhabitants," and "to lay and place [65] any number of conduits or pipes or aqueducts * * * through or over any of the streets of the City of New Orleans." It was required to proceed, immediately after its organization, in the "erection of new works and pipes sufficient in capacity to furnish a full and adequate supply of water, to be drawn from the Mississippi River, or elsewhere, as may be judged most expedient."

In New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 681 [29:527]—which involved the validity of a municipal ordinance granting to one Rivers the privilege of bringing water from the Mississippi River into his hotel, in the City of New Orleans, by means of mains and pipes laid in its streets—it was adjudged that so much of the Company's charter as gave it the exclusive privilege before mentioned was, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, a contract protected against impairment, in respect of its obligation, by that provision of the State Constitution of 1879 abolishing the monopoly features in the charters of all then existing corporations other than railroad corporations; consequently, that ordinance was void as interfering with the contract rights of the Company.

It was also decided that "The right to dig up and use the streets and alleys of New Orleans for the purpose of placing mains and pipes for supplying the City and its inhabitants with water is a franchise belonging to the State, which she could grant to persons or corporations upon such terms as she deemed best for the public interests;" and since "the object to be attained was a public one, for which the State could make provision by legislative enactment, the granting the franchise could be accompanied with such exclusive privileges to the grantee, in respect of the subject of the grant, as in the judgment of the legislative department would best promote the public health and the public comfort, or the protection of public and private property." But it was also decided that, notwithstanding the exclusive privileges granted to the Company, "the power remains with the State or with the municipal government of New Orleans acting under legislative authority to make such regulations as will secure to the public the uninterrupted use of the streets as well as prevent the distribution of water unfit for use, and provide for such a continuous supply, in quantity, as protection to property, public and private, may require;" and that rights and privileges arising from contracts with the State are "subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, in the same sense as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations."

The St. Tammany Water Works Company was organized in 1882, under the general laws of Louisiana relating to corporations. Its articles of association declare the object of its incorporation to be "To furnish and supply the inhabitants of the City of New Orleans and other localities contiguous to the line of its works with an ample supply of pure, clear, and wholesome water from such rivers, streams, or other fountain sources as may be found most available for such purpose," and to that end to lay pipes and conduits and construct and maintain such system of water works as may be required for the purposes of its organization.

This Company being about to take active steps to obtain authority for bringing into New Orleans the waters of the Bogue Falaya River in the Parish of St. Tammany, and distributing the same by means of pipes, mains and conduits placed in the streets of that City parallel with those constructed by the New Orleans Water Works Company, the present suit was brought by the latter Corporation for the purpose of obtaining an injunction against all attempts by the appellant, its agents and employés to infringe upon the exclusive privileges granted to the appellee. The answer admits the material facts alleged in the bill, but insists that the charter of the appellee, so far as it granted the exclusive privileges in question, could be set aside, repealed, or abolished by the State, or by the Legislature, or by the municipal government of New Orleans, in the exercise of police functions. The controlling question is as to the effect of the before-mentioned provision of the State Constitution upon the exclusive rights granted to the plaintiff by its charter.

As the exclusive right of the appellee to supply the City of New Orleans and its inhabitants with water was not restricted to water drawn from the Mississippi River, but embraced water from any other stream, it is impossible to distinguish this case in principle from that of the New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Rivers. Upon the authority of the latter case, it must be held that the carrying out by appellant of its scheme for a system of water works in New Orleans would be in violation of the rights of the appellee, and that the State Constitution of 1879, so far as it assumes to withdraw the exclusive privileges granted to the appellee, is inconsistent with the clause of the National Constitution forbidding a State from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

It is however contended, in behalf of the St. Tammany Water Works Company, that the water from the Bogue Falaya River is shown by the proof to be pure, uncontaminated by saline or organic matters to any appreciable extent, and to be more suitable for drinking, washing, cooking, manufacturing, and other purposes, than the water drawn from the Mississippi River and distributed through the City by the New Orleans Water Works Company. And upon these facts is based the suggestion that the people of New Orleans cannot be prevented, by the contract the appellee has with the State, from obtaining, through any lawful agency, such water as is most beneficial to their health or best adapted for business or public uses. Touching this and similar suggestions by counsel of the appellant, it is sufficient to say that no question arises in the present case as to whether the State or the municipal government of New Orleans may not, if the public health or the public comfort so require, compel the appellee, now having the exclusive right of supplying the City of New Orleans and its inhabitants with water distributed through pipes laid in the streets of that municipality (or if it refuses, employ other agencies), to supply water from some river or stream other than the Mississippi. No such action has been had either by the State or by the City, and, consequently, there was no substantial dispute between the plaintiff and the City. The latter has not given its assent to the use by the St.

[68] Tammany Water Works Company of the public streets for the distribution of water by means of pipes laid in them, nor has it, so far as the record shows, determined that the public health would be better protected, or the public comfort subserved, by supplying the people with water from the Bogue Falaya River rather than from the Mississippi River. These are matters which neither the appellant nor individual citizens may determine for the constituted authorities. In what mode such questions may be determined, so as to be binding upon the appellee, need not be considered until they actually arise in proper form.

The legal effect of the decree is only to prevent the St. Tammany Water Works Company, under any power it now has, from laying pipes, mains and conduits in and through the streets of New Orleans, for supplying that City and its inhabitants with water. It is, therefore, upon the authority of the former case. Affirmed.

[1] CHARLES MALI, Consul of His Majesty the KING OF THE BELGIANS, AND JOSEPH WILDENHUS ET AL., Appts.,
v.
THE KEEPER OF THE COMMON JAIL of HUDSON COUNTY, NEW JERSEY.

(See S. C. "Wildenhus' Case," Reporter's ed. 1—19.)

International law—Treaty between the United States and Belgium—a felonious homicide committed on board a Belgian vessel in a port of the United States, a subject of local jurisdiction—review of various treaties—general rule, independent of treaty—habeas corpus.

1. Under the present Treaty between the United States and Belgium, whereby each nation is granted such local jurisdiction over its merchant vessels while in the ports of the other as may be necessary to maintain order on board, and in which is reserved to each nation the right to interfere if the disorder on board of a merchant vessel belonging to the other while in its ports is of such a nature as to disturb the public tranquillity, a felonious homicide, committed on board of a Belgian vessel in a port of the United States, is held to be a subject for the local jurisdiction, such a crime being of a character to awaken public interest and to affect the public at large, although committed below deck and in the presence of none but members of the crew.

2. It seems that, if a person charged with an offense committed on board of such a vessel in a port of the United States is improperly imprisoned by the local authorities, he may enforce his rights under the Treaty by writ of habeas corpus in any proper court of the United States.

Argued Dec. 7, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. F. R. Coudert and Edward K. Jones, for appellants:

The jurisdiction of Belgium is exclusive under the general rules of international law.

The general rule is well established that the vessels of a nation are to be considered as a part of its territory, and the persons on board of them are deemed to be within the jurisdiction of such nation, and are protected and governed by the laws of the country to which such vessels belong.

Vattel, L. of Nat. book 1, c. 19, § 216; Wheat. Elements Int. L. 3d ed. 157; 8th ed. § 106; 1 Kent, Com. 26; Halleck, Int. L. 172, 178; Orapo v. Kelly, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 610 (21: 480); Re Ah Sing, 13 Fed. Rep. 286.

The general doctrine of international law is also in accordance with the established practice of the United States.

The action of our government, through its consuls at Antwerp and Marseilles, in the cases of The Newton and The Sally, in 1806, was soon afterwards followed by legislation affirming the principle of international law, declared and assented to by the two nations in those cases.

Act of March, 3, 1825, chap. 65; §§ 730, 5339, 5345 R. S.

Since the passage of the Act of 1825, numerous convictions have been had in federal courts for crimes committed on board American vessels in foreign ports.

See, among others, U. S. v. Stevens, 4 Wash. C. C. 547; U. S. v. Roberts, 2 N. Y. Legal Obs. 99; U. S. v. Seagrist, 4 Blatchf. 420; U. S. v. Bennett, 3 Hughes, 466.

The offense in question is exclusively cognizable by the authority of Belgium by virtue of treaties existing between that country and the United States.

We contend that the right of the Belgian Consul in the present case is, according to a fair and just interpretation, to be found in the first clause of the Treaty, under which this action is brought, conferring upon him the "exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of his nation."

In construing a treaty, courts take into consideration the situation of the parties to it, the subject involved, and the intention of the parties, and, to ascertain this intention may consider the construction which the parties have given to it, and what has been their action under it.

U. S. v. Payne, 8 Fed. Rep. 883.

Where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of the rights that may be claimed under it, and the other liberal, the latter is to be preferred.

Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483 (25: 628).

The federal courts have power to release the prisoners by writ of habeas corpus.

R. S. § 753. See also N. Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76, 90 (27: 656, 661); Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 540 (10: 579); People v. Curtis, 50 N. Y. 321.

Mr. C. H. Winfield, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal brings up an application made to [2] the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, by Charles Mali, the "Consul of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, for the States of New York and New Jersey, in the United States," for himself as such consul, "and in behalf of one Joseph Wildenhus, one Gionviennie Gobnbosich, and John J. Ostenmeyer," for the release, upon a writ of habeas corpus, of Wildenhus, Gobnbo-sich and Ostenmeyer from the custody of the Keeper of the Common Jail of Hudson County, New Jersey, and their delivery to the Consul, "to be dealt with according to the law of Belgium." The facts on which the application rests are thus stated in the petition for the writ:

"Second. That on or about the sixth day of October, 1886, on board the Belgian steamship 'Noordland' there occurred an affray between the said Joseph Wildenhus and one Fijens, wherein and whereby it is charged that the said Wildenhus stabbed with a knife and inflicted upon the said Fijens a mortal wound, of which he afterwards died.

"Third. That the said Wildenhus is a subject of the Kingdom of Belgium and has his domicil therein, and is one of the crew of the said steamship 'Noordland,' and was such when the said affray occurred.

"Fourth. That the said Fijens was also a subject of Belgium and had his domicil and residence therein, and at the time of the said affray, as well as at the time of his subsequent death, was one of the crew of the said steamship.

"Fifth. That at the time said affray occurred the said steamship 'Noordland' was lying moored at the dock of the Port of Jersey City, in said State of New Jersey.

"Sixth. That the said affray occurred and ended wholly below the deck of the said steamship, and that the tranquillity of the said Port of Jersey City was in nowise disturbed or endangered thereby.

[3] "Seventh. That said affray occurred in the presence of several witnesses, all of whom were and still are of the crew of the said vessel, and that no other person or persons except those of the crew of said vessel were present or near by.

"Eighth: Your petitioner therefore respectfully shows unto this honorable court that the said affray occurred outside of the jurisdiction of the said State of New Jersey.

"Ninth. But, notwithstanding the foregoing facts, your petitioner respectfully further shows that the police authorities of Jersey City, in said State of New Jersey, have arrested the said Joseph Wildenhus, and also the said Gionviennie Gobnbosich and John J. Ostenmeyer, of the crew of the said vessel (one of whom is a quartermaster thereof); and that said Joseph Wildenhus has been committed by a police magistrate, acting under the authority of the said State, to the common jail of the County of Hudson, on a charge of an indictable offense under the laws of the said State of New Jersey, and is now held in confinement by the keeper of the said jail; and that the others of the said crew arrested as aforesaid are also detained in custody and confinement as witnesses to testify in such proceedings as may hereafter be had against the said Wildenhus."

[4] Articles 8, 9 and 10 of a royal decree of the King of the Belgians, made on the 11th of March, 1857, relating to consuls and consular jurisdiction, are as follows:

"Art. 8. Our consuls have the right of discipline on Belgian merchant vessels in all the ports and harbors of their district.

"In matters of offenses or crimes they are to make the examination conformably to the instructions of the disciplinary and penal code of the merchant service.

"They are to claim, according to the terms of the conventions and laws in force, the assistance of the local authorities for the arrest and taking on board of deserting seamen.

"Art. 9. Except in the case where the peace of the port shall have been compromised by the occurrence, the consul shall protest against every attempt that the local authority may make to take cognizance of crimes or offenses committed on board of a Belgian vessel by one of the ship's company towards one, either of the same company, or of the company of another Belgian vessel.

"He shall take the proper steps to have the cognizance of the case turned over to him, in order that it be ultimately tried according to Belgian laws.

"Art. 10. When men belonging to the company of a Belgian vessel shall be guilty of offenses or crimes out of the ship, or even on board the ship, but against persons not of the company, the consul shall, if the local authority arrests or prosecutes them, take the necessary steps to have the Belgians so arrested treated with humanity, defended and tried impartially."

The application in this case was made under the authority of these articles.

Article XI of a Convention between the United States and Belgium "Concerning the rights, privileges and immunities of consular officers," concluded March 9, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States, March 1, 1881, 21 Stat. at L. 776, is as follows:

"The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls and consular agents shall have exclusive [5] charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of all differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captains, officers, and crews, without exception, particularly with reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not interfere, except when the disorder that has arisen is of such a nature as to disturb tranquillity and public order on shore, or in the port, or when a person of the country or not belonging to the crew, shall be concerned therein.

"In all other cases, the aforesaid authorities shall confine themselves to lending aid to the consuls and vice consuls or consular agents, if they are requested by them to do so, in causing the arrest and imprisonment of any person whose name is inscribed on the crew list, whenever, for any cause, the said officers shall think proper."

The claim of the Consul is that, by the law of nations, and the provisions of this Treaty, the offense with which Wildenhus has been charged is "solely cognizable by the authority of the laws of the Kingdom of Belgium," and that the State of New Jersey is without jurisdiction in the premises. The circuit court refused to deliver the prisoners to the Consul and remanded them to the custody of the jailer. 28 Fed. Rep. 924. To reverse that decision this appeal was taken.

By sections 751 and 753 of the Revised Statutes the courts of the United States have power to issue writs of habeas corpus which shall extend to prisoners in jail when they are in "custody in violation of the Constitution or a law or treaty of the United States;" and the question we have to consider is whether these prisoners are held in violation of the provisions of the existing Treaty between the United States and Belgium.

It is part of the law of civilized nations that when a merchant vessel of one country enters the ports of another for the purposes of trade, it subjects itself to the law of the place to which it goes, unless by treaty or otherwise the two countries have come to some different understanding or agreement; for, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall in The Exchange, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 144 [3: 296] "it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the government to degradation, if such * * * merchants did not owe temporary and local allegiance, and were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country." U. S. v. Diekelman, 92 U. S. 520 [23: 742]; 1 Phill. Int. Law, 3d. ed. 483, § CCCLI; Twiss, Law of Nations in Time of Peace, 229, § 159; Creasy, Int. Law, [12] 167, § 176; Halleck, Int. Law, 1st ed. 171. And the English judges have uniformly recognized the rights of the courts of the country of which the port is part to punish crimes committed by one foreigner on another in a foreign merchant ship. Regina v. Cunningham, Bell, C. C. 72; S. C. 8 Cox, C. C. 104; Regina v. Anderson, 11 Cox, C. C. 198, 204; S. C. L. R. 1 C. C. 161, 165; Regina v. Keyn, 13 Cox, C. C. 403, 486, 525; S. C. 2 Ex. Div. 63, 161, 213. As the owner has voluntarily taken his vessel for his own private purposes to a place within the dominion of a government other than his own, and from which he seeks protection during his stay, he owes that government such allegiance for the time being as is due for the protection to which he becomes entitled.

From experience, however, it was found long ago that it would be beneficial to commerce if the local government would abstain from interfering with the internal discipline of the ship and the general regulation of the rights and duties of the officers and crew towards the vessel or among themselves. And so by comity it came to be generally understood among civilized nations that all matters of discipline and all things done on board which affected only the vessel or those belonging to her, and did not involve the peace or dignity of the country, or the tranquillity of the port, should be left by the local government to be dealt with by the authorities of the nation to which the vessel belonged as the laws of that nation or the interests of its commerce should require. But if crimes are committed on board of a character to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country to which the vessel has been brought, the offenders have never by comity or usage been entitled to any exemption from the operation of the local laws for their punishment, if the local tribunals see fit to assert their authority. Such being the general public law on this subject, treaties and conventions have been entered into by nations having commercial intercourse, the purpose of which was to settle and define the rights and duties of the contracting parties with respect to each other in these particulars, and thus prevent the inconvenience that might arise from attempts to exercise conflicting jurisdictions.

[13] The first of these Conventions entered into by the United States after the adoption of the Constitution was with France, on the 14th of November, 1788, 8 Stat. at L. 106, "For the purpose of defining and establishing the functions and privileges of their respective consuls and vice consuls," article VIII of which is as follows:

"The consuls or vice consuls shall exercise police over all the vessels of their respective nations, and shall have on board the said vessels all power and jurisdiction in civil matters, in all the disputes which may there arise; they shall have an entire inspection over the said vessels, their crew and the changes and substitutions there to be made; for which purpose they may go on board the said vessels whenever they may judge it necessary. Well understood that the functions hereby allowed shall be confined to the interior of the vessels, and that they shall not take place in any case which shall have any interference with the police of the ports where the said vessels shall be."

It was when this convention was in force that the cases of The Sally and The Newton arose, an account of which is given in Wheaton's Elements of International Law, 3d ed. 153, and in 1 Phillimore's International Law, 3d ed. 484 and (2d ed.) 407. The Sally was an American merchant vessel in the Port of Marseilles, and The Newton a vessel of a similar character in the Port of Antwerp, then under the dominion of France. In the case of The Sally, the mate, in the alleged exercise of discipline over the crew, had inflicted a severe wound on one of the seamen, and in that of The Newton, one seaman had made an assault on another seaman in the vessel's boat. In each case, the proper consul of the United States claimed exclusive jurisdiction of the offense, and so did the local authorities of the port; but the Council of State, a branch of the political department of the Government of France to which the matter was referred, pronounced against the local tribunals, "Considering that one of these cases was that of an assault committed in the boat of the American ship Newton, by one of the crew upon another, and the other was that of a severe wound inflicted by the mate of the American ship Sally upon one of the seamen for having [14] made use of the boat without leave." This was clearly because the things done were not such as to disturb "the peace or tranquillity of the port." Wheaton, Elements Int. Law, 3d ed. 154. The case of The Sally was simply a quarrel between certain of the crew while constructively on board the vessel, and that of The Newton grew out of a punishment inflicted by an officer on one of the crew for disobedience of orders. Both were evidently of a character to affect only the police of the vessel, and thus within the authority expressly granted to the consul by the treaty.

No other treaty or convention bearing on this subject, to which our attention has been called, was entered into by the United States until a Treaty with Sweden and Norway, on the 4th of September, 1816, 8 Stat. at L. 232, where it was agreed, by article 5, that "The consuls and their deputies shall have the right, as such, to act as judges and arbitrators in the differences which may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels of the nation whose affairs are entrusted to their care. The respective governments shall have no right to interfere in matters of this kind, except the conduct of the captain or crew shall disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country in which the vessel may be, or the consul of the place shall feel himself obliged to resort to the interposition and support of the executive authority to cause his decision to be respected and maintained. It being, nevertheless, understood that this kind of judgment or award shall not deprive the contending parties of the right which they have, on their return, to recur to the judicial authorities of their own country."

Substantially the same provision is found in Treaties or Conventions concluded with Prussia in 1828, art. X, 8 Stat. at L. 382; with Russia in 1832, art. VIII, 448; with Greece in 1837, art. XII, 504; with Hanover in 1840, art. VI, 556; with Portugal also in 1840, art. X, 564; with the Grand Duchy of Mechlenburg-Schwerin in 1847, art. IX, 9 Stat. at L. 916; with Oldenburg in 1847, 868; with Austria in 1848, art. IV, 946; with the Hanseatic Republics in 1852, art. I, 10 Stat. at L. 961; with the two Sicilies in 1855, art. XIX, 11 Stat. at L. 650;
[15] with Denmark in 1861, art. I, 13 Stat. at L. 605; and with the Dominican Republic in 1867, art. XXVI, 15 Stat. at L. 487.

In a Convention with New Grenada concluded in 1850 the provision was this:

"They [the consuls, etc.] may cause proper order to be maintained on board vessels of their nation, and may decide on disputes arising between the captains, the officers, and the members of the crew, unless the disorders taking place on board should disturb the public tranquillity, or persons not belonging to the crew or to the nation in whose service the consul is employed; in which case the local authorities may interfere." Art. III, clause 8, 10 Stat. at L. 908.

Following this was a Convention with France, concluded in 1853, 10 Stat. at L. 996, article VIII of which is as follows:

"The respective consuls-general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents, shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captain, officers, and crew, without exception, particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not on any pretext interfere in these differences, but shall lend forcible aid to the consuls, when they may ask it, to arrest and imprison all persons composing the crew whom they may deem it necessary to confine. Those persons shall be arrested at the sole request of the consuls, addressed in writing to the local authority, and supported by an official extract from the register of the ship or the list of the crew, and shall be held, during the whole time of their stay in the port, at the disposal of the consuls. Their release shall be granted at the mere request of the consuls made in writing. The expenses of the arrest and detention of those persons shall be paid by the consuls."

The same provision in substantially the same language was embraced in a Convention with Italy in 1868, article XI, 15 Stat. at L. 609; and in another with Belgium, also in 1868, article XI, 16 Stat. at L. 761. This Convention with Belgium continued in force until superseded by that of 1880-1, under which the present controversy arose.

The form of the provision found in the present Convention with Belgium first appeared in a Convention with Austria concluded in 1870, article XI, 17 Stat. at L. 827, and it is found [16] now in substantially the same language in all the treaties and conventions which have since been entered into by the United States on the same subject. See the Conventions with the German Empire in 1871, art. XIII, 17 Stat. at L. 927; with The Netherlands in 1878, art. XI, 21 Stat. at L. 668; with Italy in 1881, art. I, 22 Stat. at L. 832; with Belgium in 1881, as stated above; and with Roumania the same year, art. XI, 23 Stat. at L. 714.

It thus appears that at first provision was made only for giving consuls police authority over the interior of the ship and jurisdiction in civil matters arising out of disputes or differences on board, that is to say, between those belonging to the vessel. Under this police authority the duties of the consuls were evidently confined to the maintenance of order and discipline on board. This gave them no power to punish for crimes against the peace of the country. In fact, they were expressly prohibited from interfering with the local police in matters of that kind. The cases of The Sally and The Newton are illustrative of this position. That of The Sally related to the discipline of the ship, and that of The Newton to the maintenance of order on board. In neither case was the disturbance of a character to affect the peace or the dignity of the country.

In the next conventions consuls were simply made judges and arbitrators to settle and adjust differences between those on board. This clearly related to such differences between those belonging to the vessel as are capable of adjustment and settlement by judicial decision or by arbitration, for it simply made the consuls judges or arbitrators in such matters. That would of itself exclude all idea of punishment for crimes against the State which affected the peace and tranquillity of the port; but, to prevent all doubt on this subject, it was expressly provided that it should not apply to differences of that character.

Next came a form of convention which in terms gave the consuls authority to cause proper order to be maintained on board and to decide [17] disputes between the officers and crew, but allowed the local authorities to interfere if the disorders taking place on board were of such a nature as to disturb the public tranquillity, and that is substantially all there is in the Convention with Belgium which we have now to consider. This Treaty is the law which now governs the conduct of the United States and Belgium towards each other in this particular. Each nation has granted to the other such local jurisdiction within its own dominion as may be necessary to maintain order on board a merchant vessel, but has reserved to itself the right to interfere if the disorder on board is of a nature to disturb the public tranquillity.

The Treaty is part of the supreme law of the United States, and has the same force and effect in New Jersey that it is entitled to elsewhere. If it gives the Consul of Belgium exclusive jurisdiction over the offense which it is alleged has been committed within the territory of New Jersey, we see no reason why he may not enforce his rights under the Treaty by writ of habeas corpus in any proper court of the United States. This being the case, the only important question left for our determination is whether the thing which has been done—the disorder that has arisen—on board this vessel is of a nature to disturb the public peace, or, as some writers term it, the "public repose" of the people who look to the State of New Jersey for their protection. If the thing done—"the disorder," as it is called in the Treaty—is of a character to affect those on shore or in the port when it becomes known, the fact that only those on the ship saw it when it was done, is a matter of no moment. Those who are not on the vessel pay no special attention to the mere disputes or quarrels of the seamen while on board, whether they occur under deck or above. Neither do they as a rule care for anything done on board which relates only to the discipline of the ship, or to the preservation of order and authority. Not so, however, with crimes which from their gravity awaken a public interest as soon as they become known, and especially those of a character which every civilized nation considers itself bound to provide a severe punishment for when committed within [18] its own jurisdiction. In such cases inquiry is certain to be instituted at once to ascertain how or why the thing was done, and the popular excitement rises or falls as the news spreads and the facts become known. It is not alone the publicity of the act, or the noise and clamor which attends it, that fixes the nature of the crime, but the act itself. If that is of a character to awaken public interest when it becomes known, it is a "disorder" the nature of which is to affect the community at large, and consequently to invoke the power of the local government whose people have been disturbed by what was done. The very nature of such an act is to disturb the quiet of a peaceful community, and to create, in the language of the Treaty, a "disorder" which will "disturb tranquillity and public order on shore or in the port." The principle which governs the whole matter is this: Disorders which disturb only the peace of the ship or those on board are to be dealt with exclusively by the sovereignty of the home of the ship, but those which disturb the public peace may be suppressed, and, if need be, the offenders punished by the proper authorities of the local jurisdiction. It may not be easy at all times to determine to which of the two jurisdictions a particular act of disorder belongs. Much will undoubtedly depend on the attending circumstances of the particular case, but all must concede that felonious homicide is a subject for the local jurisdiction, and that if the proper authorities are proceeding with the case in a regular way the consul has no right to interfere to prevent it. That, according to the petition for the habeas corpus, is this case.

This is fully in accord with the practice in France, where the government has been quite as liberal towards foreign nations in this particular as any other, and where, as we have seen in the cases of The Sally and The Newton, by a decree of the Council of State, representing the political department of the government, the French courts were prevented from exercising jurisdiction. But afterwards, in 1859, in the case of Jally, the mate of an American merchantman, who had killed one of the crew and severely wounded another on board the ship in the Port of Havre, the Court of Cassation, the highest judicial tribunal of France, upon full consideration held, while the Con- [19] vention of 1853 was in force, that the French courts had rightful jurisdiction, for reasons which sufficiently appear in the following extract from its judgment:

"Considering that it is a principle of the law of nations that every State has sovereign jurisdiction throughout its territory;

"Considering that by the terms of article 3 of the Code Napoleon the laws of police and safety bind all those who inhabit French territory, and that consequently foreigners, even transeuntes, find themselves subject to those laws;

"Considering that merchant vessels entering the port of a nation other than that to which they belong cannot be withdrawn from the territorial jurisdiction, in any case in which the interest of the State of which that port forms part finds itself concerned, without danger to good order and to the dignity of the govern ment;

"Considering that every State is interested in the repression of crimes and offenses that may be committed in the ports of its territory, not only by the men of the ship's company of a foreign merchant vessel towards men not forming part of that company, but even by men of the ship's company among themselves, whenever the act is of a nature to compromise the tranquillity of the port, or the intervention of the local authority is invoked, or the act constitutes a crime by common law" (droit commun, the law common to all civilized nations), "the gravity of which does not permit any nation to leave it unpunished, without impugning its rights of jurisdictional and territorial sovereignty, because that crime is in itself the most manifest as well as the most flagrant violation of the laws which it is the duty of every nation to cause to be respected in all parts of its territory." 1 Ortolan, Diplomatie De La Mer, 4th ed. pp. 455, 456; Sirey (N. S.) 1859, p. 189.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

v.
LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY, THE NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY, AND EXRS. of WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 130-140.)

Limitation of actions—New York Statutes—jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in equity, uniform and not subject to state legislation—fraud—time runs from discovery of.

1. The equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is subject to neither limitation nor restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the States of the Union.

2. Where the object of a bill is to obtain a complicated accounting, especially when concealed fraud is charged, a court of equity has jurisdiction.

3. Where relief is sought in equity on the ground of actual fraud, especially if such fraud has been concealed, time for commencing suit will not run against the plaintiff until the discovery of the fraud, or until, with reasonable diligence, it might have been discovered.

4. A bill filed in the court below, to set aside certain settlements of accounts on the ground of fraud, nearly seven years after the discovery of the fraud is held to be barred by the Statutes of New York.

5. Under the New York Statute of September 13, 1883, allowing additional time for the commencement of actions by executors and administrators, it is held that only the actual time between the death of the testator and the grant of letters at the place of primary administration, and six months in addition thereto, can be excluded in computing the time within which action may be brought.

Argued Nov. 15, 16, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John C. Fay, George Norris and Joseph E. McDonald, for appellant:

Courts of equity interfere to prevent the bar of the Statute of Limitation where it would be inequitable or unjust to enforce it; and in no case is it better established that they will do so than where the party invoking the bar has perpetrated a fraud.

In Payne v. Hook, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 425 (19: 260), this court held that the equity jurisdiction of the federal courts is subject to neither limitation or restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different States of the Union.

Mr. J. E. Burrill, for appellees:

Although fraud is one of the grounds of equitable jurisdiction, it is not exclusive but concurrent with law; and equity will not interfere unless there be some special ground to justify it, and unless an adequate remedy at law does not exist.

The Statute of Limitations applicable to a legal action cannot be avoided by changing the forum from law to equity when law might give relief.

Whatever jurisdiction equity has is concurrent with law, and in such case equity will follow the statute which would have been enforced at law.

Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201 (25: 431); Foot v. Farrington, 41 N. Y. 164.

Independently of the Statute of Limitations the laches apparent on the face of the bill is a bar to the action.

There is no allegation in the bill that decedent had any interest in the transactions referred to, and from the nature of the contract it is clear that he had none, and that it was a contract which could not be performed by him. No personal liability, therefore, attaches to him or the contract.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was heard in the court below upon demurrers to an amended bill and to an amended bill in the nature of a supplemental bill. The demurrers were sustained and the bill dismissed, upon the ground that the suit was barred by the Statute of Limitations of the State of New York. [131]

The material facts admitted by the demurrer are as follows: the appellant, the plaintiff below, is the executor of John T. Alexander, who died, at his domicil in the State of Illinois, on the 21st of August, 1876. He received his letters testamentary from the proper court in that State on the 6th of September of the same year. On the 7th of April, 1880, ancillary letters were issued to him by the surrogate of the County of New York, in the State of New York. 2 R. S. N. Y. 2d ed. marg. p. 67, § 68.

This suit was brought April 9, 1880. Its object is to obtain a decree setting aside sundry settlements of accounts had by the firm of J. T. & G. D. Alexander & Co. (composed of John T. Alexander, G. D. Alexander, and William Fitch, and to be hereafter called Alexander & Co.) with certain railroad Corporations, defendants below, in reference to various business transactions between the parties. Those transactions arose under an agreement, partly written and partly verbal, entered into May 28, 1870, between those Corporations and Alexander & Co., relating to the shipment of horned cattle and hogs by the latter over the roads of the former between designated points, and at specified rates of freight. The agreement took effect June 10, 1870, and was to continue in force one year, during which period Alexander & Co. were not to ship horned cattle or hogs over any rival road between the points named. In the event there was a reduction of rates, Alexander & Co. were to have the benefit of the lowest rates between those points charged by either of the defendant Corporations or by any other rival corporation. The agreement contemplated settlements between the parties from time to time and the payment by Alexander & Co., on each shipment, of the rates specified in the agreement. But the [132] amounts so paid, when in excess of the lowest rates charged by the defendant Corporations, or either of them, or by other rival corporations, were to be held by the defendants in trust for the shippers and repaid to the latter, by way of "drawbacks," on each occasion when the accounts between the parties were stated and settled.

These settlements were had monthly or oftener. At each of them Vanderbilt, the testator of the individual defendants, in behalf of the railroad Corporations, claimed to have peculiar facilities for obtaining information in reference to rates, and promised to keep Alexander & Co. (who had no means of obtaining such information) fully advised in the premises. In reply to specific inquiries addressed to him on the occasion of each of such settlements, he represented that the rates charged by his Companies to that firm were not higher than those charged by rival corporations. Relying upon such representations, Alexander & Co. consummated the various settlements upon the basis suggested by Vanderbilt. They, however, subsequently ascertained that the rates charged by the defendant Corporations as well as by rival corporations to shippers between the points named, and during the same period, were much lower than those charged Alexander & Co., and that the representations to the contrary by the defendant Corporations were knowingly false, and made with the intent to cheat and defraud said firm. The bill alleges that the truth as to what were the current rates for the period covered by the settlements was fraudulently concealed by the defendant Corporations from Alexander & Co.; and that said frauds were not, and could not have been, discovered by the latter until on or about April 16, 1878.

The settlements between the parties, it may be stated, covered more than two hundred shipments of cattle and hogs, the freights upon which aggregated nearly $350,000 or about [133] $9,000 per week, from June 10, 1870, to March 14, 1871, when the contract was canceled by mutual consent. Immediately thereafter the partnership of Alexander & Co. was dissolved and its affairs adjusted.

G. D. Alexander was adjudged to be a lunatic by the proper court in Illinois on the third day of April, 1872, and is still of unsound mind. A conservator of his estate was shortly thereafter selected, but in reference to that appointment the bill charges that it was a nullity, and that no valid appointment was made until July 8, 1880. As to Fitch, the remaining partner, he, on April 12, 1879, brought an action in one of the courts of New York for the purpose of enforcing the liability to him, individually, of the defendant Corporations and Vanderbilt, on account of the matters in this suit set forth; but by proceedings had after the commencement of this litigation his interest in the claim preferred in his own suit was sold, one Taylor becoming the purchaser thereof, and subsequently Fitch's suit was dismissed, by the procurement of the defendants, for want of prosecution. The plaintiff states that, at the time of Taylor's purchase, Fitch, by his laches, had lost any individual rights he might theretofore have had in said claim; and that Taylor had not succeeded to any substantial interest capable of being enforced herein. He also avers that both Fitch and the present conservator of the estate of G. D. Alexander have declined, upon request, to unite as coplaintiffs in this suit.

It is further alleged by the plaintiff that, the receipted freight bills having been surrendered to the defendant Corporations at the time of the settlements with them, he has no means of ascertaining the amount justly due to said firm, by way of drawbacks, except from the freight bills, checks and vouchers in the possession or under the control of said Corporations.

The prayer of the bill is that the before mentioned settlements be opened and set aside; that a re-accounting be had in respect of all of said transactions; and that, upon final hearing, the plaintiff have a decree for the difference between the amount of "drawbacks" repaid to Alexander & Co. at the time of the settlements and the amounts which that firm were entitled to receive upon each settlement, with interest [134] thereon from the time they were respectively payable.

The case made by the plaintiff is clearly one of which a court of equity may take cognizance. The complicated nature of the accounts between the parties constitutes itself a sufficient ground for going into equity. It would have been difficult, if not impossible, for a jury to unravel the numerous transactions involved in the settlements between the parties, and reach a satisfactory conclusion as to the amount of drawbacks to which Alexander & Co. were entitled on each settlement. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 451. Justice could not be done except by employing the methods of investigation peculiar to courts of equity. When to these considerations is added the charge against the defendants of actual concealed fraud, the right of the plaintiff to invoke the jurisdiction of equity cannot well be doubted.

Did the circuit court err in adjudging that the suit was barred by the Statute of Limitations?

By the Code of Civil Procedure of New York in force prior to September 1, 1877, the period of six years was prescribed as the limitation for:

"1. An action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, express or implied, except a judgment or sealed instrument.

* * * * *

"6. An action for relief, on the ground of fraud, in cases which heretofore were solely cognizable by the court of chancery; the cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud." [135]
Voorhees' Code, 4th ed. p. 86, § 91.

The Code which went into operation September 1, 1877, prescribed the like limitation for actions upon contracts, obligations or liabilities, express or implied, other than judgments or sealed instruments; but, in place of subdivision 6 of section 91 of the old Code, was substituted the following:

"5. An action to procure a judgment, other than for a sum of money, on the ground of fraud, in a case which on the thirty-first day of December, 1846, was cognizable by the court of chancery. The cause of action is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the plaintiff or the person under whom he claims, of the facts constituting the fraud." Code, N. Y., as amended in 1877, § 382.

The circuit court deeming the jurisdiction in equity and at law to be concurrent in cases like this, was of opinion that the question of limitation is controlled by the local statute, and upon the authority of Carr v. Thompson, 87 N. Y. 160, adjudged that this action was not, within the meaning of section 382 of the Code, one "to procure a judgment, other than for a sum of money, on the ground of fraud;" and that, consequently, the cause of action accrued upon the commission of the alleged frauds (which was in 1871), and not at the date of their discovery, on the 16th of April, 1873. As this view is controverted by the appellant, and is the main ground upon which appellees rely for an affirmance of the judgment below, it must be examined.

It is not clear that the decision in Carr v. Thompson goes as far as the circuit judge supposed. That was an action against an agent, to recover moneys obtained from his principals and converted to his own use, by means of false and fictitious accounts, rendered from time to time, and which he represented to be correct and just. Fraud, although charged, was not regarded by the state court as the basis of the ac-[136] tion. It was not deemed a suit to recover damages for the fraud practiced, but one merely to recover damages for the violation of the agent's contract or obligation to account justly and honestly to his principals. The sole question, the state court said, presented by the complaint and answer, was whether the agent properly performed his duty. It also was careful to say: "It is to be observed that the complaint is not framed for the purpose of opening an account stated: it does not allege the existence of such an account as an obstacle to a recovery, which requires the aid of equity to remove; nor, indeed, does the answer set up any such defense." These remarks, in connection with the further declaration that the words "an action to procure a judgment, other than for a sum of money, on the ground of fraud," sufficiently described "a case in which judgment for an accounting is sought in addition to, and as a means of reaching, a judgment for money," lead us to doubt whether that court would hold, in a case like the present, that the time for commencing the action begins to run from the commission, not from the discovery, of the fraud.

Be that as it may, it is an established rule of equity as administered in the courts of the United States that, where relief is asked on the ground of actual fraud, especially if such fraud has been concealed, time will not run in favor of the defendant until the discovery of the fraud, or until, with reasonable diligence, it might have been discovered. Meader v. Norton, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 442, 458 [20: 184, 187]; Prevost v. Gratz, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 481 [5: 311]; Michoud v. Girod, 45 U. S. 4 How. 503, 561 [11: 1076, 1102]; Veazie v. Williams, 49 U. S. 8 How. 149, 168 [12: 1025, 1028]; Brown v. Buena Vista, 95 U. S. 157 [24: 422]; Rosenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 190 [28: 397]; 2 Story, Eq. § 1521*a*; Ang. Lim. In Bailey v. Glover, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 347 [22: 688], it was said that "In suits in equity, where relief is sought on the ground of fraud, the authorities are without conflict in support of the doctrine that, where the ignorance of the fraud has been produced by affirmative acts of the guilty party in concealing the facts from the other, the statute will not bar relief, provided suit is brought within proper time after the discovery of the fraud. We also think that in suits in equity the decided weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that, where the party injured by the fraud remains in ignorance of it without any fault or want of diligence or care on his part, the bar of the statute does not begin to run until the fraud is discovered, though there be no special circumstances or efforts on the part of the party committing the fraud to conceal it from the knowledge of the other party." [137] In the same case it was said: "To hold that by concealing fraud, or by committing a fraud in a manner that concealed itself, until such time as the party committing the fraud could plead the Statute of Limitations to protect it, is to make the law, which was designed to prevent fraud, the means by which it is made successful and secure." See also Traer v. Clews, 115 U. S. 538 [29: 470]. These observations were made with reference to an Act of Congress prescribing a fixed time within which a suit between an assignee in bankruptcy and persons asserting adverse rights in property conveyed to such assignee should be brought. They are peculiarly applicable to a local statute which, if followed, would impair the power of the courts of the United States to enforce the settled principles of equity in suits of which they have, by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, full jurisdiction. While the courts of the Union are required by the statutes creating them to accept as rules of decision, in trials at common law, the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, laws, treaties and statutes of the United States otherwise provide, their jurisdiction in equity cannot be impaired by the local statutes of the different States in which they sit. In United States v. Howland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 108, 115 [4: 526, 528] Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, said that, as the courts of the Union have a chancery jurisdiction in every State, and the Judiciary Act confers the same chancery powers on all, and gives the same rule of decision, its jurisdiction must be the same in all the States. The same view was expressed by Mr. Justice Curtis in his work on the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States (p. 13), when he observed that "The equity practice of the courts of the United States is the same everywhere in the United States, and they administer the same system of equity rules and equity jurisdiction throughout the whole of the United States without regard to state laws." So, in Payne v. Hook, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 430 [19: 261] it was said: "We have repeatedly held 'that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over controversies between citizens of different States cannot be impaired by the laws of the States, which pre-[138] scribe the modes of redress in their courts, or which regulate the distribution of their judicial power.' If legal remedies are sometimes modified to suit the changes in the laws of the States, and the practice of their courts, it is not so with equitable. The equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is the same that the High Court of Chancery in England possesses, is subject to neither limitation or restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different States of the Union." See also Robinson v. Campbell, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 221-2 [4: 375]; Boyle v. Zacharie, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 658 [8: 536]; Livingston v. Story, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 656 [9: 264]; Stearns v. Page, 48 U. S. 7 How. 819 [12: 928]; Russell v. Southard, 53 U. S. 12 How. 147 [13: 930]; Neves v. Scott, 54 U. S. 13 How. 272 [14: 142]; Barber v. Barber, 62 U. S. 21 How. 592 [16: 229]; Green v. Creighton, 64 U. S. 23 How. 105 [16: 428]. In view of these authorities, it is clear that the Statute of New York upon the subject of limitation does not affect the power and duty of the court below—following the settled rules of equity—to adjudge that time did not run in favor of defendants, charged with actual concealed fraud, until after such fraud was or should with due diligence have been discovered. Upon any other theory the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States could not be exercised according to rules and principles applicable alike in every State. It is undoubtedly true, as announced in adjudged cases, that courts of equity feel themselves bound, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, by the Statutes of Limitation that govern courts of law in similar circumstances, and that sometimes they act upon the analogy of the like limitation at law. But these general rules must be taken subject to the qualification that the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States cannot be impaired by the laws of the respective States in which they sit. It is an inflexible rule in those courts, when applying the general limitation prescribed in cases like this, to regard the cause of action as having accrued at the time the fraud was or should have been discovered, and thus withheld from the defendant the benefit, in the computation of time, of the period during which he concealed the fraud.

[139] It results that even if this be not an action "to procure a judgment, other than for a sum of money, on the ground of fraud," within the meaning of the New York Code of Procedure, the limitation of six years, being applied here, does not, as adjudged below, commence from the commission of the alleged frauds.

Can the suit be maintained if the cause of action is to be deemed to have accrued from the discovery of the fraud? In Burke v. Smith, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 401 [21: 365], where the local statute prescribed six years for the commencement of actions for fraud, the court, after observing that equity acts or refuses to act in analogy to the statute, said: "We think a court of equity will not be moved to set aside a fraudulent transaction at the suit of one who has been quiescent during a period longer than that fixed by the Statute of Limitations, after he had knowledge of the fraud or after he was put upon inquiry with the means of knowledge accessible to him." Without inquiring whether the plaintiff was not guilty of such gross laches, in applying for relief, as deprived him of all right to the aid of equity, and giving him the benefit of the limitation of six years, to be computed from the discovery of the fraud, there seems to be even then no escape from the conclusion that the suit was not brought in time. Seven years, lacking only seven days, elapsed after the discovery of the frauds by the plaintiff's testator before suit was brought.

The plaintiff however contends that he had seven years within which to sue. This position is supposed to be justified by the New York Statute of September 13, 1883, which declares that "The time which shall have elapsed between the death of any person and the granting of letters testamentary or of administration on his estate, not exceeding six months, and the period of six months after the granting of such letters, shall not be deemed any part of the time limited by any law for the commencement of actions by executors or administrators." 2 R. S. N. Y. 733, chap. 8, title 3, art. 1, § 9, Banks & Bros. ed.

If this statute has any application to a case where the cause of action accrued in the lifetime of the testator or intestate, it cannot avail [140] the plaintiff. It does not give the party claiming the benefit of its provisions both of the two periods of six months therein mentioned, but only such time, not exceeding six months, as elapsed after the death of the testator or intestate before the granting of letters, and the additional time of six months after the granting of letters. Here only sixteen days intervened between the death and the granting of letters testamentary. In computing the time for suing there must be excluded only these sixteen days and the six months immediately succeeding that period. In other words—applying the Statute of 1873 to the case in hand—the plaintiff had only six years, six months and sixteen days, after the discovery on April 16, 1873, of the alleged frauds, within which to sue; whereas, this action was not brought until seven years, lacking only seven days, after the alleged frauds were discovered.

We do not conceive that the time of granting the ancillary letters testamentary in New York can affect the question. The will having been proved in Illinois, the place of domicil, there was nothing to prevent the immediate issue of letters upon it in New York. By the laws of that State no further probate was necessary; a certified copy deposited in the office of the surrogate was all that was required. As this was in the executor's power to have done at any time, he can hardly claim that his own voluntary delay should extend the period which equity considers reasonable for the institution of a suit. 2 N. Y. R. S. 2d ed. marg. p. 67, § 82; Code Civil Proc. § 2695.

The decree is affirmed.

v.
ST. LOUIS NATIONAL BANK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 20-40.)

Principal and agent—factor no power at common law to pledge principal's property—difference between power to sell and to pledge—Statutes of Missouri affecting such transfers—effect of words "on the faith thereof," considered—usage—practice—judgment ordered for plaintiffs in error.

1. When a factor, holding property in trust for his principal, transfers it to a bank which has notice of the capacity in which he holds it, the principal may assert his right in the property against the bank, either by independent suit, or by way of defense to an action by the bank against him.

2. By the common law a factor or agent for the sale has no power to pledge, whether the owner has intrusted him with the possession of the goods themselves, or with the symbol of them, as by consigning them to him by a bill of lading in which he is consignee or indorsee.

3. Under the Statutes of Missouri a factor has no power to make a pledge of the goods of his principal by a transfer, without an indorsement in writing, of a bill of lading or warehouse receipt thereof.

4. The Missouri Statutes, to regulate transfers of warehouse receipts and bills of lading by indorsement, discussed and compared with the English and New York Factors' Acts, the words "on the faith thereof" being especially considered.

5. The plaintiff cannot set up usage which does not appear to have been known to the defendants, and which is contrary to law in that it undertakes to alter an express contract and to sustain a pledge by a factor of the goods of his principal to secure his own general balance of account to a third person.

6. Where a jury is waived, the court's finding of facts, whether general or special, has the same effect as the verdict of a jury; and although a bill of exceptions is necessary to present rulings made in the progress of the trial, the question whether the facts set forth in a special finding of the court are sufficient in law to support the judgment may be reviewed on a writ of error without a bill of exceptions, and a general judgment for defendants ordered, without new trial.

Argued April 9, 1886. Decided Jan. 10, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa. Reversed and judgment ordered for plaintiffs in error.

Action on promissory note made by plaintiffs in error, defendants below

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John N. Rogers, for plaintiffs in error:

The delivery by Dowell & Co. to the Bank of the bills of lading for the cotton, and afterwards of the warehouse receipts, running to bearer, for the purpose of securing the Bank upon its contemporaneous loans to Dowell & Co., were in law, as between these parties, pledges or hypothecations of the cotton.

A factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal, and can dispose of them only by sale according to the usual course of business, unless otherwise specially authorized.

S. 11 How. 209 (13: 667); McCombie v. Davies, 7 East, 5; Martini v. Coles, 1 Maule & S. 140; Solly v. Rathbone, and Cockran v. Irlam, 2 Maule & S. 298, 301; Boyson v. Coles, 6 Maule & S. 14; Gray v. Agnew, 95 Ill. 315; Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle, 195; Rodrigues v. Heffernan, 5 Johns. Ch. 417; Merchants Nat. Bank v. Trenholm, 12 Heisk. 520; Kauffman v. Beasley, 54 Tex. 568.

And no court has more strictly maintained these limitations on the factor's authority than the Supreme Court of Missouri.

Benny v. Rhodes, 18 Mo. 147; Benny v. Pegram, 18 Mo. 191; Wheeler v. Givan, 65 Mo. 89.

A factor cannot pledge the principal's goods to the extent of his advances thereon.

Evidence of a local usage or custom cannot be admitted to contradict or vary the general rules of law.

It has been expressly held that a usage of factors to pledge their principal's goods is inadmissible, being against the rule of law.

Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle, 195.

A partner is no more entitled to dispose of the partnership goods to pay or secure his own debt, or that of another firm of which he is a member, than a factor is so to dispose of his principal's goods.

The Bank's case is in no way fortified by the Missouri Statutes in regard to bills of lading and warehouse receipts.

The Bank can derive no aid from either section of the Act of 1869, because neither the bills of lading nor the warehouse receipts for the cotton are found to have been transferred to it by written indorsement thereon.

Messrs. James Hagerman and Frank Hagerman, for defendant in error:

There was no conversion so as to make the Bank liable. Consignors' failure to demand the goods while in the hands of the Bank defeats their claim.

Roach v. Turk, 9 Heisk. 708.

The demand notes of J. H. Dowell & Co. having been paid by check of the latter on their deposit account with the Bank, after the sale of the cotton, such payment is valid and effectual, although Dowell & Co. may not have been authorized to pledge, in the first instance, the bills of lading and warehouse receipts as security for such demand notes.

The relative obligations between a bank and its depositing customers are simply those of debtor and creditor.

The Missouri Statutes authorize and validate the transactions between Dowell & Co. and the Bank, so far as the rights of the Bank are concerned.

[30] Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

When a jury is waived in writing, and the case tried by the court, the court's finding of facts, whether general or special, has the same effect as the verdict of a jury; and although a bill of exceptions is the only way of presenting rulings made in the progress of the trial, the question whether the facts set forth in a special finding of the court, which is equivalent to a special verdict, are sufficient in law to support the judgment, may be reviewed on writ of error without any bill of exceptions. Act of March 3, 1865, chap. 86, § 4, 13 Stat. at L. 501; Rev. Stat. §§ 649, 700; French v. Edwards, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 147 [22:534]; Ex parte French, 91 U. S. 423 [23:249]. The question whether the facts found by the court in the case at bar are sufficient to support the judgment below includes the several questions of law affecting the merits of the case. That judgment is for more than $5,000, which is sufficient to give this court jurisdiction in error. Act of February 16, 1875, chap. 77, § 3, 18 Stat. at L. 316. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether those questions are duly stated in the certificate of division of opinion, within the rule affirmed in Williamsport Bank v. Knapp, 119 U. S. 357 [ante, 446].

The leading facts of the case, as found by the circuit court, are as follows:

The original action was on a promissory note made by the defendants, payable to the order of J. H. Dowell & Co., and by them indorsed to the plaintiff Bank. J. H. Dowell & Co. were a partnership of cotton factors at St. Louis, in which Dowell was the active and managing partner. Dowell was also a partner with the defendants, under the name of Allen & Dowell, in the working of a cotton plantation in Arkansas.

The note in suit was made and delivered by the defendants to the payees, their factors, to enable them to raise funds to furnish supplies for working that plantation, and under an agreement between the parties that the note should [31] be taken up and paid by the factors out of the proceeds of the cotton crop of the plantation for the coming season, when received and sold by them. That crop was consigned to the factors under that agreement, and its proceeds were more than sufficient to pay this note and all other charges of the factors. It is not doubted that upon these facts the makers would have a complete defense to the note in the hands of the payees.

But before the maturity of the note, the payees had it discounted by, and indorsed and delivered it to the plaintiff Bank, with which they kept their deposit account, and of which they from time to time borrowed large sums of money. As soon as they received the bills of lading of cotton consigned to them as factors by the defendants or by other persons, they delivered those bills to the Bank, which thereupon gave them a credit, in their deposit account, of $40 for each bale, and took their note for the amount, payable on demand, with interest. On the arrival of the cotton it was delivered to warehousemen, who gave receipts undertaking to deliver it to bearer, and these receipts were delivered to the Bank in exchange for the bills of lading, which were surrendered and canceled. There was no evidence that either the bills of lading or the warehouse receipts were indorsed in writing. The Bank knew that the payees of the note in suit were factors, and that they held the cotton as such. It did not know and made no inquiry as to the ownership of any of the cotton, or the dealings of the factors with the owners, or the state of accounts between them.

The cotton was sold in the following manner: the factors negotiated sales by means of samples, and fixed the price and other terms of sale. The Bank received the whole price from the purchasers, and delivered to them the warehouse receipts, and credited the factors with the amount received, but at the same time and as part of the same transaction, required them to draw, and they did draw and deliver to the Bank, their checks for the amount of their demand notes held by the Bank. After all the cotton had been sold, there was a large balance of account due from the factors to the Bank.

The substance of the transaction between the factors and the Bank in regard to the cotton was that the factors delivered the bills of lad- [32]
ing and warehouse receipts to the Bank, to secure the repayment of money lent them by the Bank, and thereby made a pledge of the cotton to secure their own debt; Ins. Co. v. Kiger, 103 U. S. 352, 356 [26: 433, 434]; and that the Bank sold, on terms negotiated by the factors, the cotton so pledged to it, and received the price from the purchasers. The notes and checks which passed between the factors and the Bank were but forms to carry out the main purpose of the transaction between them, and did not change its nature or effect.

By the common law, a factor or agent for sale has no power to pledge, whether the owner has intrusted him with the possession of the goods themselves, or with the symbol of them, as by consigning them to him by a bill of lading in which he is consignee or indorsee. 2 Kent, Com. 625; Kinder v. Shaw, 2 Mass. 398; Warner v. Martin, 52 U. S. 11 How. 209, 224 [13: 667, 673]; Phillips v. Huth, 6 M. & W. 572, 596; Cole v. Northwestern Bank, L. R. 10 C. P. 354, 363. And such was the law of Missouri before the passage of any statute upon the subject. Benny v. Rhodes, 18 Mo. 147; Benny v. Pegram, 18 Mo. 191.

The essential difference between a power to sell and a power to pledge is well brought out in a recent case in the House of Lords by Lord Chancellor Selborne, who said: "It is manifest that when a man is dealing with other people's goods, the difference between an authority to sell, and an authority to mortgage or pledge, is one which may go to the root of all the motives and purposes of the transaction. The object of a person who has goods to sell is to turn them into money; but when those goods are deposited by way of security for money borrowed, it is a transaction of a totally different character. If the owner of the goods does not get the money, his object and purpose are simply defeated; and if, on the other hand, he does get the money, a different object and different purpose are substituted for the first; namely, that of borrowing money and contracting the relation of debtor with a creditor, while retaining a redeemable title to the goods, instead of exchanging the title to the goods for a title unaccompanied by any indebtedness, to their full equivalent in money." City Bank v. Barrow, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 664, 670.

The weight and bearing of the cases cited at the bar, upon the construction of the Statutes of Missouri, annexed to the finding of facts, cannot be properly appreciated without keeping in mind the provisions of the various statutes under which those cases arose.

The English Factors' Act of 6 Geo. IV., c. 94, passed in 1825, enacted in section 2 that any person intrusted with and in possession of any bill of lading, warehouse receipt or other like document, should be deemed and taken to be the true owner of the goods described therein, so far as to give validity to any contract made by him with other persons for the sale or disposition of the goods, or for the deposit or pledge thereof as a security for advances made by them "upon the faith of such several documents or either of them;" provided such persons had no notice, by such documents or otherwise, that the person intrusted as aforesaid was not the actual and bona fide owner of the goods.

The New York Factors' Act of 1830, chap. 179, based upon the Act of 6 Geo. IV, provided in section 3 that every factor or other agent intrusted with the possession of any bill of lading, custom-house permit or warehouse-keeper's receipt for the delivery of merchandise, and every such factor or agent not having the documentary evidence of title, but intrusted with the possession of any merchandise for the purpose of sale, or as a security for any advances to be made or obtained thereon, should be deemed to be the true owner thereof, so far as to give validity to any contract made by him with any other person for the sale or disposition of the merchandise, for any advances made by such other person "upon the faith thereof." It will be observed that this section did not in terms repeat the proviso of the corresponding section of the English Act.

But before the enactment in Missouri of any of the statutes cited in argument, the construction of this section of the New York Statute had been settled, by decisions of the highest courts of that State and of this court, to be that the words "on the faith thereof" were not to be referred to "merchandise," or to its symbols, but to the words "shall be deemed to be the true owner thereof." In the leading case, Mr. Justice Bronson, speaking for Chief Justice Nelson, Mr. Justice Beardsley and himself, said: "The obvious meaning is that the factor or other agent who has been entrusted with certain documentary evidence of title, or with the possession and ostensible ownership of the property, shall be deemed the true owner, so far as may be necessary to protect those who have dealt with him 'upon the faith thereof;' that is, upon the faith, induced by the usual indicia of title, that he was the true owner of the property. The second section of the British Statute, which answers very nearly to the third section of our own, contains a proviso which expressly saves the rights of the true owner where the pledgee had notice that he was dealing with an agent; and our statute, though framed in a different manner, was evidently designed to produce the same result. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to enable the factor to commit a fraud upon his principal, by pledging or obtaining advances upon the goods for his own purposes, when the pledgee or person making the advances knew that he was not dealing with the true owner." Stevens v. Wilson (1844), 6 Hill, 512, 514; S. C. in Court of Errors (1846), 3 Denio, 472; Warner v. Martin (1850), 52 U. S. 11 How. 209, 228 [13: 667, 674]; Covell v. Hill (1852), 6 N. Y 374, 380; Cartwright v. Wilmerding (1862), 24 N. Y. 521, 534; Dows v. Greene (1862), 24 N. Y. 638, 642. See also Howland v. Woodruff (1875), 60 N. Y. 73, 79, 80; First Nat. Bank v. Shaw (1874), 61 N. Y. 283, 301.

If the Legislature of Missouri had adopted the words of that provision of the New York Factors' Act, the meaning of which had been thus settled on full consideration by the highest courts of that State and by this court, there would be the strongest ground for holding, in accordance with a familiar canon of construction, that it had enacted those words with that meaning. Cathcart v. Robinson, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 264, 280 [8: 120, 126]; McDonald v. Hovey, 110 U. S. 619, 628 [28: 269, 271]; Commonwealth v. Hartnett, 3 Gray, 450; Scruggs v. Blair, 44 Miss. 406; Wiesner v. Zaun, 39 Wis. 188, 205.

But the Statute of Missouri of March 4, 1869, differs widely, in language and in purpose, from the New York Factors' Act of 1830, and was apparently derived, through sections 6 and 9 of the Missouri Statute of March 10, 1868, from the Statute of New York of 1858, chap. 326, entitled "An Act to Prevent the Issue of False Receipts, and to Prevent Fraudulent Transfers of Property, by Warehousemen, Wharfingers and Others," as amended by the Statute of that State of 1859, chap. 353, extending its provisions to bills of lading. None of these provisions of the Missouri Statutes are limited or even addressed to factors or other agents authorized to sell the goods of their principals, and intrusted for that purpose with the possession either of the goods, or of warehouse receipts, bills of lading or other similar documents in which such agents are named as consignees. But their leading object is to regulate the manner and effect of transferring warehouse receipts and bills of lading by indorsement.

By section 6 of the Statute of Missouri of 1868 (following almost word for word the Statutes of New York of 1858, chap. 326, § 6, and 1859, chap. 353), it was enacted that warehouse receipts or bills of lading "May be transferred by endorsement thereon, and any person to whom the same may be transferred shall be deemed and taken to be the owner of the goods, wares, merchandise, grain, flour, or other produce or commodity, therein specified, so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien, or transfer, made or created by such person or persons," that is, by the indorsee before mentioned; and by section 9, warehouse receipts and bills of lading were made "negotiable by endorsement in blank, or by special endorsement, in the same manner and to the same extent as bills of exchange and promissory notes." Missouri Laws 1868, pp. 12, 13.

By section 3 of the Statute of 1869, those sections of the Statute of 1868 are repealed. But section 1 of the later statute substantially re-enacts section 9 of the earlier one, substituting for the words "by endorsement in blank or by special endorsement," the words "by written endorsement thereon and delivery," and omitting the words "and to the same extent;" and section 2 re-enacts section 6, with the substitution, for the words "by endorsement thereon," [36] of the words "by endorsement in writing thereon, and the delivery thereof so endorsed," and, for the words "by such person or persons," of the words "thereby, as on the faith thereof." Missouri Laws 1869, p. 91.

The principal provisions of the Statute of 1869 then, as to all warehouse receipts and bills of lading (except those which have the words "not negotiable" plainly written or stamped upon their face), are, first, that they are "made negotiable by written endorsement thereon and delivery, in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes;" and, second, that any person "to whom the same may be transferred shall be deemed and held to be the owner of the goods," "so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien or transfer, given, made or created thereby, as on the faith thereof."

The first provision, while it doubtless gives the indorsee the right to sue thereon in his own name, does not, for the reasons fully stated by Mr. Justice Strong in delivering the judgment of this court in Shaw v. R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 557 [25: 892], attach to such an indorsement of the symbol of property the same effect which the common law gives to the indorsement of a bill of exchange or promissory note for the payment of a sum of money, nor confer upon persons making, upon a bill of lading indorsed in blank by the owner, an advance of money to a subsequent indorser whom they have reason to believe not to be the owner, the right to hold the goods against the true owner.

The second provision does not appear to have been brought to the notice of this court in that case, and presents more difficulty. It differs from the provision of the Factors' Act of New York, construed by the courts of that State and by this court in the cases before cited, in several important particulars: 1. Any person "to whom the same may be transferred" (instead of any person by whom it is transferred) "shall be deemed and held to be the owner." 2. The ensuing qualification is, "so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien or transfer, given, made or created thereby," which last word cannot possibly be referred to anything but the transfer aforesaid. 3. The words "as on the faith thereof" followed directly afterwards, without any intermediate mention of advances made by the transferee. In short, the New York Factors' Act declares that any agent entrusted with the possession of [37] goods, or of the symbol thereof, shall be deemed to be the true owner, so far as to give validity to a pledge made by him to another person for advances made by the latter "on the faith thereof;" but the Missouri Statute only declares that an indorsee of the symbol of property shall be deemed to be the owner, so far as to give validity to any pledge made to him by such indorsement "as on the faith thereof." The difficulty arises from the introduction of the words "on the faith thereof," borrowed from the Factors' Acts, into a statute relating to the negotiability of warehouse receipts and bills of lading, without sufficient regard to the difference in the terms and the objects of the two classes of statutes.

It may well be that, upon a view of the whole provision, it protects only bona fide indorsees. Whitlock v. Hay, 58 N. Y. 484, 487; Steiger v. Third Nat. Bank, 2 McCrary, 494, 496. But it is by no means clear that the mere fact that the indorsee of the bill of lading or warehouse receipt knows that the indorser is a factor and holds the goods as such is sufficient proof of bad faith. Under the English Factors' Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, extending the provisions of the Act of 6 Geo. IV, and protecting those advances only, which are "made bona fide and without notice that the agent making" the pledge "has not authority to make the same, or is acting mala fide in respect thereof against the owner" of the goods, it has been held by the highest authorities that knowledge that the agent making the pledge is a factor, without further notice that he is acting mala fide and beyond his authority, does not deprive the pledgee of the protection of the statute. Navulshaw v. Brownrigg, 1 Sim. N. S. 573, and S. C. 2 D. M. & G. 441; Vickers v. Hertz, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 113; Kaltenbach v. Lewis, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 617. Yet it may be doubted whether receiving, from persons known to be factors and to hold property as such, a pledge of the symbols of the property, to secure the payment of the general balance of their bank account with the pledgee, is consistent with good faith.

We have considered the question of the effect of the words "on the faith thereof," as used in [38] Missouri and elsewhere, at some length, because of the large space devoted to it in the arguments of counsel, and in order to put the whole matter in a clearer light. But it is not necessary to express a decisive opinion upon the meaning of those words, as they stand in the Missouri Statute of 1869, because upon a narrower ground it is quite clear that that statute affords no protection to the plaintiff.

That statute applies only to transfers of warehouse receipts and bills of lading by "endorsement in writing thereon and the delivery thereof so endorsed." The finding of facts contains this statement: "It is not shown whether or not the bills of lading or the warehouse receipts or any of them were endorsed in writing by J. H. Dowell & Co., or by any one, when transferred to the Bank, there being no evidence on this specific matter." The want of any evidence upon this point is perhaps to be explained by the facts, also found and stated, that upon the delivery of the warehouse receipts to the Bank the bills of lading were surrendered and canceled, and that the warehouse receipts ran to bearer, and were therefore probably not indorsed. But whatever be the explanation, the fact remains that it was not proved, and cannot be presumed, that either the bills of lading or the warehouse receipts were indorsed in writing, as required by the statute; and no better title passes by a transfer of the symbols without such indorsement than by a delivery of the goods which they represent. Rice v. Cutler, 17 Wis. 362, 369; Hirschorn v. Canney, 98 Mass. 149; Erie & Pacific Dispatch Co. v. St. Louis etc. Co. 6 Mo. App. 172; Fourth Nat. Bank v. St. Louis etc., Co. 11 Mo. App. 383.

The decision in Price v. Wisconsin F. & M. Ins. Co. 48 Wis. 267, on which the plaintiff much relied, was based both upon a warehouse receipt Act differing from that of Missouri in allowing the documents to be transferred "by delivery, with or without endorsement," and in not containing the words "as on the faith thereof;" and also upon other grounds inconsistent with the judgments of this court in Warner v. Martin, and Shaw v. R. R. Co. before cited.

[39] The Statute of Missouri of March 28, 1874, affixing a heavy penalty to the negotiation or pledge of bills of lading or warehouse receipts by an agent or consignee, without the written authority of the owner or consignor, does not change the law as to the validity of the transfer as between individuals. A transfer by an agent, that before was valid as between his principal and his transferee, is not invalidated by the statute. Gardner v. Gager, 1 Allen, 502. And with even stronger reason a transfer that was wholly invalid before is not rendered valid by being made a criminal offense. The proviso that any consignee or agent, lawfully possessed of a bill of lading or warehouse receipt, may pledge it to the extent of raising sufficient means to pay charges for storage or shipment, or for advances drawn for by the owner or consignor, has no application to this case; because this pledge was not made for either of those purposes, but to secure the factor's own debt to the pledgee.

Factors having no power, by the law of Missouri, to make a pledge of the goods of their principals by a transfer, without indorsement in writing, of the bills of lading or warehouse receipts, the finding of the circuit court, that the transactions between the factors and the plaintiff "were all according to the general usage of trade between banks and cotton factors at St. Louis," cannot aid the plaintiff; because the usage attempted to be set up was not shown to have been known to the defendants or to other owners of cotton; and because it was contrary to law, in that it undertook to alter the nature of the contract between the factors and their principals, which authorizes them to sell, but not to pledge, and in that it would sustain a pledge by a factor of the goods of several principals to secure the payment of his own general balance of account to a third person. Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 383 [19 : 987]; Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499 [28 : 225]; Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle, 195; Lehman v. Marshall, 47 Ala. 362; Leuckhart v. Cooper, 3 Bing. N. C. 99; S. C. 3 Scott, 521, and 2 Hodges, 150; Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802.

Nor is the further fact found that Dowell, the active member of the firm of J. H. Dowell & Co., the factors, was also a partner with the defendants in the working of the plantation at all material; because he had not been [40] held out by the defendants as the owner of the property, or as authorized by them to dispose of it otherwise than as a factor, and was not understood by the plaintiff to be acting in any other capacity. Rogers v. Batchelor, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 221 [9 : 1068]; Locke v. Lewis, 124 Mass. 1.

Although the general relation of a bank to its depositor is that of debtor and creditor, yet when, as in this case, a factor, holding property in trust for his principal, transfers it to a bank which has notice of the capacity in which he holds it, the principal may assert his right in the property against the bank, either by independent suit, or by way of defense to an action by the bank against him. The defendants in this case were therefore entitled to have the proceeds of their property, so received by the plaintiff, applied to the payment of the note in suit. National Bank v. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54 [26 : 693]; Baker v. New York Nat. Exch. Bank, 100 N. Y. 31; St. Louis Bank v. Ross, 9 Mo. App. 399. As those proceeds are found to have been more than sufficient to pay and satisfy this note and all other charges of the factors against the defendants, the plaintiff cannot maintain this action.

All the facts of the case being ascertained by the special finding of the court below, as they would be by the special verdict of a jury, there is no reason for awarding a new trial, but there must be a general judgment for the defendants. Fort Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150 [28 : 686].

Judgment reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to enter judgment for the original defendants.

[68] JOHN HAYES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF MISSOURI.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 68-72.)

Constitutional law—construction of Fourteenth Amendment—equal protection of the laws—number of peremptory challenges to jurors in criminal cases, a matter within legislative discretion, and may vary in different communities—Missouri Statute.

1. The Fourteenth Amendment does not prohibit legislation which is limited in the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed.

2. The power of the Legislature of a State to prescribe the number of peremptory challenges in criminal cases is limited only by the necessity of having an impartial jury. The number of such challenges is a matter of legislative discretion, and may vary according to the condition of different communities, and the difficulties in each of securing intelligent and impartial jurors.

3. The accused is entitled to an impartial jury, and if such a jury is obtained from those who remain, his constitutional right is maintained.

4. The provision of the Revised Statutes of Missouri allowing the State, in capital cases, fifteen peremptory challenges in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants, instead of eight as in other parts of the State, is a valid exercise of legislative discretion.

Submitted Jan. 5, 1887. Decided Jan. 17, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. Reported below, 81 Mo. 574. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Jeff. Chandler, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error was deprived of the equal protection of the laws, by being denied an advantage which the law would have extended to him had he been tried in any other part of the State.

Re Jilz, 3 Mo. App. 243; State v. Hays, 81 Mo. 586.

While the State may prescribe by law the relative number of peremptory challenges granted to either party in criminal prosecutions, such a law, as intimately affecting the administration of justice must, to be valid or constitutional, operate equally upon every citizen of the State.

Re Jilz, 3 Mo. App. 246.

By this statute, 1 Mo. R. S. § 1902, the prosecution is primarily permitted to set aside fifteen, it may be, of the very best men on the panel, some of whom the defendant might prefer as jurors to try his cause, thus depriving him of his right of choice to at least seven qualified jurors to which he would be entitled under the equal operation of the general law.

Generally and necessarily, an enlargement of the number of peremptory challenges allowed the State in capital cases detracts from the advantages of the accused, and magnifies his danger, while at the same time it multiplies the chances of the State for conviction.

Mr. B. G. Boone, Atty-Gen. of Missouri, for defendant in error:

Section 1902, Revised Statutes of Missouri, is not a special law. Plaintiff in error was not denied the equal protection of the law by reason of its existence.

State v. Tolle, 71 Mo. 650; State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340; Rutherford v. Jeddens, 82 Mo. 388.

Peremptory challenges of jurors are under legislative control.

Stokes v. People, 53 N.Y. 164; Walter v. People, 32 N. Y. 147; Commonwealth v. Walsh, 124 Mass. 32; Hartzell v. Commonwealth, 40 Pa. 462; Jones v. State and Boon v. State, 1 Ga. 610, 618; Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 173; State v. Wilson, 48 N. H. 398; Commonwealth v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412.

The constitutionality of statutes regulating challenge, when questioned, has uniformly been upheld.

Hartzell v. Commonwealth, 40 Pa. 462; Walston v. Commonwealth, 16 B. Mon. 15; Jones v. State, Boon v. State and Hudgins v. State, supra.

[69] Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The Revised Statutes of Missouri provide that, in all capital cases, except in cities having a population of over 100,000 inhabitants, the State shall be allowed eight peremptory challenges to jurors, and in such cities shall be allowed fifteen. Rev. Stat. Mo. §§ 1900, 1902.

The plaintiff in error, John Hayes, was indicted in the Criminal Court of St. Louis, a city of over 100,000 inhabitants, by its grand jury, for the crime of murder in shooting and killing one Mueller, in that city, on the 26th of August, 1881; and was tried in April, 1882, and convicted of murder in the first degree. A new trial having been obtained from the Supreme Court of the State, he was again tried in January, 1885, and convicted, as on the first trial, of murder in the first degree. Judgment of death followed. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, the judgment was affirmed, and the case is brought before us on error, upon the single ground that—by the law of Missouri providing that, in capital cases, in cities having a population of over 100,000 inhabitants, the State shall be allowed fifteen peremptory challenges to jurors, whilst elsewhere in Missouri the State is allowed in such cases, only eight peremptory challenges—the accused is denied the equal protection of the laws enjoined by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. When the jurors were summoned for the trial, and before any peremptory challenges were made by the State, the accused moved the court to limit the State's peremptory challenges to eight, objecting to its being allowed more than that number. But the motion was overruled, and the accused excepted. And on the trial, against his protest and objection, the State challenged, peremptorily, fifteen of the forty-seven qualified jurors.

The Constitution of Missouri, and, indeed, of every State of the Union, guarantees to all persons accused of a capital offense, or of a felony of lower grade, the right to a trial by an impartial jury, selected from the county or city where the offense is alleged to have been committed; and this implies that the jurors shall be free from all bias for or against the accused. [70] In providing such a body of jurors the State affords the surest means of protecting the accused against an unjust conviction, and at the same time of enforcing the laws against offenders meriting punishment. To secure such a body numerous legislative directions are necessary, prescribing the class from whom the jurors are to be taken, whether from voters, taxpayers and freeholders, or from the mass of the population indiscriminately; the number to be summoned from whom the trial jurors are to be selected; the manner in which their selection is to be made; the objections that may be offered to those returned and how such objections shall be presented, considered, and disposed of; the oath to be administered to those selected; the custody in which they shall be kept during the progress of the trial; the form and presentation of their verdict; and many other particulars. All these, it may be said in general, are matters of legislative discretion. But to prescribe whatever will tend to secure the impartiality of jurors in criminal cases is not only within the competency of the Legislature, but is among its highest duties. It is to be remembered that such impartiality requires not only freedom from any bias against the accused, but also from any prejudice against his prosecution. Between him and the State the scales are to be evenly held.

Experience has shown that one of the most effective means to free the jury box from men unfit to be there is the exercise of the peremptory challenge. The public prosecutor may have the strongest reasons to distrust the character of a juror offered, from his habits and associations, and yet find it difficult to formulate and sustain a legal objection to him. In such cases the peremptory challenge is a protection against his being accepted.

The number of such challenges must necessarily depend upon the discretion of the Legislature, and may vary according to the condition of different communities, and the difficulties in them of securing intelligent and impartial jurors. The whole matter is under its control. Stokes v. People, 53 N.Y. 164; Walter v. People, 32 N.Y. 147, 159; Commonwealth v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412, 418.

Originally, by the common law, the Crown could challenge peremptorily without limitation as to number. By Act of Parliament [71] passed in the time of Edward the First, the right to challenge was restricted to challenges for cause. But by a rule of court, the Crown was not obliged to show cause until the whole panel was called. Those not accepted on the call were directed to stand aside. If when the panel was gone through, a full jury was obtained, it was taken for the trial. If, however, a full jury was not obtained, the Crown was required to show cause against the jurors who had been directed to stand aside; and if no sufficient cause was shown, the jury was completed from them.

In this country the power of the Legislature of a State to prescribe the number of peremptory challenges is limited only by the necessity of having an impartial jury. In our large cities there is such a mixed population; there is such a tendency of the criminal classes to resort to them, and such an unfortunate disposition on the part of business men to escape from jury duty, that it requires special care on the part of the government to secure there competent and impartial jurors. And to that end it may be a wise proceeding on the part of the Legislature to enlarge the number of peremptory challenges in criminal cases tried in those cities. The accused cannot complain if he is still tried by an impartial jury. He can demand nothing more. Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642 [29:755]. The right to challenge is the right to reject, not to select a juror. If, from those who remain, an impartial jury is obtained, the constitutional right of the accused is maintained. In this case it is not even suggested that the jury by which the accused was tried was not a competent and impartial one. He was allowed twenty peremptory challenges, and it does not appear that he exhausted them.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred [72] and in the liabilities imposed. As we said in Barbier v. Connolly, speaking of the Fourteenth Amendment: "Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited; but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the Amendment." 113 U. S. 27, 32 [28:923, 925.]

In Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22 [25:989], it was held that the last clause of the Amendment as to the equal protection of the laws was not violated by any diversity in the jurisdiction of the several courts which the State might establish, as to subject matter, amount or finality of their decisions, if all persons within the territorial limits of their respective jurisdictions have an equal right in like cases, and under like circumstances, to resort to them for redress; that the State has the right to make political subdivisions of its territory for municipal purposes, and to regulate their local government; and that, as respects the administration of justice, it may establish one system of courts for cities and another for rural districts. And we may add that the systems of procedure in them may be different without violating any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Allowing the State fifteen peremptory challenges in capital cases tried in cities containing a population of over 100,000 inhabitants is simply providing against the difficulty of securing, in such cases, an impartial jury in cities of that size, which does not exist in other portions of the State. So far from defeating, it may furnish the necessary means of giving that equal protection of its laws to all persons, which that Amendment declares shall not be denied to any one within its jurisdiction.

We see nothing in the legislation of Missouri which is repugnant to that Amendment.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of that State, therefore, is affirmed.

Pleading—bill to charge wife of bankrupt with money received from him—demurrer, sustained.

A bill which seeks to charge the wife of a bankrupt with money received from him, but fails to name any fund now existing and does not seek a discovery, answer under oath being expressly waived, held bad on demurrer.

[No. 111.]

Argued for appellants, the court declining to hear further oral argument, Dec. 22, 1886. Decided Jan. 17, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Reported below, 14 Fed. Rep. 907. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George W. Parke, for appellants:

A person who holds property of any kind transferred in fraud of creditors, and not as a bona fide purchaser for value, is constructively a trustee for their benefit, and is to be held accountable as a trustee.

The assignees did not and do not propose to abandon pursuit of the secreted fund, but to follow the same, and when as matter of fact its identity is established, to ask for its application to their trust. Money and paper securities can be followed, and it is not necessary to identify the particular bonds, bills or coin, but only to identify the fund. The identity is a question of fact, not of law,—a matter for evidence.

Messrs. Henry C. Hutchins and James H. Young, for appellees:

The bill should state the claim of the plaintiff with accuracy and clearness. The material facts ought to be plainly yet succinctly alleged, and with all necessary and convenient certainty as to the essential circumstances of time, place, manner and other incidents.

The present suit is peculiarly of such a nature as to make the requirement of a specification of the property which the plaintiffs seek to recover an indispensable one; for the present bill, being against a married woman to recover property received by her from her husband, will lie only for the specific property shown to be in her possession. A judgment in personam for its value cannot be taken against her.

Phipps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3 (24 : 591).

A plaintiff who seeks relief on the ground of fraud is held to stringent rules of pleading. And if it is sought to set aside the bar of the Statute of Limitations on the ground that the cause of action has been fraudulently concealed, the plaintiff must in particular aver when and how the fraud was discovered and what the discovery is, so that the court may clearly see whether by ordinary diligence the discovery might not have been before made.

The bill waives the oath of the defendants and seeks no discovery. And even if the bill prayed discovery, it would be no less incumbent on the plaintiffs to make specific the charges they sought to establish by the evidence to be elicited by the discovery.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [79]
the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

It was decided in that court upon a demurrer to the bill of complaint, that the demurrer be sustained and the bill dismissed. The bill was brought by the present appellants, as assignees in bankruptcy of William A. Saunders, against said William A. Saunders and Mary P. Saunders, his wife, and, after alleging that, by due course of proceeding, William A. Saunders had been adjudged a bankrupt and the plaintiffs appointed assignees of his estate, it proceeds to say that they have discovered, within one year, "and been first informed of facts and circumstances upon which they believe, and therefore aver, that the said bankrupt, without consideration, transferred to and placed in the hands of his wife, the said Mary P. Saunders, a large amount of personal property in the form of money, bonds, stocks and other securities, none of which can your orators more particularly describe, because all particular information is refused by the bankrupt and his wife and the persons managing the property for them, and because the same has been invested for income, and often changed in form by reinvestment and in pursuance of devices for more effectual concealment." Then it is further averred that "said property is of the value of about forty thousand dollars, and was so transferred by said bankrupt to his said wife for the purpose of concealing the same from his creditors and from these assignees, and to delay, hinder, and defraud his creditors, he being then deeply indebted, and to an amount wholly beyond his means and ability to liquidate and pay, so that he was hopelessly insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy." The prayer of the bill is "that said Mary P. Saunders, the respondent, may fully, truly and particularly answer this bill, but not under oath, which is hereby waived," and for a decree that said property may be held to belong to the assets of said William A. Saunders in bankruptcy, and the respondent compelled to transfer and deliver the property, or the proceeds thereof, in whatever form existing, to the plaintiffs, as assets of the bankrupt, and for further and other relief.

The imperfections of this bill are very obvious. Counsel for appellants, conceding the doctrine of Phippe v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3 [24 : 591], and Trust Co. v. Sedgwick, 97 U. S. 304 [24 : 954], that a wife cannot be held liable to a personal judgment for money received of her husband during the marital relation, argues that this bill is an attempt to proceed against a fund in her hands; but as no particular fund is named, as no particular set of securities or description of them is given in the bill, as no place is named where they are deposited, nor any person, even the wife, as holding them, as no real estate is mentioned as belonging to this fund, as the nature and character of the conversion made of the fund after it came to the hands of the wife is not set forth, it seems impossible to maintain such a bill as seeking to lay hold of and appropriate a particular fund coming from the bankrupt himself, or even the proceeds of such a fund. As was very pertinently asked by the circuit judge in his opinion sustaining the demurrer, what relief could be given by the court, or what decree could be granted on this bill, if it were taken pro confesso, no opposition being made to it? 14 Fed. Rep. 907. It is not possible to see what decree could be made or what relief could be given. It is not a bill of discovery, because the answer under oath of the defendant is expressly waived. No interrogatories are propounded to either of the defendants; no effort made to obtain from them, or either of them, by way of sworn answer, anything which could be used as evidence in the case. An issue of a general denial of the truth of the bill would leave nothing on which evidence could be introduced. It is in fact what is familiarly known as a "fishing bill." The plaintiffs allege no distinct fact which the defendants or either of them can be called upon to deny. The plaintiffs do not say positively that any of the allegations of the bill are true, but the substance of what they say is that they have received certain information which excites their suspicion; and this information is so vague, so uncertain and indefinite as it regards any fund or any particular sum of money or bonds, or any time or occasion when they were placed in the control of the female defendant, that, unless we are prepared to establish the proposition that whenever a married woman is suspected of having received money from her husband to the prejudice of his creditors, she must be brought up to answer, and not under oath, as to what she has done with it, this bill must be held to be insufficient.

In the case of Phippe v. Sedgwick [supra], which is a case somewhat analogous to this, this court said: "While the Statutes of New York have recognized certain rights of the wife to deal with and contract in reference to her separate property, they fall far short of establishing the principle that out of that separate property she can be made liable for money or property received at her husband's hands, which in equity ought to have gone to pay his debts. Equity has been ready, where such property remains in her hands, to restore it to its proper use, but not to hold her separate estate liable for what she has received, and probably spent at his dictation. Such a proposition would be a very unjust one to the wife while under the dominion, control, and personal influence of the husband. In receiving favors at his hands, which she supposed to be the offerings of affection, or a proper provision for her comfort, she would be subjecting that which was her own, or which might afterwards come to her from other sources, to unknown and unsuspected charges, of the amount and nature of which she would be wholly ignorant. It answers the demands of justice in such cases if the creditor, finding the property itself in her hands or in the hands of one holding it with notice, appropriates it to pay his debt. But if it is beyond his reach, the wife should no more be held liable for it than if the husband himself had spent it in support of his family, or even of his own extravagance."

To this principle we adhere; and, as there is no statement or description or reference in this bill to any fund now existing arising out of the bankrupt's gift to his wife, and no call for discovery in regard to any such fund, but an express waiver of an answer under oath, we think the bill was properly dismissed.

SARAH E. RAMSAY, Widow in Community, AND ANNA E. WAGNER, Heir of G. ALEXANDER RAMSAY, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 214-223.)

Internal revenue—informer's share under Acts of Congress—effect of repealing Act—letter of Secretary of Treasury.

The judgment of the court below for a share claimed by an informer under the internal revenue laws, involving the construction of the repealing Act of 1872 as to the fees of informers in cases in which the amount of the penalty was not then fixed, and the effect of a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is affirmed by a divided court.

Submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Affirmed by divided court Jan. 17, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 21 Court of Claims, 443.

This is an appeal from a judgment on demurrer rendered by the court below in favor of the appellees against the United States for the sum of $1,700.

The facts are in substance, as follows:

In pursuance of information given by G. Alexander Ramsay, now deceased, late of the State of Louisiana, in the year 1871, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, suit was instituted in the name of the United States against the Houston and Central Railway Company, of Texas, for forty penalties of $1,000 each, such penalties being for alleged frauds on the internal revenue of the United States.

The suit was compromised in June, 1874, the railway company paying the sum of $15,694.08; $5,000 of this amount being in lieu of penalties.

Mr. Ramsay, after the compromise of the suit, applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as informer, under the provisions of section 179 of the Act of June 30, 1864, 13, Stat. at L. 304, as amended by the Act of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 145.

It appears from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury dated November 6, 1885, and addressed to George A. King, attorney for G. Alexander Ramsay, that, as shown by the records of the Treasury Department, the application of Mr. Ramsay for compensation was never formally rejected. The Secretary writes:

"The record of the office on this point is that Mr. Ramsay was notified by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he was not entitled to the share for which he made application, because the Act of June 6, 1872, repealing informers' shares, went into effect before the case in which he claimed the share had been compromised, and that the claim was merely marked 'too late;' that no finding or award was made, and that no letter of rejection was written by the Secretary to the claimant."

Mr. Ramsay not succeeding in obtaining payment from the Secretary of the Treasury, filed his petition in the court of claims, where it was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 14 Ct. Cl. 367.

Subsequently the attorney of Ramsay wrote to the present Secretary of the Treasury, requesting him to take up said claim to ascertain as required by law whether the said Ramsay was or was not the informer, to determine the share falling due to him as such under the terms of the said circular, and, having determined the question, either to order the claim paid or to refer it, under section 1063 R. S. to the court of claims for adjudication. It was in response to this request that the Secretary of the Treasury wrote said letter to Mr. King, dated November 6, 1885. In this letter the Secretary refused to comply with Mr. King's request either to pay the claim or to refer it to the court of claims. The Secretary states a fact which has never been disputed, and was recognized in the trial of Ramsay v. U. S.; viz., that "George Alexander Ramsay was the first informer against the Houston and Texas Railway Company, and that the information given by him led to the recovery from said company of penalties amounting to $5,000."

The Secretary asserted that he is not bound by the construction of the said repealing law made by his predecessor: "Nevertheless as the construction referred to has been applied, as I am informed, to a large number of cases, and has been acquiesced in from 1875 to the present time, I prefer not to set it aside without the authority of a judicial construction, and therefore I decline to award or order the payment of the share claimed by Mr. Ramsay in the above case."

The appellees claim that said letter is a decision by the Secretary that Mr. Ramsay was entitled to his share as informer, and that the same should be paid to them; that the refusal of the accounting officers to pay in accordance with such fact is unwarranted, and the court of claims has jurisdiction to enforce payment; that the decision of the Treasury Department that Mr. Ramsay was not entitled to receive $1,700, by reason of the repealing statute aforesaid, is wrong; and that notwithstanding such repealing Act the informer's share under the Act of 1866 is legally due claimant.

The appellant claims that the subject matter of the claim is res judicata; that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was not a formal adjudication; that said letter was in effect a refusal to comply with claimant's request, or to disturb the rulings already made by the department; and that the repealing Act of 1872 left the claimant without legal remedy, the amount of the penalty not then having been fixed.

The court below sustained the position of the claimants and entered judgment in their favor for $1,700, as above stated.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and E. P. Dewees, assistant attorney, for appellant:

The court held in the Ramsay Case, 14 Ct. Cl. 367, that the power conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the Act of 1866, that he "shall determine whether any claimant is entitled to any such share as above limited and to whom the same shall be paid," vested the exclusive jurisdiction as to the determination of such facts in the Secretary of the Treasury, and the petition was thereupon dismissed. The point then decided is the point again raised by the present petition and the letter exhibit. It is a controversy adjudicated.

Hughes v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 237 (18: 305); Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 592 (18: 558).

The ruling and decision of the Secretary of the Treasury that, by reason of the repealing Act of 1872, claimant is not entitled to informer's fees under the provisions of the Act of 1866 is correct.

Not only did no right vest in Mr. Ramsay prior to the date of the compromise, but the Secretary of the Treasury had the power at any time to deprive him of the benefit conferred upon him as informer by remitting the penalty.

Much stronger cases than the present have been decided adversely to informers by this court.

Confiscation Cases, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 454 (19 196).

A defendant is discharged by the repeal of the law.

Norris v. Crocker, 54 U. S. 13 How. 429 (14: 210); U. S. v. Mann, 1 Gall. 177 The section of the statute authorizing informers'-pay being repealed, the power of the Secretary to direct payment is, as a consequence, gone.

The statute being repealed, no measure of damage exists. No judgment can be rendered in a suit after the repeal of the Act under which it was brought.

[41] COUNTY OF NEMAHA, Plff. in Err.

v.

AUGUSTUS FRANK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 41-46.)

Precinct bonds—when action lies against county—practice—error without prejudice.

1. An action lies against a county on municipal bonds issued by a precinct where payment is to be made from a special tax to be levied by the county commissioners upon the property within the precinct.

2. Where the plaintiff obtained no advantage and the defendant suffered no detriment, by the action of the court below in striking out part of the answer, the error, if any, is not sufficient ground for reversal.

Submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Jan. 17, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John M. Thurston, Walter J. Lamb and J. S. Stull, for plaintiff in error:

In Nebraska, precincts are not now nor have they ever been corporations, or possessed of any corporate power, privileges or franchises whatever. The character of precincts under the laws of Nebraska, and the relation of the several officers to these subdivisions of the county, is such that the county commissioners possess no implied power or authority whatever as respects them, and there is no statute in force in that State giving them authority to bind the taxpayers by any recitals whatever in the bonds to be issued by them, nor have they any power over the matter except to issue aid bonds within the narrow limits defined in the letter of the statutes.

State v. Dodge Co. 10 Neb. 21.

The grant of power to vote bonds in aid of works of internal improvement gave the precinct no authority to enter into a stock speculation and vote and issue bonds with which to buy stock.

Jonesboro City v. Cairo & St. L. R. R. Co. 110 U. S. 192 (28: 116).

The commissioners and voters had no power to depart from the strict letter of the law or to obtain or issue bonds by any attractive scheme whatever.

Scipio v. Wright, 101 U. S. 665 (25: 1037); Marsh v. Fulton Co. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 681 (19: 1042).

If the authority to issues bonds for a political subdivision of the county is not found in the law, the bonds are void.

Harshman v. Bates Co. 92 U. S. 578 (23: 747).

An issue of bonds which in itself, by the very terms of the proposition authorizing its issue, was in excess of 10 per cent of the entire assessed valuation of the precinct at the time the voting was had and the bonds issued, is illegal and absolutely void.

Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 83 (28: 360).

Mr. J. M. Woolworth, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by Augustus Frank, a citizen of the State of New York, for the purpose of enforcing the payment of the interest coupons on certain municipal bonds alleged to have been issued by the County of Nemaha, on behalf of Brownville precinct in said County, to aid in the construction of the Brownville, Fort Kearney and Pacific Railroad, in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska. The petition alleges, that, by virtue of an Act entitled "An Act to Enable Counties, Cities and Precincts to Borrow Money on Their Bonds, or to Issue Bonds to Aid in the Construction or Completion of Works of Internal Improvement in this State, and to Legalize Bonds Already Issued for Such Purposes," passed on the 15th day of February, 1869, the board of commissioners of the County of Nemaha issued the special bonds or written obligations of said Brownville precinct, on the 20th day of August, 1870, to aid in the construction of the Brownville, Fort Kearney and Pacific Railroad, and delivered the same to the company authorized to construct said road; that prior to the issue of said bonds the proposition to issue the same was duly submitted to the voters of said Brownville precinct, in strict accordance with the provisions of the said Act of the Legislature, and that a large majority voted for said proposition; that, during the years 1871 and 1872, the said Brownville precinct and the board of county commissioners duly paid the coupons then falling due by means of a tax levied for that purpose, but for the years 1878 and 1879 they have failed and refused to pay the same or to levy a tax therefor. The petition also alleges that, on or about the 20th of February, 1871, for a valuable consideration, the bonds and coupons were transferred in good faith to John Fitzgerald, and by him to the plaintiff. [42]

An answer was filed by Nemaha County, as defendant, containing the following matter:

"The total amount of the bonds so issued and sold, being one series, under one proposition, amounted to one hundred thousand dollars. The said bonds and coupons were voted upon the following contract and conditions and none other: At the time of the vote for said bonds certain persons were attempting to organize a railroad corporation under the name of the Brownville, Fort Kearney and Pacific Railroad Company, the identical same organization named in said bonds, with a capital stock of two million dollars, but were unable to organize it because unable to obtain a payment on said amount of stock of 10 per cent thereof, as required by law, precedent to the right to do business; they considered and treated said series of one hundred thousand in bonds as one one-hundred-thousand-dollar cash subscription all paid up in cash in advance; and, also, they treated and considered bonds of the City of Brownville situated within the said precinct of Brownville mentioned in the petition, of the nominal sum of sixty thousand dollars, as sixty [43] thousand dollars cash subscription paid up in cash in advance, all as capital stock of said railroad company, aggregating one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, so considered and treated as cash capital stock paid in; but by considering the said bonds of the nominal sum of $160,000 as one hundred and sixty thousand dollars in money paid in on the capital stock, there was still an insufficient amount paid in to enable the company to do business, there being no cash paid in except on a few private subscriptions, and not exceeding ten thousand dollars, so that even by treating said bonds as money there was still a deficiency of thirty thousand dollars of the amount prescribed by law as a condition precedent to the organization of the company for the purpose of transacting any of the business for which it was sought to be organized. Defendant, therefore, denies that said railroad company was ever a corporation with power to transact business or to receive municipal bonds for its aid.

"Defendant, therefore, avers that neither said precinct nor said county had any power or authority to aid in the organization of said railroad company by subscribing its stock or in any other manner. Defendant further avers that said pretended railroad company never either filed or recorded its articles of incorporation, if any it ever had, in any county in the State of Nebraska, as by law it was compelled to do prior to its existence as a corporation.

In the transactions of issuing said bonds by defendant, and of receiving the same by said pretended railroad company, neither the defendant nor the said company had any power to act, and all the acts therein on both sides are and ever have been ultra vires and null and void.

"The proposition submitted to the voters of said precinct as a basis of the right to issue said bonds was a proposition to subscribe by said precinct one hundred thousand dollars in stock and shares in the capital stock of said pretended railroad company, and pay the same in bonds aforesaid.

"The total assessed valuation of all the property in the said precinct, as shown by the last assessment preceding the issuing of said bonds, was $920,000, and the issue of $100,000 in bonds was in excess of the amount allowed by law."

The plaintiff having filed a reply afterwards
[44] moved the court to strike out from the answer of the defendant all the forgoing matter as immaterial and irrelevant. This motion was sustained by the court, to which ruling the defendant excepted. Upon the pleadings as thus amended the cause was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered, to reverse which this writ of error has been sued out and prosecuted.

This ruling of the court in striking out this portion of the answer is alleged as error. For the purposes of the argument we shall assume what is claimed by the plaintiff in error, that the matter stricken out was material and relevant. The defenses intended to to be raised by it were, that in two particulars the bonds in question were void as not having been issued in conformity with law. The sections of the Statute of 1869, in pursuance of which it is alleged they were issued, are as follows:

"Section 1. That any county or city in the State of Nebraska is hereby authorized to issue bonds to aid in the construction of any railroad, or any other work of internal improvement, to an amount to be determined by the county commissioners of such county or the city council of such city, not exceeding ten per centum of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in said county or city, provided the county commissioners or city council shall first submit the question of the issuing of such bonds to a vote of the legal voters of said county or city in the manner provided by chapter nine of the Revised Statutes of the State of Nebraska, for submitting to the people of a county the question of borrowing money.

"Section 7. Any precinct in any organized county of this State shall have the privilege of voting to aid works of internal improvement, and be entitled to all the privileges conferred upon counties and cities by the provisions of this Act; and in such case the precinct election shall be governed in the same manner as is provided in this Act, so far as the same is applicable, and the county commissioners shall issue special bonds for such precinct; and the tax to pay the same shall be levied upon the property within the bounds of such precinct. Such precinct bonds shall be the same as other bonds, [45] but shall contain a statement showing the special nature of such bonds."

The averments in that portion of the answer stricken out are in substance: 1, that the bonds were illegal and void because not issued to a company authorized by the statute to receive them; and 2, that they were illegal and void because issued in excess of the amount of 10 per centum of the assessed valuation of the taxable property in said precinct. The answer of the defendant, in addition to the matter stricken out, contains the following: "Defendant has no knowledge as to whether the plaintiff is a bona fide holder of said bonds, or any part thereof, or whether he purchased them before due or paid any value therefor, or purchased them at all, and, therefore, for the purpose of raising the issue and procuring the proof thereon by compulsory process, defendant denies the allegations of the petition on that subject, and also denies each and every allegation contained in said petition, except such as it has herein expressly admitted in this answer."

This clause in the answer remained and formed the issue which was tried. It is a general denial of each and every allegation of the petition, as no allegation of the petition was otherwise admitted in the answer. It therefore put the plaintiff upon proof of every fact necessary to constitute the cause of action set out in his petition, and embraced a denial of the legality and validity of the bonds, and the lawfulness of their issue and delivery. It required the plaintiff to show by competent proof that he was owner of the coupons sued on, taken from bonds in fact executed by the defendant, issued in accordance with law, and delivered to a party competent to receive the title. It permitted proof on the part of the defendant of every fact which tended to establish that the bonds were illegal and void. It follows, therefore, that every defense which was open to the defendant under that portion of the answer stricken out was equally open to it under the answer as it stood at the trial. The plaintiff obtained no advantage, and the defendant suffered no detriment, by the ruling of the court requiring that portion of the answer to be [44] stricken out. The action of the court in granting the motion did not, therefore, prejudice the defendant. It does not appear from this record what took place at the trial. There is no bill of exceptions which shows what evidence, if any, the defendant offered, or whether any that he did offer was rejected. For aught that appears, the very matters which he might have offered in evidence, under that portion of the answer stricken out, were in fact offered and received under the pleadings as they stood at the time of the trial.

It seems also to be objected to the judgment rendered against the County of Nemaha that the coupons sued on are not the obligations of the County. It is said that the bonds are precinct bonds, issued by the county commissioners of the County, the duty to pay which rests upon the precinct alone; the mode of payment being by means of a tax to be levied by the county commissioners upon the property within the bounds of the precinct. It is, therefore, argued that no action will lie against the County in respect to these bonds and coupons, except in case of the refusal of the county commissioners to levy the tax when it ought to be levied, when a mandamus is the sole remedy, being the one prescribed by the statute. This question has been set at rest by the previous decisions of this court. Davenport v. Dodge Co. 105 U. S. 237 [26:1018], and Blair v. Cuming County, 111 U. S. 363 [28:457], are decisions upon the very point arising under the same statute.

There is, therefore, no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

v.

JAMES R. DOOLITTLE, JAMES R. DOOLITTLE, JR., AND HENRY McKEY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 73-78.)

Parties—joint defendants—admission of joint liability under Illinois Statute—evidence—practice—length of hypothetical questions within discretion of the court—verdict for professional and other services.

1. Under a Statute of Illinois, in a joint action the joint liability of the defendants is admitted by them if not denied by plea in abatement, or a plea in bar.

2. Where the defendants are jointly liable the declarations of one are admissible against both.

3. The length of hypothetical statements, presented to a witness to ascertain his opinion, depends upon the character of the transactions recited, and must, in a great degree, be left to the discretion of the trial court. In the case presented the questions, though long, are sustained, the court below having properly instructed the jury in regard to them.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald and John M. Butler, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Melville W. Fuller, J. R. Doolittle, and J. R. Doolittle, Jr., for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover compensation for services rendered by the plaintiffs below to the defendants, in effecting a sale of certain lands in Indiana, and in various legal proceedings concerning the title, or claims against them. The declaration alleges a joint contract, and liability by the defendants below, Caroline Forsyth and Jacob Forsyth, her husband; but the summons was served on her only. She appeared and pleaded the general issue. A Statute of Illinois provides that in actions on contracts, express or implied, against two or more defendants as [74] partners, joint obligors, or payors, proof of their joint liability or partnership shall not be required to entitle the plaintiff to judgment, unless such proof shall be rendered necessary by a plea in abatement, or a plea in bar, denying the partnership or joint liability, verified by affidavit. The joint contract and liability of the defendants, therefore, stood admitted by the pleadings; and this is a sufficient answer to several objections taken to the admissibility of statements and the proof of acts of the defendant, Jacob Forsyth. Being jointly liable with Caroline on the contract in suit, his declarations respecting the services rendered under it were as admissible as if made by her.

The services for which compensation is sought were not only those required of attorneys and counselors at law, but were also those of negotiators seeking to accomplish the result desired, by consultation with proposed purchasers and presentation to them of the advantages to be derived from the property, present and prospective. Varied as were the legal services of the plaintiffs, it is plain from the testimony that those rendered by negotiation and consultation, and presentation of the uses to which the property could be applied, were far more effective and important. This fact necessarily had a controlling weight in estimating the value of the services. It is difficult to apply to such services any fixed standard by which they can be measured, and their value determined, as can be done with reference to services purely professional. There is a tact and skill and a happy manner with some persons, which render them successful as negotiators; while others of equal learning, attainments, and intellectual ability, fail for the want of those qualities. The compensation to be made in such cases is, by the ordinary judgment of business men, measured by the results obtained. It is not limited by the time occupied or the labor bestowed. It is from overlooking the difference in the rule by which compensation is measured in such cases, and that in cases where the services are strictly of a professional nature, that several objections are urged for reversal of the judgment recovered which, if this difference were regarded, would not be seriously pressed.

[75] The services rendered related to so many different subjects that it would require a long narrative to describe them with much detail. It is sufficient for the consideration of the questions not disposed of by what has already been said, to state generally the main facts of the case. Caroline Forsyth, for several years before the employment of the plaintiffs, had been the owner of a tract of land consisting of 8,000 acres in Indiana, about sixteen miles from Chicago. Only about 1,000 acres of it were fit for cultivation. The principal value of the tract was owing to its proximity to Chicago, and to the belief that it could be made use of for manufacturing and commercial purposes as a suburb of that city. It yielded no revenue; there were taxes due upon it, and portions of it had been sold for taxes. It was subject to a mortgage for $168,000, executed in 1875, upon a loan of $100,000, which, with the stipulated interest to maturity, amounted to that sum; and a suit had been commenced by its holders in the Circuit Court of the United States in Indiana for its foreclosure, and the sale of the premises.

The defendants were without means to meet the mortgage debt or pay the taxes due, or even the expenses of agents dealing with the property, and relied entirely upon effecting a sale to obtain what was needed for these several demands. The defendants had previously made an effort to sell the property to a stock company in London, and had signed certain documents for that purpose. The company claimed a right to a conveyance, pursuant to a contract made upon the supposed authority of those documents. Another party, by the name of Horne, claimed that he had negotiated a sale, and was demanding $50,000 for his services.

It was when the property was in this condition, and when its entire loss seemed highly probable, from the inability of the defendants to meet the demands pressing for payment, that the plaintiffs were retained to help them out of their complicated embarrassments and effect a sale of the property; the defendants promising them, in case of success, compensation which should be "large, liberal and generous." The plaintiffs entered upon their employment and, [76] during the following nine months, by arduous labor, constant negotiation and great tact, they accomplished what was desired. The suit to foreclose the mortgage was resisted, and its dismissal obtained. The property was sold for $1,000,000, one third of which was paid in cash, and the balance secured by mortgage on the property. The existing mortgage was then redeemed, a large reduction from the amount claimed having been first obtained. The taxes and other debts were paid and the claim of Horne was compromised and settled. A suit, commenced pending these proceedings, by the trustee of the London stock company, to compel a conveyance of the property, was defended and ultimately defeated. It would serve no useful purpose to detail the number of particulars in which the skill and tact of the plaintiffs were exhibited. The claim made by them for compensation was resisted, and this action was thereupon brought. The jury found that it should have been $40,000 and gave their verdict for that amount. Of the justice of this amount we are not to determine. We are called upon only to see whether any error was committed in the manner in which the case was submitted to the jury.

We see nothing in the objection that evidence was admitted as to the character of the land sold, or its possible value as a future suburb of Chicago. Its character in this respect might increase or diminish the chances of its sale. The only points which we find in the record calling for examination arose from the hypothetical statements submitted to witnesses, with inquiry as to the value of the services thus supposed to have been rendered. There were such hypothetical statements upon five subjects, which embraced matters that were to be disposed of before the consummation of the contract of sale. They embody with some fullness the matters supposed by the plaintiffs to have been established, and it was only upon that assumption that the opinions of the witnesses as to the value of the services rendered were given. If the assumption was erroneous, if the matters supposed to be established were not in the judgment of the jury in truth established, the opinions went for nothing; and so the court instructed the jury. Its language was as follows:

"As to the questions, you must understand [77] that they are not evidence; they are mere statements to these witnesses, called by the respective parties, of what the party putting these questions claims the proof shows was the nature and amount of plaintiffs' services rendered; and, upon the hypothesis or assumption of these questions the witnesses are asked to give their estimate of the value of these services. You must readily see that the value of the answers to these questions depends largely, if not wholly, upon the fact whether the statements made in these questions are sustained by the proof. If the statements in these questions are not supported by the proof, then the answers to the questions are entitled to no weight, because based upon false assumptions or statements of facts."

And as to the estimate of the value placed by the witnesses upon the services, the language of the court to the jury was as follows:

"You are not bound by the estimate which these witnesses have put upon these services. They are proper to be considered by you, as part of the proof bearing upon the question of value, as the testimony of men experienced in such matters, and whose judgment may aid yours. But it is your duty, after all, to settle and determine this question of value from all the testimony in the case and to award to the plaintiffs such amount, by your verdict, as the proof satisfies you is a reasonable compensation for the services which, from the proof, you find plaintiffs rendered, after deducting the amount the plaintiffs have already received for such services."

The length of the hypothetical statements is urged as an objection to them. They were lengthy even without the exhibits, which constituted the larger portion; but the court took especial care to impress upon the jury that they were not to consider the statements as facts in the case, but merely as assumptions of the party propounding the questions. Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 464, 479. The witnesses do not appear to have been confused by their length; they expressed no inability to fully comprehend them. Nor did the court, though complaining of their length, indicate that they were unintelligible to the jury, or tended in any way to turn their minds from the points in issue.

The length of hypothetical statements presented to a witness, to ascertain his opinion upon any matter growing out of the facts supposed, will necessarily depend upon the simple or complicated character of the transactions recited, and the number of particulars which must be considered for the formation of the opinion desired. And this subject, like the extent to which the examination of a witness may be allowed, must, in a great degree, be left to the discretion of the court.

We do not see that the rights of the defendants were at all prejudiced by them.

The judgment, therefore, must be affirmed and it is so ordered.

Constitutional law—valuation of railroad property—Arkansas Statute—part of, invalid—ministerial officers may disregard such part—Fourteenth Amendment.

1. That part of the Arkansas Act of 1883, relating to the valuation of railroad property for purposes of assessment, which excludes from the schedules of such property "embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles or bridges," is invalid, being in conflict with the Constitution of that State.

2. The action of the proper officers in including such property in the valuation of the railroad represented by the complainants did not deprive them of their property without due process of law, within the Fourteenth Amendment.

3. An unconstitutional enactment binds no one, and when clearly so, ministerial officers may properly disregard it, although it may not be wise, as a rule, for them to pass upon the validity of legislation prescribing their duties.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas. Dismissed.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field:

In the first of the above entitled cases the plaintiff, the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway, is a corporation created under the laws of Arkansas, and operates a railroad from Little Rock to Fort Smith, in that State, running through several counties in its route. The defendants are the sheriffs of those counties, and ex officio collectors of taxes therein. The suit was brought to enjoin them from collecting certain taxes assessed and levied for the year 1885 on what is termed in the Revenue Act of the State as the "railroad track" of the Corporation, upon the alleged ground that the board of railroad commissioners of the State exceeded its powers by including unauthorized elements in the estimate of its value. That term "railroad track" embraces all fixed railroad property of the Corporation, and is assessed for purposes of taxation as real estate. [98]

In the second of the above entitled cases, the plaintiffs, who are citizens of Massachusetts, and trustees under a mortgage executed by the Railway Company upon its railroad and land grant, filed their bill of complaint against the same Collectors to restrain the collection of the same taxes. Subsequently the bill was amended by joining the county clerks of the several counties on the line of the railway as defendants, with prayers for injunctions restraining them from doing the several acts which the Revenue Act requires them to perform in connection with and subsequently to the sale of the railroad track.

By a Statute of Arkansas, passed in 1883, the Governor, Secretary of State, and Auditor of Public Accounts were constituted a board of railroad commissioners for the State, and required on the first Monday of April of each year to ascertain the value of all property, real and personal, of every railroad company existing under the laws of the State, including therein the railroad track, rolling stock, water, and wood stations, passenger and freight depots, offices and furniture. And it was made the duty of the company in March, 1883, and every second year thereafter when required, to prepare and file with the Secretary of State a statement or schedule showing the length of its main and side tracks, switches and turn outs in each county, in which the road is located, and in each city and town through or into which its road may run; also the value of all improvements, stations and structures, including the railroad track located on the right of way; but the statute declares that "such schedule shall not include nor value embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles, or bridges." [99]

The statute also required the board of railroad commissioners to meet on the first Monday of April in each year, at the office of the Secretary of State, and examine the lists or schedules of the description and value of the railroad track of the railroad companies filed with the Secretary of State; and if the schedules are made out in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and in the opinion of the board the valuation of the railroad track is fair and reasonable, it shall appraise the same, and the Secretary of State shall certify to the assessor of each county, in which the railroad is located, so much of the list as values the railroad track located in the county and in any city or town thereof; and the assessors shall list and assess the same as real estate.

The Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway, under this statute, made a return of the length of its main and side tracks; and of the value thereof; and of the improvements and structures, including the railroad track on its right of way; but omitted in its estimate the value of the embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles and bridges, following in this respect the directions of the statute.

At a subsequent meeting, the board passed a resolution declaring that all property of railroad companies in the State should be assessed at its true value, without regard to the restrictions and limitations mentioned, by which the value of the embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles and bridges is excluded from the schedule of their property; that, after full examination and consultation, it had determined that such limitations and restrictions were unconstitutional, and that it was not bound thereby. The several railroad companies were, therefore, requested to render full statements of their property, of whatever kind or description, and the [100] true value thereof, without regard to the restrictions and limitations mentioned. A hearing was accorded to the companies by the board; but its conclusion was not changed, and it proceeded to include in the assessment of the railroad track the value of the embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles and bridges. The assessment was thereby largely increased. The plaintiff thereupon commenced the present suit to restrain the collection of the taxes, setting forth the matters above mentioned, and alleging that it was unable to state to what extent the assessment of its property was increased by this action of the board, as the increase was incapable of separation from the whole. It charged, therefore, that the whole assessment was vitiated and rendered void by this unlawful action of the board, and prayed an injunction to restrain the collection of the taxes based upon it.

The defendants appeared in the suit and demurred to the complaint. The court in which the suit was commenced sustained the demurrer and dismissed the suit. The Supreme Court of the State, on appeal, affirmed the decree of the court below, and the case is now brought here for review.

In the second suit—the one from the federal court—the defendants appeared and pleaded in bar the decree in the above case in the state court, and also, by leave of the court, demurred to the complaint. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. From its decree the case is brought here on appeal.

Mr. C. W. Huntington, for plaintiff in error and appellants:

The plaintiffs contend that the construction given by the state court changes the whole scheme of taxation provided for by the Act, at least so far as relates to the valuation and taxation of the "railroad track" of railway corporations, and substitutes judicial legislation for that of the law-making power.

They also claim that the effect of such construction is either to leave the "railroad track" not subject to taxation, or subject to taxation only under the Act of 1879.

The provisions in sections 46, 47 and 49 of the Act relate entirely and exclusively to the valuation and assessment of the "railroad track" of railway corporations. Their purpose was to provide for that sole object. Some of those provisions the state court decides are void, and nothing remains except provisions which not simply nullify and defeat, but completely reverse the entire scheme of the Legislature in relation to this subject. This case falls within the rule laid down by this court in Trade Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82 (25:550), reaffirmed in Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 269 (29:185); Presser v. Ill. 116 U. S. 252 (29:615).

We respectfully submit that it is beyond the power of the judiciary thus to legislate and to enact that a mode of valuation expressly prohibited by the Legislature can be substituted for the mode in express terms prescribed by the Legislature.

Mr. Daniel W. Jones, Atty-Gen. of Arkansas, for defendants in error and appellees.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

The Constitution of Arkansas of 1874 provides that "All property subject to taxation shall be taxed according to its value, to be ascertained in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, making the same equal and uniform throughout the State," and that "no [101] one species of property, from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value."

The following property is declared to be exempt from taxation: "Public property used exclusively for public purposes; churches used as such; cemeteries used exclusively as such; school buildings and apparatus; libraries and grounds used exclusively for school purposes; and buildings and grounds and materials used exclusively for public charity." And the Constitution declares that "All laws exempting property from taxation other than is provided" therein "shall be void."

As thus seen, no part of the property of railroad companies in the State is exempt from taxation, and any law which exempts it is in express terms declared to be void. But laws which indirectly produce such exemption must be equally inoperative. That cannot be accomplished indirectly which the organic law declares shall not be done directly. The assessment of property, that is, the appraisement and estimate of its value, is the basis upon which the amount of the tax is fixed. A law, therefore, omitting from assessment portions of any particular property, thus lessening the estimate of its value, has the effect of exempting it to that extent from taxation. That result cannot be accomplished, as well observed by the Supreme Court of the State, under the guise of regulating the duties of assessors.

When, therefore, under the advice of the Attorney-General, the board of railroad commissioners treated as invalid the direction of the statute that the value of embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles and bridges, should not be included in the estimate of the railroad track, it obeyed the Constitution rather than the Legislature.

It may not be a wise thing, as a rule, for subordinate executive or ministerial officers to undertake to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation prescribing their duties, and to disregard it if in their judgment it is invalid. This may be a hazardous proceeding to themselves, and productive of great inconvenience to the public; but still the determination of the judicial tribunals can alone settle the legality of their action. An unconstitutional Act is not a law; it binds no one, and protects no one. Here the conflict [108] between the Constitution and the statute was obvious, and the board had the advice of the highest legal officer of the State; and his conclusion was sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State. The unconstitutional part of the statute was separable from the remainder. The statute declared that, in making its statement of the value of its property, the railroad company should omit certain items; that clause being held invalid, the rest remained unaffected, and could be fully carried out. An exemption, which was invalid, was alone taken from it. It is only when different clauses of an Act are so dependent upon each other that it is evident the Legislature would not have enacted one of them without the other—as when the two things provided are necessary parts of one system—that the whole Act will fall with the invalidity of one clause. When there is no such connection and dependency the Act will stand, though different parts of it are rejected.

As to the objection which the counsel of the plaintiffs in error in the state case, and of the appellants in the federal case, raise, that the action of the board of railroad commissioners was in conflict with that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no State shall deprive any one of property without due process of law, we can only say, we do not perceive its application. The complaint of the plaintiffs in error and appellants is that the board of railroad commissioners did not follow the Act of the Legislature. If that Act was valid, no ground lay for complaint that the State had done anything to deprive the Company of its property without due process of law. If the Act was, in the particulars mentioned, unconstitutional, as the Supreme Court of the State afterwards held, there was no just ground of complaint that the railroad commissioners had refused to follow its directions.

In the state case the writ is dismissed, there being no federal question involved. In the federal case the decree of the court below is affirmed.

v.

ABNER W. CRANDALL, Admr. of the Estate of THOMAS J. MARTIN, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 105-108.)

Removal of causes arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States—proceedings in courts of Louisiana.

Under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, providing for the removal of causes "arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States," where all of the parties are citizens of the State in which the action is brought, to sustain a removal it must appear upon the record, by a statement of facts in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading, that the suit involves a real and substantial dispute or controversy arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. Prentiss Nutt and Wade R. Young, for appellants.

Messrs. Thomas C. Catchings and James T. Coleman, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, [106] from an order of the circuit court remanding a case which had been removed from a state court, on the ground that the suit was one "arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States." All the parties, both plaintiffs and defendants, are citizens of Louisiana, and the right of removal depends entirely on the question whether it appears on the face of the record that there is in the case a real and substantial dispute or controversy arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States—that is to say, whether "some title, right, privilege or immunity, on which the recovery depends, will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or a law of the United States, or sustained by the opposite construction." Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257 [29: 390]; Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Cal. 118 U. S. 109 [ante, 103].

The facts are these: At some time prior to September, 1878, Thomas J. Martin brought suit in the Eighth District Court of the Parish of Madison, Louisiana, against Thomas W. Watts, as principal, and Phillip Hoggatt, then in life, as surety, "on a contract of rent." Pending this suit Hoggatt died, and Mrs. Martha A. Gibbs was appointed and qualified as administratrix of his succession. The suit was then revived and afterwards conducted contradictorily with the administratrix. At November Term, 1880, a judgment was rendered in favor of the administratrix, rejecting the demand against the succession of Hoggatt. By [107] agreement of Martin and Watts a new trial was awarded; but it is claimed that the administratrix of Hoggatt was not a party to this agreement, and that no new trial was ever ordered as to her. At November Term, 1881, a second trial was had and judgment rendered. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the State this judgment was reversed and a new judgment given against Watts and the succession of Hoggatt in solido. At May Term, 1882, of the district court a rule was taken on the administratrix of Hoggatt to show cause why the property of the succession should not be sold to pay this judgment. To this rule the administratrix made answer, setting up the original judgment in her favor rejecting the claim, and averring that the subsequent proceedings were null and void as to the succession for lack of jurisdiction. The defense was sustained in the district court, but on appeal to the supreme court this was reversed, and the district court afterwards, in obedience to the mandate of the supreme court, made the rule absolute and directed the administratrix to cause the property to be sold to pay the judgment.

In this condition of things the heirs of Hoggatt, on the first of August, 1885, filed their petition in the district court against the administrator of the estate of Martin, who had died pending the original proceedings, and the administratrix of Hoggatt, to restrain the sale which had been ordered and to annul the judgment of the supreme court against the estate, on the ground that after the original judgment in her favor the administratrix was no longer a party to the suit, and that the estate was not bound by the subsequent proceedings therein. In the petition it is averred, in various forms, that the judgment against the administratrix when she was not a party to the suit, was "absolutely null and void, as being repugnant to and in conflict with the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and an attempt to deprive these petitioners of their property without due process of law." On the third of August a writ of injunction, as prayed for, was issued on the allowance of the judge of the district court, and the next day this writ and a citation in the [108] suit were served on the administrator of Martin. On the 23d of October, 1885, the heirs of Hoggatt filed in the state court their petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States, as "A suit of a civil nature, in equity, * * * arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the said suit being a bill in equity to avoid the mandate, judgments and decrees of the honorable the Supreme Court of Louisiana and of your honorable court, for the reason that said mandate, judgments and decrees are repugnant to and in conflict with the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." After the case was entered in the circuit court, Crandall moved that it be remanded; and this motion was granted July 20, 1886, the court "being of opinion that the record does not disclose a case within the jurisdiction of the court."

This order was clearly right. The case as made by the plaintiffs presents no disputed question of federal law. If the administratrix of the estate of Hoggatt was not a party to the proceedings after the first judgment in her favor, no one can claim that the succession she represented was bound by what was afterwards done in the suit. All depends on whether she continued to be in law and in fact a party; and this is to be determined by the effect of the original judgment in her favor, and the form of the proceedings thereafter. This may involve a consideration of the law and practice in Louisiana, but it is not, so far as anything now appears on the record, at all dependent for its solution on any construction of the Constitution or laws of the United States. As was said in Gold Washing & Water Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 203 [24: 658]: "Before a circuit court can be required to retain a cause under this jurisdiction it must in some form appear upon the record, by a statement of facts in 'legal and logical form' such as is required in good pleading, that the suit is one which 'really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy' as to a right which depends upon the construction or effect of the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States." It is not enough for the party who seeks a removal of his cause to say that the suit is one arising under the Constitution. He must state the [109] facts so as to enable the court to see whether the right he claims does really and substantially depend on a construction of that instrument. That has not been done in this case, and the order remanding the suit is consequently affirmed.

LITTLE ROCK AND FORT SMITH RAILWAY, Appt., [160]
v.
CHARLES W. HUNTINGTON ET AL., Trustees, etc.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 160-165.)

Duties of trustees under railroad mortgage—application of proceeds of land sales to payment of coupons.

Under the mortgage, or deed of trust, executed by the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway, December 19, 1874, it is the duty of the trustees to apply the proceeds of sales of lands to the payment of the interest coupons of the bonds issued under said mortgage, or deed of trust, to the extent that the earnings of the road are insufficient for that purpose. It is also their duty to apply any surplus arising from the sale of lands to the payment of certain coupons which have been extended and are held by them as collateral security for scrip issued in lieu thereof.

Submitted Jan. 6, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William S. Rogers, for appellant.
Mr. C. W. Huntington, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [161] the court:

The Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway is a corporation organized under the laws of Arkansas, and the defendants are citizens of Massachusetts, and trustees under a mortgage or deed of trust executed to them by the Corporation on the 19th of December, 1874. The bill is filed to enforce the performance of certain trusts devolving upon the defendants under that instrument.

By the Act of Congress of July 28, 1866, a grant of land was made to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of the railroad from Little Rock to Fort Smith. The grant was of ten alternate sections of land on each side of the road, with a right of way over land of the United States to the width of two hundred feet.

By legislation of Arkansas in 1869, the right to the lands thus granted by Congress became vested in the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway Company. In December following, that corporation executed a mortgage upon its road, equipments, franchises, and property to secure its bonds to be issued thereunder to the amount of $8,500,000, and in June, 1870, it executed a second mortgage upon the same property to secure its bonds to be issued to the amount of $5,000,000. The bonds were issued, but the company defaulted in their payment, and both mortgages were foreclosed, and the property was sold under a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The purchasers at such sale, under a Statute of Arkansas, organized themselves into a corporation, and adopted as their corporate name that of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railway, and became vested with all the rights, privileges, powers, and franchises of the former corporation, together with the lands granted to that company by the Acts of Congress and of the Legislature of Arkansas.

This new Company, the plaintiff herein, in order to provide means for the completion and equipment of its road, and for other purposes, issued and negotiated a series of bonds, amounting [162] in the aggregate to $8,000,000, payable to bearer at the end of thirty years from January 1, 1874, with interest coupons payable semi-annually at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, free from any United States tax. The bonds were issued in denominations of $1,000 each, from No. 1 to 2,000 inclusive, and in denominations of $500 each, from numbers 2,001 to 4,000 inclusive. To secure their payment, principal and interest, the Company executed a mortgage, or deed of trust, bearing date December 19, 1874, upon its road, franchises, rights, and lands, to the defendants, Huntington and Ripley, in trust, among other things, to apply the moneys arising from the lands of the Company, after deducting the expenses of executing the trust, as follows:

1. To the payment of the coupons or interest warrants attached to the bonds, as fast as they shall become due and payable, to the extent that the net earnings from the business of the road shall be insufficient for that purpose.

2. To the purchasing and canceling of such outstanding bonds as can be obtained, at their market value, not exceeding, however, a premium of 10 per cent; and

3. To the payment of such of the bonds as shall not have been purchased in accordance with these provisions, when the same shall become due and payable.

All the trust moneys coming to the trustees, not applied or used in accordance with the above provisions, were to be invested in United States securities, or lent from time to time in such manner as by the law of Massachusetts is permitted to savings banks. The interest derived from such investments or loans was to be applied by the trustees to the payment of the bonds or coupons.

The bill alleges that, after the execution of this mortgage, the Company completed its railroad from Little Rock to Fort Smith, within the time, and in the manner required by the Acts of Congress and of Arkansas, and thereby became the owner of 1,057,000 acres of land, as certified by the Secretary of the Interior to the State, all of which, and the proceeds of sales, were subject to the trusts and charges imposed by the mortgage or deed of trust; that the Corporation has disposed of all the bonds authorized to be issued under the mortgage, [163] but that of the lands there still remain unsold 623,000 acres; that during the years 1877, 1878 and 1879, and the first six months of the year 1880, the net earnings derived from the operation of the road, even when united with the proceeds of the sales of lands, were insufficient to meet the coupons or interest warrants attached to the bonds maturing on January 1, 1878, July 1, 1878, January 1, 1879, July 1, 1879, and January 1, 1880; and thereupon an agreement was made between the Corporation and the holders of the bonds and coupons payable on those dates, by which the holders surrendered to the defendants, trustees, the coupons, and the Corporation issued to them negotiable scrip or certificates by which it promised to pay the trustees, or bearer, the amount of the coupons surrendered, in ten years from their maturity, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, the Corporation reserving the right to pay the scrip and interest at any time previous to its maturity.

The scrip or certificate also provided that the trustees should hold the coupons surrendered, as collateral security for the payment of the scrip thus issued therefor, and that the coupons should not be surrendered or canceled until the scrip should be paid. The coupons maturing on July 1, 1883, and January 1, 1884, were also unpaid, and a similar arrangement was made with the holders of these coupons by the issue of scrip for them; so that the whole amount of scrip issued for coupons thus unpaid was $636,000.

The bill also alleges that out of the moneys received from the sale of the lands since the execution of the mortgage, the trustees have bought and canceled bonds amounting to $536,500, besides appropriating moneys to aid the Corporation in paying the interest coupons attached to the bonds; that since the year 1881 the trustees have applied the net proceeds of the sales to the purchase and cancellation of the bonds, and no part thereof to the purchase and cancellation of the said scrip, or the coupons held by them as collateral security for the payment of that scrip; that for several years, the net earnings of the road have been more than sufficient to enable the Corporation to pay its current coupons and the interest upon the scrip; that the Corporation has notified the trustees [164] that it was no longer necessary to retain any portion of the proceeds of sales for the payment of the interest coupons to mature hereafter; that the net earnings of the road would, in all probability, be ample for that purpose, and, by reason of the increased earnings, will continue to be more than ample to pay the coupons as they severally become due and payable; and that the price of the bonds has greatly risen in value, and the premium thereon has varied the past year from 18 to 17 per cent, so that under the mortgage the trustees are no longer able to purchase such bonds, being limited by the mortgage to the payment of 10 per cent premium.

The bill also alleges that 623,000 acres of the lands of the Company remain unsold; that the trustees hold contracts for lands sold, upon which partial payments have been made, but upon which deeds are not to be executed until the purchase money and interest are fully paid, amounting in the aggregate to more than the sum of $428,691; and that in the ordinary course of business, the trustees and their successors will have large amounts of money from sales thereof, which must be applied by them in accordance with the provisions of the mortgage, and in the order of priority, before the moneys can be invested, as provided therein; that the trustees have refused to apply any of the said money to the payment of the outstanding coupons for which the scrip mentioned was given; that such coupons draw interest at the rate of 7 per cent, and any investment of such moneys by the trustees can only be made so as to obtain a much smaller rate of interest, and that, therefore, it would be greatly to the advantage of the Corporation, and to the bondholders, that such moneys should be applied to taking up the outstanding coupons. The trustees, in their answer to the demand of the Corporation that the moneys be so applied, have expressed a willingness to so apply them, but they entertain doubts as to their authority so to do, unless directed by order of the court.

The mortgage, as is seen by its terms, contemplates that the proceeds of sales of lands shall be applied to the payment of the interest coupons to the extent that the earnings of the road are insufficient for that purpose. The contract, by which the time to pay those coupons, for which the scrip was issued, was extended for ten years, does not release the Corporation from its obligation, provided it is in funds from the earnings of the road and the sales of its lands. The coupons are not canceled, but are still held as collateral security for the scrip issued. The inability of the Company to pay such coupons from the earnings of the road, combined with the proceeds of the sales of the lands, which led to the contract for the scrip, no longer exists, and there is no legal impediment in the way of the trustees taking up such coupons, notwithstanding the contract deferring their compulsory payment for ten years. The money received from the sales of the lands cannot be used in purchasing the bonds of the Company, which are now at more than 10 per cent premium, and the trustees are restricted in their payment to that premium. Any investment under the law of Massachusetts would bring them only a moderate interest, probably not exceeding 4 per cent. The coupons draw 7 per cent. There is, therefore, a manifest propriety and justice in the demand of the Corporation that the surplus money from the sales of its lands, instead of being thus invested, should be applied to taking up the outstanding coupons. And it is the plain duty of the trustees, in the execution of their trust, to make the proceeds of the sales of lands as available as possible for the extinction of the indebtedness of the Corporation, first on its coupons, and then upon its bonds, so long as the same can be bought at a premium not exceeding 10 per cent.

The decree of the court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

ENDOWMENT AND BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF KANSAS, Plff. in Err., [103]

v.

STATE OF KANSAS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 103-105.)

Jurisdiction of this court—writ of error to state court—constitutionality of state statute.

1. This court is without jurisdiction of a writ of error to the highest court of a State, unless it distinctly appears of record that a question under the Constitution or a law of the United States not only might have been, but actually was, raised and decided in the state court.

2. The fact that in a motion for a new trial the question of the constitutionality of a statute of the State was presented is not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, unless it appears that the Constitution of the United States was relied on.

Submitted Jan. 6, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. Reported below, 35 Kan. 253. Dismissed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. Jay Buck, and G. W. DeCamp, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. S. B. Bradford, Atty-Gen. of Kansas, Charles B. Smith and Edwin A. Austin, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit begun by the State of Kansas in the District Court of Lyon County against the Endowment and Benevolent Association of Kansas, for a forfeiture of its charter because it had neglected to comply with the requirements of chapter 131 of the laws of Kansas of the year 1885, approved March 7, 1885, "providing for the organization and control of mutual life insurance companies in this State." The case was submitted without pleadings on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the Corporation was organized under the general laws of Kansas, January 7, 1885, with the following objects:

"1. To guard its members, to a great extent, against the ills of pecuniary want during life, and especially during the period of infirm old age, and at their death to make a provision for their families and friends, which latter is supposed to be the only physical anxiety of dying man.

"2. To create a fund to be paid to the members of the society, in accordance with rules [104] and regulations thereof, whereby the members may the better be enabled to perpetuate and sustain their membership, which in so doing will secure to them and their dependents the continued support and protection of the association.

"3. To encourage and promote benevolence, industry and charity among its members."

The district court gave judgment against the Corporation, but on what ground does not appear, except as it may be inferred from the following reasons assigned in support of a motion for a new trial.

"1. That said chapter 131 is unconstitutional and void.

"2. For error of law occuring at the trial and excepted to by the defendant.

"3. That the facts of this case do not warrant either the conclusion of law made by the court or the judgment herein rendered."

When the case went to the Supreme Court of the State on a petition in error the following was the assignment of errors:

"1. The said court erred in rendering judgment for said plaintiff below.

"2. The conclusions of law and the judgment are not authorized or warranted by the facts of the case.

"3. Said court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant below for a new trial."

From this statement it is clear that we have no jurisdiction, as no federal question appears affirmatively on the face of the record. It is true that in the motion for a new trial the question of the constitutionality of chapter 181 of the Acts of 1885 was presented, but that is not enough, since it is nowhere shown that any provision of the Constitution of the United States was relied on. The suggestion in the motion applies as well to the Constitution of the State as to that of the United States, and it has long been settled that we have no jurisdiction unless it distinctly appears that a question under the Constitution or a law of the United States not only might have been but actually was raised and decided. Crowell v. Randell, [105] 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 368, 398 [9:458, 470]; Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 95, 97 [27:132, 133]; Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 [28:400]; Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 [29:118]. Here there is nothing of the kind, and in the assignment of errors on the petition in error to the Supreme Court of the State no reference was made to any constitutional question whatever, except inferentially under that which relates to overruling the motion for a new trial. Certainly it does not appear unmistakably on the face of the record that the Supreme Court of the State either knew or ought to have known that the validity of the statute in question was challenged on account of its repugnancy to the Constitution or laws of the United States. Brown v. Colorado, supra. Indeed, we know of no provision of the Constitution which renders such a statute invalid as a whole, and there is nowhere in the record any claim that in the charter of the Corporation there was a contract by the State the obligation of which had been impaired by the legislation.

If there had been, the validity of the statute could not have been challenged except in its application to this charter, and that was not the objection made either in the motion for a new trial or anywhere else that we can discover.

The writ of error is dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

[126] UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

JAMES C. SAUNDERS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 126-130.)

Public officers—one who holds two distinct offices may recover compensation for both.

Sections 1763-1765 Revised Statutes, prohibiting the allowance of additional pay or extra compensation to public officers, have no application to the case of two distinct offices, places, or employments, each of which has its own duties and compensation, which offices may both be held by one person at the same time.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 21 Ct. Cl. 408. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, assistant attorney, for appellant.

Mr. Van H. Manning, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [127] the court:

Saunders, the appellee in this case, recovered against the United States in the court of claims a judgment for $1,627, from which the United States appeals. The recovery was for the salary of the claimant as clerk of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, from the 14th day of March, 1885, to the 7th day of January, 1886, at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

Mr. Saunders held this place from the first day of July, 1884, when he was appointed, up to the 7th day of January, 1886, when his successor was appointed. He was paid the compensation up to the 14th of March, 1885, and for the time between that and the 7th of January, 1886, the Comptroller refused to pay him. The various Appropriation Acts, including the one which would cover the period now in question, had all made appropriations for compensation for the clerk of the Committee on Commerce. The ground upon which payment is resisted by the United States is that the claimant was, on the 14th day of March, 1885, appointed a clerk in the office of the President of the United States, since which time he has continued to perform the duties of that office and receive its salary. The Comptroller, in his decision refusing to allow the claim, places his objection upon section 1765 United States Revised Statutes, and upon the opinion of Attorney-General Black, in regard to extra pay and double compensation, delivered in 1857. 9 Opinions Attys-Gen. 128. Section 1765 is found in immediate connection with several other sections on the same subject, of which [128] the two immediately preceding may be considered to some extent in pari materia. They are as follows:

"Sec. 1763. No person who holds an office, the salary or annual compensation attached to which amounts to the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office, unless expressly authorized by law.

"Sec. 1764. No allowance or compensation shall be made to any officer or clerk, by reason of the discharge of duties which belong to any other officer or clerk in the same or any other department; and no allowance or compensation shall be made for any extra services whatever, which any officer or clerk may be required to perform, unless expressly authorized by law.

"Sec. 1765. No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance or compensation."

Some stress is laid in the letter of the Comptroller on the proposition that the clerkship to the committee is not an office in contemplation of the Constitution of the United States and the law; and the decision in United States v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 508 [25:482], is relied upon in support of that proposition. We do not think it important to decide in this case whether such a clerkship is an office within the meaning of these sections of the law and the Constitution, because sections 1764 and 1765 both include in their prohibition officers, clerks and other persons. The proposition of the Comptroller that the clerk is not an officer is made to meet his concession that a person who holds two distinct compatible offices may lawfully receive the salary of each.

The general question here raised has been much discussed in the opinions of the Attorneys-General, and in the decisions of this court.
[129] This section 1765, mainly relied upon by the Government, is taken from two statutes, the first passed March 3, 1839, 5 U. S. Stat. at L. 349, and the second, August 23, 1842, 5 U. S. Stat. at L. 510. This opinion of Attorney-General Black seems to be in conflict with the principles laid down by his predecessors, and is materially modified, if not overruled, on the point mainly in question here, by his opinion in the case of J. P. Brown, on page 507 of the same volume. In Hiero's Case, 5 Ops. Attys-Gen. 765, Attorney-General Crittenden held that these two Acts of 1839 and 1842 "Were intended to fence against arbitrary extra allowances in each particular case, but not applying to distinct employments, with salaries affixed to each by law or regulation."

The case before us comes within the terms of this language, which is further confirmed by the fact that he regarded the Act of 1850 as prohibiting a person "from receiving the salary of an office which he does not hold, and not against his receiving the salaries of two offices which he does legitimately hold;" and we do not see that there is any distinction between emoluments received for two distinct employments, whether offices or not, the salaries of which are distinct, and the services rendered distinct, both appointments being held by the same person, as in this case. We are of opinion that, taking these sections all together, the purpose of this legislation was to prevent a person holding an office or appointment, for which the law provides a definite compensation by way of salary or otherwise—which is intended to cover all the services which, as such officer, he may be called upon to render—from receiving extra compensation, additional allowances, or pay for other services which may be required of him either by Act of Congress or by order of the head of his department, or in any other mode, added to or connected with the regular duties of the place which he holds; but that they have no application to the case of two distinct offices, places, or employments, each of which has its own duties and its own compensation, which offices may both be held by one person at the same time. In the latter case, he is in the eye of the law two officers, or holds two places or appointments, the functions of which are separate and distinct; and, according to all the decisions, he is in such case entitled [130] to recover the two compensations. In the former case, he performs the added duties under his appointment to a single place, and the statute has provided that he shall receive no additional compensation for that class of duties unless it is so provided by special legislation. The case of United States v. Brindle, 110 U. S. 688 [28:286], in which an Indian agent received large additional compensation for services connected with the sale of lands belonging to the Indians of his agency, which was affirmed in this court, was upon the ground that these additional services were performed for the benefit of the Indians, and the statute implied the payment of a reasonable compensation for such services. See also Converse v. U. S. 62 U. S. 21 How. 463 [16:192].

These views require the affirmance of the judgment of the Court of Claims; and it is so ordered.

MEMPHIS AND LITTLE ROCK RAILROAD COMPANY, as Reorganized, Appt., [287]
v.
ROBERT K. DOW, ET AL., Trustees.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 287–308.)

Railroads—reorganization—bonds in payment for property, rights and privileges acquired, not invalid under Constitution of Arkansas—protection of property by junior incumbrancers—subrogation—interest—trustees' services, counsel fees and costs.

1. The bonds issued by the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company on May 2, 1877, in payment for the property, rights and privileges acquired upon its reorganization, are not within the prohibition of the Constitution of Arkansas against the issuing of stock or bonds except for money actually received or labor done.

2. Said bonds are not void because made to bear interest at a rate in excess of that specified in the Arkansas Act of January 22, 1855, as they were not issued for money borrowed.

3. Where it is the duty of a mortgagor to protect junior incumbrancers against a prior lien and he fails to do so, and they pay the amount of such lien to prevent a forced sale of the property, they are entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the prior lienholder.

4. In the case presented it is held that the trustees in the deed of May 2, 1877, while entitled to reimbursement for their outlays in protecting the mortgaged property against a prior lien held by the State, are only entitled to 6 per cent interest upon the whole amount actually paid, instead of 8 per cent allowed by the court below.

5. Under the trust deed of May 2, 1877, the trustees are entitled to recover for services rendered in and about the trust, and for counsel fees and costs in this suit.

[No. 40.]

Argued Nov. 11, 12, 1886. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Reported below, 20 Fed. Rep. 260, 768. Affirmed except as to rate of interest.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. B. C. Brown, Wager Swayne, John F. Dillon and John C. Brown, for appellant:

It seems plain that a corporation can have no right to increase its obligations without consideration, and this most certainly when, as here, the corporation can obtain the money for discharge of such obligation only by increasing its charges for transportation, or, in other words, by, in effect, imposing a burden or tax upon the people. Railroad corporations control three fourths of the transportation of the country, and if entitled to increase their charges to enable them to make gifts to their owners, are invested with power to confiscate the earnings of the whole people to the use of those owners. The direct question here is whether the practice of watering stock and bonds, so freely indulged in by these corporations, by which for no consideration furnished to the public they seize and appropriate the money of the people to themselves, is or is not illegal.

That obligations issued in direct violation of a prohibitory statute, especially when such statute declares them void, are void in the hands of every one is well established by authority, and is a principle of sound common sense. In such cases there can be no innocent purchaser. A public law is notice to all the world.

Root v. Godard, 3 McLean, 102; Hayden v. Davis, 3 McLean, 276; Root v. Wallace, 4 McLean, 8; Harris v. Runnels, 53 U. S. 12 How. 79 (13: 901); Armstrong v. Toler, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 258 (6:468); Cincinnati Mut. H. Ins. Co. v. Rosenthal, 55 Ill. 85; Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y. 19.

"A contract void by the statute cannot be enforced directly or collaterally. It confers no right and creates no obligation as between the parties to it."

Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491 (29:703).

To like effect: Southern Loan Co. v. Morris, 2 Pa. 175; Davidson v. Lanier, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 453 (18:379); Bank of U. S. v. Owens, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 535 (7:511); Brown v. Tarkington, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 377 (18:255); Peck v. Burr, 10 N. Y. 294; Barton v. Port Jackson Plank R. Co. 17 Barb. 397; Utica Ins. Co. v. Scott, 19 Johns. 1; Utica Ins. Co. v. Caldwell, 3 Wend. 297; Chitty, Cont. 972, 1003; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 197; Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496; Eagle v. Beard, 33 Ark. 497.

In each and every of these cases the paper held void was issued for value and upon consideration. In this case it is admitted that the bonds and deed are founded on no consideration.

It seems clear from the authorities, as well as on principle, that no one can be estopped from showing a contract illegal.

Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wills. C.P. 247; 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 667, and cases cited.

The issue of these bonds was not only ultra vires, they, as issued, were absolutely prohibited by the statute.

These bonds contracted for interest at 8 per cent per annum.

The statute declares that such bonds should bear a rate "not exceeding 7 per cent per annum."

The statute contemplates a sale and nothing but a sale.

These bonds were given away.

Acts done, obligations issued, ultra vires are void.

Shrewsbury etc. R. Co. v. Northwestern R. Co. 6 H. of L. 113.

The contract is likewise void when the statute prohibits it by implication. Thus, although a corporation may, without special statute authority, issue bonds to pay its debts, or to raise money for a corporate purpose, a statute which prescribes certain conditions on which they may be issued prohibits by implication the issue of bonds which do not comply with the conditions, and those issued without such compliance are void.

Pierce, R. R. 512; Commonwealth v. Smith, 10 Allen, 448; Head v. Providence Ins. Co. 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 127 (2:229); Chambers v. *Manchester & M. R. The exception to the effective operation of the doctrine of ultra vires is based entirely on the reception of a consideration.

See Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, and cases in note, 729-749; Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 352 (24:662); Hotel Co. v. Wade, 97 U. S. 13 (24:917); National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621 (25:188).

In this case it is admitted that no consideration for these bonds was received; hence, no estoppel can arise.

Equity will interfere between wrong doers where a public interest is involved. Equity will also interfere when the party asking relief was, at the time of the transaction, so much under the control of the other party as not to be his own master, or to have any discretion.

The acts of a corporation are controlled by its stockholders, and that such acts, when illegal or wrongful, are condemned is settled in this court.

Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 623 (21:786).

These wrong doers in paying the State merely discharged a just debt due appellant. They were and are the wrong doers and are not entitled to subrogation.

Guckenheimer v. Angevine, 81 N. Y. 394; Wilkinson v. Babbit, 4 Dill. 208.

The right of subrogation rests on principles of pure equity, and should not be allowed where it appears that the person seeking it is indebted to the person against whom he is proceeding on any account in an amount equal, greater, or less than the demand, without first satisfying the debt.

Coates' Appeal, 7 Watts & S. 99; Sheldon, Subrogation, § 112.

Messrs. U. M. Rose and John M. Bowers, for appellees:

As the old company had authority expressly conferred by its charter to borrow money for the purpose of building and equipping its road, and as the present Company has succeeded to its charter, no reason can be shown why the latter should not have authority on its organization to issue bonds for a debt contracted for building and equipping the road, no part of which had ever been paid.

If not, perhaps a stockholder might have enjoined the issue of the bonds and the execution of the mortgage by a timely application to a court of chancery; but after the act was done and the appellant had received the benefit from it for which it had contracted, neither it nor any stockholder could avoid its responsibility by pleading ultra vires.

In any event the plaintiffs are entitled to subrogation.

The payment by the plaintiffs, of the debt due the State, relieved the defendant of a burden which could only be got rid of by payment. Under these circumstances the defendant would be compelled to repay the money advanced by the trustees, though in point of fact it might be held that the trust deed is void.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized), an Arkansas corporation, conveyed, by deed of May 2, 1877, to Pierson, Matthews, and Dow, trustees, its road and connections, and all its property, rights and privileges, including its franchise to be a corporation, to secure the payment of its bonds of the same date, aggregating $2,600,000, and payable in thirty years, subject to a mortgage for $250,000, executed May 1, 1877. The [288] deed provided for the employment, at the expense of the trust estate, of such attorneys and agents as were reasonably necessary for the execution of the trust, and also for the payment of charges, costs, expenses and compensation, incurred by the trustees from time to time "in and about or for the execution of the trust."

On the fourth day of March, 1882, the Supreme Court of Arkansas, in a suit to which that Corporation was a party, rendered a decree adjudging that the State had a lien upon its road and rolling stock to secure the payment of $202,133.32 with interest from December 22, 1879, until paid, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum; that being the aggregate principal and interest then due on a loan of $100,000 made January 10, 1861 by the State to the (old) Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, and secured by a mortgage upon its rolling stock and upon the same road now operated by the appellant.

On the 25th of March, 1882, five days before the day fixed for the sale directed to be made in satisfaction of that decree, the appellees, (Moran having succeeded Pierson), as trustees in the deed of May 2, 1877, paid into the treasury of Arkansas the sum of $239,672.71 in full discharge of the State's claim.

The appellees seek by this suit to be subrogated to the rights of the State, and to charge the mortgaged property and interests with the amount so paid by them, with interest thereon, and also with such sums as may be ascertained to be due by reason of liabilities incurred, and costs, time, and labor expended by them in and about the trust.

The Company resists each of the claims asserted by the appellees. Its answer proceeds mainly upon the ground that the bonds secured by the deed of May 2, 1877, were and are void under the Constitution and laws of Arkansas, having been issued, it is alleged, to the stockholders of the appellant without consideration in money, labor, or property actually received, of which fact the plaintiffs and every original taker of the bonds were advised, and as to which subsequent takers, if such there were, were put upon inquiry by the recitals in the mortgage securing their payment. Conse- [289] quently, it is contended, the appellees were under no duty and had no legal right as trustees, or in any other capacity, to intervene and satisfy the decree in favor of the State, or to incur liability or costs in reference to the defendant's property. The Company also filed a cross-bill, setting forth the same grounds, and praying that upon final hearing the deed of May 2, 1877, and the bonds thereby secured, be declared void.

The court sustained exceptions to the answer and a demurrer to the cross-bill, dismissing the latter for want of equity, and rendering a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill. By the decree, the appellees were subrogated to all of the rights of the State under the decree of March 4, 1882; and for the amount so paid by them, with interest thereon from March 25, 1882, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, aggregating $261,456.27, together with interest on the latter sum at the same rate, from the date of the decree herein, they were adjudged to have a lien upon the property, rights and interests embraced by the deed of May 2, 1877, subject—the appellees having consented thereto—to the lien created by that deed as well as by a deed executed May 1, 1877. A decree was also entered against the Company for $29,580.87, the amount found due to the plaintiffs for services rendered in and about the trust, and for counsel fees and costs in this suit. To this provision of the decree the appellant also objects, upon grounds to which reference will be hereafter made.

The principal question relates to the validity of the $2,600,000 issue of bonds secured by the deed of May 2, 1877.

The principal facts, chronologically stated, which bear upon this and other questions in the case are as follows: the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company was incorporated in 1853 under the laws of Arkansas, with authority to increase its capital to a sum sufficient to complete and operate a railroad between Memphis and Little Rock, by opening books for new stock, or by selling new stock, or by borrowing money secured by mortgage of its charter and stock. Its stockholders, at a meeting held February 20, 1860, adopted a resolution authorizing the board of directors, for the [290] purpose of building and equipping the road, to increase the capital stock of the company to $1,300,000, by issuing coupon bonds of $1,000 each, bearing 8 per cent interest, convertible at any time within ten years thereafter into shares of stock; such bonds to be secured by mortgage upon the company's road, charter, works and real estate, or either of them. The action of the stockholders having been ratified by the directors, the company by deed of trust executed May 1, 1860, conveyed to Tate and others its franchises, property, privileges, road, road-bed, right of way, rolling stock and works, in trust to secure its bonds, aggregating $1,300,000, payable thirty years after date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum. On the 10th of January, 1861, it placed a mortgage upon its road and rolling stock to secure the before mentioned state loan of $100,000, with interest from that date until paid at the rate of 8 per cent. By deed of March 1, 1871, it conveyed its franchises, property and net income, to Henry F. Vail, in trust to secure other bonds, amounting to $1,000,000, payable thirty years thereafter, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum. The company having made default in the payment of interest on the latter bonds, Vail, the trustee, on the 17th day of March, 1872, sold and conveyed these properties, rights, privileges and franchises, for $15,000 in cash, subject to all prior and superior liens, to one Stillman Witt, who purchased in behalf of the holders of bonds secured by the deed of March 1, 1871. Subsequently, March 29, 1873, Witt executed a deed declaring the respective interests of the parties whom he represented, and conveying to each his proportionate share of the property and interest so purchased. On the 17th of November, 1873, the grantees in the latter deed conveyed the same property, rights and franchises to the Memphis and Little Rock Railway Company—a corporation then recently organized under the laws of Arkansas, by the parties to whom Witt conveyed, subject, however, to the condition that that company should execute its bonds for $2,600,000, secured by first mortgage to the New York Guaranty and Indemnity Company—that amount, according to the estimate of the parties, being less than the principal and interest due on the $1,300,000 mortgage of May 1, 1860, and other indebtedness theretofore incurred in the construction and equip- [291] ment of the road. In conformity with that condition the railway company executed, December 1, 1873, a mortgage securing its bonds for $2,600,000. That mortgage provided, among other things, that "In case of any sale, judicial or otherwise, of the premises embraced in this mortgage, and the holders of a majority in interest of the then outstanding bonds secured by this mortgage shall, in writing, request the said trustee, or its successor or successors, or his or their survivor or survivors, so to do it, they or he is authorized to purchase the premises embraced herein for the use and benefit of the holders of the then outstanding bonds and coupons secured by this mortgage. And that, having so purchased said premises, the right and title thereto shall vest in said trustee or trustees, and no bondholder shall have any claim to the premises or to the proceeds thereof, except for his pro rata share of the proceeds of said premises as represented in a new company or corporation to be formed by a majority in interest of said bondholders for the use and benefit of the holders of the bonds secured hereby. And whenever the holders of a majority of said bonds shall have organized a new company or corporation for the use and benefit of all the holders of the bonds secured by this mortgage the said trustee, or its successor or successors, or his or their survivor or survivors, shall reconvey the premises so purchased by it, him, or them to said new company or corporation."

The New York Guaranty and Indemnity Company was succeeded in the trust by Pierson, Dow and Matthews. The railway company having made default in meeting the interest on its bonds, and the principal, under the terms of the deed of trust, becoming thereby due, the trustees instituted a suit for foreclosure. Pending that suit, Tate and others, trustees in the mortgage of May 1, 1860, were made coplaintiffs. The bill was amended and the prayer for relief so enlarged as to include a foreclosure of the latter mortgage. Both mortgages were foreclosed by final decree of November 1, 1876, the amount found to be due on that of May 1, 1860, being $1,088,348.80, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and the amount due on that of December 1, [292] 1873, being $3,016,000. The decree provided, among other things, "That if said trustees shall be so requested, and shall bid for said property, they shall pay into court a sufficient sum to pay the costs of sale and this suit, including counsel fees, allowances to trustees, to the commissioner for sale, and master of this court. And for the residue, their bid to the amount due and ordered to be paid by this decree shall be accepted by said commissioner, and he shall forthwith execute a deed conveying the purchased property to said trustees for and upon the trusts expressed in said second mortgage; that is to say, upon trust that they will convey the same to such new company or corporation as may be organized by the holders of a majority in interest of said bonds upon demand thereof."

At the sale under that decree, Pierson, Dow and Matthews, as trustees in the deed of December 1, 1873, purchased the property for the holders of bonds secured by that instrument, and a deed was made to them, on April 28, 1877, in trust for such holders, "and upon the further trust that they will convey the same and all thereof to such company or corporation as may be formed by the holders of a majority of such bonds at such time and upon such terms and conditions as a majority of the holders of such bonds may require."

On the day last mentioned the majority, in value, of such bondholders entered into articles of association reorganizing the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company and fixing its capital stock at $1,300,000. The parties engaged in the reorganization being holders of the bonds secured by the deed of December 1, 1873, and beneficiaries under the deed of April 28, 1877, took the entire stock to themselves without paying therefor in money. The articles, after declaring that each and every share of the above named stock was fully paid stock, and acknowledging, on behalf of the Company, that $100 had been paid upon each share by the holder thereof, provided:

"That we hereby require the said trustees, William S. Pierson, Watson Matthews, and R. [293] K. Dow, to convey all and singular the property, charter, franchises, rights, privileges, and immunities, so conveyed to them by such commissioner, to the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized, upon the following terms and conditions, to wit:

"1. That said Railroad Company, as reorganized, shall issue its two hundred and fifty bonds, payable to bearer at the office of the Central Trust Company of New York, in the City of New York, each for one thousand dollars, maturing in five equal installments, on the first days of May, in the years 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882 and 1883, bearing interest from date at the rate of 10 per centum per annum, payable semi-annually at the same place, with coupons for said interest annexed; and shall secure the payment of the principal and interest thereof by a mortgage of all and singular the said property, charter, franchises, rights, privileges and immunities, of which mortgage said Pierson, Matthews and Dow shall be trustees, and shall deliver the same to the said Pierson, Matthews and Dow, to be by them sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the liens upon the said property reserved by the decree of the said court directing the sale thereof, and to the payment of moneys borrowed by them to make the cash payment required by said decree.

"2. That said Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized, shall execute and deliver, to said Pierson, Matthews and Dow, its two thousand five hundred and seventy-five other bonds, each for the sum of one thousand dollars; and its one hundred other bonds, each for two hundred and fifty dollars, payable at the same place thirty years after date, bearing interest from the first day of July, 1878, and until the first day of July, 1882, at the rate of 4 per centum per annum, and after the last named date at 8 per centum per annum, payable at the same place, with coupons for such interest attached; and shall make provision for a sinking fund for redemption of such bonds, and shall secure payment of said bonds, interest and sinking fund, by a mortgage of all said property, charter, franchises, rights, privileges and immunities, of which mortgage said Pierson, Matthews, and Dow shall be trustees; such [294] last named bonds to be by said Pierson, Matthews, and Dow, equally distributed among the holders of the bonds secured by the mortgage of the Memphis and Little Rock Railway Company, of date December 1, 1873."

These terms were formally accepted by the stockholders, and on April 30, 1877, the trustees conveyed to the reorganized Company the property, rights and interests so purchased, subject to the terms, conditions and trusts prescribed in its said articles of association.

Pursuant to the conditions upon which it received title, the appellant, on May 1, 1877, issued its bonds, amounting to $250,000, and, to secure their payment, conveyed the same property, rights and interests to Pierson, Dow and Matthews as trustees. The proceeds of these bonds were applied in payment of the expenses of foreclosure and reorganization. In further compliance with these terms, the appellant issued its bonds for $2,600,000 for distribution among the holders of bonds secured by the mortgage of December 1, 1873, and, to secure their payment, executed the before mentioned mortgage or deed of trust of May 2, 1877. The recitals in the deed disclose all the foregoing circumstances connected with the organization of the appellant Corporation, and with its acquisition of these properties.

From these facts it appears that at the date [297] of the mortgage of May 2, 1877, appellant's entire assets consisted of the property, rights and privileges purchased by Pierson, Dow, and Matthews, trustees, at the sale under the decree foreclosing the mortgage of December 1, 1873, and by them conveyed to it, on the express condition that the beneficial owners should receive therefor, besides $1,300,000 in stock, its mortgage bonds for $2,600,000. That amount, in the stock and bonds of the appellant, was the valuation placed by such owners upon their interests, after taking into account, as well the amount previously expended in the construction and maintenance of the road, as the probable value in the future of the stock and bonds to be given for a surrender of those interests. The transaction was, in its essence, a purchase of said property, rights and privileges by the appellant at an agreed price, to be paid in its stock and bonds. A part of the price was paid when the $1,300,000 of stock was issued. But appellant disputes its liability upon the bonds given for the balance, upon the theory that they were prohibited from issuing them by the eighth section of the twelfth article of the Constitution of Arkansas, adopted in 1874. That section provides that "No private corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money or property actually received, or labor done; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void." In support of this view our at-[298] tention is called to the fact, admitted by the demurrer, that the full value of the property, rights and privileges conveyed to appellant did not exceed $1,300,000, the amount at which the capital stock was fixed; and, consequently, it is argued, the $2,600,000 of bonds were issued without any consideration received in money, property, or labor, and represented only a fictitious indebtedness. In other words, appellant's vendors were fully compensated for their interests by taking to themselves its entire stock.

We do not concur in this view of the case. It does not, we think, rest upon a sound interpretation of the State Constitution. The prohibition against the issuing of stock or bonds, except for money or property actually received or labor done, and against the fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness, was pretended to protect stockholders against spoliation, and to guard the public against securities that were absolutely worthless. One of the mischiefs sought to be remedied is the flooding of the market with stock and bonds that do not represent anything whatever of substantial value. In reference to a provision in the Constitution of Illinois, adopted in 1870, containing a prohibition, as to railroad corporations, similar to that imposed by the Arkansas Constitution upon all private corporations, the Supreme Court of the former State, in Peoria & S. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 201, said: "The latter part of the clause of the Constitution in question, which declares that 'all stocks, dividends, and other fictitious increase of the capital stock or indebtedness of such corporation shall be void,' we think, clearly points out the chief object which the constitutional convention sought to accomplish in adopting it; and to this we must look, in a large degree, for a solution of the language which precedes it. The object was, doubtless, to prevent reckless and unscrupulous speculators, under the guise or pretense of building a railroad or of accomplishing some other legitimate corporate purpose, from fraudulently issuing and putting upon the market bonds or stocks that do not and are not intended to represent money or property of any kind, either in possession or expectancy, the stock or [299] bonds in such case being entirely fictitious. * * * Under this provision of the Constitution, railroad companies have no right to lend, give away, or sell on credit, their bonds or stock, nor have they the right to dispose of either except for a present consideration and for a corporate purpose."

Recurring to the language employed in the Arkansas Constitution, we are of opinion that it does not necessarily indicate a purpose to make the validity of every issue of stock or bonds by a private corporation depend upon the inquiry whether the money, property or labor actually received therefor was of equal value in the market with the stock or bonds so issued. It is not clear from the words used that the framers of that instrument intended to restrict private corporations—at least when acting with the approval of their stockholders—in the exchange of their stock or bonds for money, property or labor, upon such terms as they deem proper; provided, always, the transaction is a real one based upon a present consideration, and having reference to legitimate corporate purposes, and is not a mere device to evade the law and accomplish that which is forbidden. We cannot suppose that the scheme whereby the appellant acquired the property, rights and privileges in question, for a given amount of its stock and bonds, falls within the prohibition of the State Constitution. The beneficial owners of such interests had the right to fix the terms upon which they would surrender those interests to the corporation of which they were to be the sole stockholders. And, that subsequent holders of stock might not be misled, each certificate of stock states upon its face that "the holder takes this stock subject to $2,850,000 of mortgage bonds of the Company, which are secured by two mortgages duly recorded." All that was done was to reorganize the Little Rock and Memphis Railroad Company upon the same basis, substantially, as to capital stock and bonded indebtedness, as existed in respect to these properties, rights and privileges, before the adoption of the State Constitution, and while they were held and controlled by the companies which preceded the appellant in the ownership. There was, consequently, no fictitious increase by appellant of its stock or indebtedness. Under these circumstances it cannot be fairly said that the bonds secured by the mortgage were issued without any consideration whatever actually received in property.

Equally untenable is the position that the bonds were void because made to bear interest at a rate in excess of that specified in the Act of January 22, 1855, now section 5488 of the Revised Statutes of Arkansas. Mansfield (Ark.) Digest. The 7th section of that Act provides that "Whenever any railroad company heretofore or hereafter incorporated in this State shall, in the opinion of the directors thereof, require an increased amount of the capital stock, they shall, if authorized by the holders of a majority of the stock, be, and they are hereby, authorized to increase their capital stock to any amount not exceeding the estimated cost of their road, and shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the corporation, not exceeding its authorized capital stock, at a rate of interest not exceeding 7 per cent per annum, and may execute its bonds therefor in sums of five hundred dollars or one thousand dollars; and to secure payment thereof may pledge the property, both real and personal, and the income of said company, and to secure the payment thereof may execute a deed of mortgage or other instrument of writing; and such company are hereby authorized to sell, negotiate, pledge or mortgage such bonds for the benefit of such company, and on such terms and at such places, either within or without this State, and at such rates and at such prices as in the opinion of such directors will best advance the interests of such company; and if said bonds are thus sold bona fide at a discount, such sale shall be valid in every respect, and such securities as binding for the respective amounts thereof, as if sold at their par value."

It is sufficient to say that this statute has no application to the present case; for, there was here no increase of the existing capital stock of a corporation; nor were the bonds secured by the mortgage of May 2, 1877, executed for money borrowed, but for property, rights and privileges conveyed to appellant at an agreed price, to be paid in its stock and bonds.

It results, from what has been said, that the validity of the bonds cannot be disputed upon any of the grounds stated. Neither the Constitution nor the Statutes of Arkansas interpose any obstacle to the full performance by the appellant of the terms and conditions upon which only it acquired the ownership of the interests in question. [301]

The appellant, in the mortgage to the appellees, covenanted that the interests conveyed were free from incumbrances and that it would warrant and defend the title against all lawful claims whatsoever. Its duty therefore was to protect those interests against prior liens. Appellant having neglected to perform that duty, the appellees, as junior incumbrancers, had the right to protect the mortgaged estate against a forced sale. Upon payment of the amount due the State, they became entitled to the benefit of her lien upon the property. Although the appellees did not purchase the State's claim or become, technically, the assignee thereof, her lien will be regarded in equity, as subsisting, so far as is necessary for their protection.

In behalf of the appellant it is contended that the decree below went beyond what was required for the indemnification of the appellees. The debt due the State, by the terms of her contract with the old company, bore interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum until paid. The entire claim, with interest at that rate, was paid by the appellees. But the decree below gave a lien, as against the appellant, for the amount so paid with interest from the date of such payment, at the same rate as was stipulated in the contract between the State and her debtor.

The Constitution of Arkansas provides that "All contracts for a greater rate of interest than 10 per centum per annum shall be void as to principal and interest, and the General Assembly shall prohibit the same by law; but where no rate of interest is agreed upon the rate shall be 6 per centum per annum." Art. 19, § 13. And by statute it is provided that "Judgments or decrees upon contracts bearing more than 6 per cent interest shall bear the same interest as may be specified in such contracts, and the rate of interest shall be expressed in all such judgments and decrees; and all other judgments and decrees shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum until satisfaction is made as aforesaid."

The right of subrogation is not founded on contract. It is a creature of equity; is enforced solely for the purpose of accomplishing the ends of substantial justice; and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties. All that the appellees can, in good conscience, demand is reimbursement for their outlay in protecting the mortgaged property against the prior lien of the State. When relief to that extent is accorded, they will have no just ground to complain, especially as the debt held by the State was not the personal debt of the appellant. There was no agreement between them and the appellant in respect to interest upon any sum they might be compelled to pay in order to relieve the property from prior incumbrances. If, therefore, they are adjudged to have a lien upon the mortgaged property for the whole amount actually paid to the State, with interest thereon from the date of such payment, at the rate established by law in the absence of an agreement as to rate, they will be fully indemnified. It is not for the court or for parties to say that the rate of interest fixed by law in the absence of an agreement is not adequate compensation for delay in the payment of money. It results that the decree, so far as it allows to appellees interest in excess of 6 per cent per annum, on the aggregate amount of principal and interest paid by them to the State, is erroneous. [302]

One other question remains to be determined. The appellant insists that the court below erred in giving judgment against it for $29,580.87, the amount found to be due the appellees for services and counsel fees herein and for costs paid out by the appellees in this suit. We are of opinion that the decree in this respect was right. This allowance, as to its amount, is fully sustained by the evidence in the cause. And it is authorized by that clause and condition in the mortgage of May 2, 1877, which provides that the appellant "will from time to time, as incurred, pay all charges, costs and expenses" of the appellees, or either of them, "in and about the execution of the trust," and "will indemnify and hold harmless" the appellees "against all costs, charges, damages and expenses which they or either of them may sustain or be put to in consequence of accepting this trust, or of anything which may be done or omitted to be done under it, saving only such damages as may be incurred by or arise from the culpable act or neglect" of said appellees. [303]

The decree below is reversed so far as it gives the appellees interest upon the aggregate amount paid by them into the treasury of the State, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from the time of such payment; and the cause is remanded, with directions to allow interest upon that amount, from the date of payment, at the rate only of 6 per cent per annum. In all other respects the decree is affirmed. The appellant will have its costs in this court.

UNITED STATES, Piff. in Err.,
v.
HUBBARD G. PARKER ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 89-97.)

Action on penal bond—dismissal of former action, a bar—liberal construction of pleadings—Nevada Statutes.

1. A judgment of dismissal based upon and entered in pursuance of an agreement of the parties, which recites that the subject matter has been adjusted and settled by them, is a bar to a subsequent action both at common law and under the Statutes of Nevada.

2. Under the statutory rule in Nevada requiring a liberal construction of pleadings, a second action on a penal bond is held to be for the same breach, although the amount claimed is less than that alleged in the former suit.

Argued Jan. 3, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nevada. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error:

In cases where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising in suit upon a different cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined.

Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 358 (24: 198).

When a judgment is offered in evidence in a subsequent action between the same parties upon a different demand, it operates as an estoppel only upon the matter actually at issue and determined in the original action; and such matter, when not disclosed by the pleading, must be shown by extrinsic evidence.

Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 428 (24: 206); Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 608 (24: 215); Campbell v. Rankin, 99 U. S. 263 (25: 436).

No extrinsic evidence in this case was offered to show that the claim now sued for was actually included in the former action pleaded. If, then, the plea does not state such facts, or set forth such a record as to show that the claim now sought to be enforced was actually embraced in the former contention, the demurrer should have been sustained.

The record pleaded is in fact, and no doubt in intent, but a consentable nonsuit. The defendant's plea in this case states it was by consent. The record entry shows no trial, no evidence on the part of plaintiff; but, on motion of defendants' attorneys, the court substantially states that the case, having been settled by the parties, need not be heard, and is therefore dismissed. In law this is merely a judgment of nonsuit.

Haws v. Tiernan, 53 Pa. 192; McLaughlin v. McGee, 79 Pa. 217.

Even a compulsory nonsuit is not a bar to a subsequent action for the same claim.

Fleming v. Ins. Co, 4 Clark, 54; Bournonville v. Goodall, 10 Pa. 133.

Messrs. C. J. Hillyer and William M. Stewart, for defendants in error:

The judgment in the former action determines every possible question that can arise on the bond as to the liability of defendant Parker.

Secor v. Sturgis, 16 N. Y. 548; Baird v. U. S. 96 U. S. 430 (24: 708); Bendernagle v. Cocks, 19 Wend. 207; Miller v. Covert, 1 Wend. 487; Phillips v. Berick, 16 Johns. 136; Farrington v. Payne, 15 Johns. 432; Heriter v. Porter, 23 Cal. 385; Cunningham v. Harris, 5 Cal. 81; Warren v. Comings, 6 Cush. 103.

Cromwell v. County of Sac, Davis v. Brown and Russell v. Place, all in 94 U. S. (Bk. 24, L. ed.), and Campbell v. Rankin, in 99 U. S. (25: 436), cited by the solicitor, have no application to the case at bar. In these cases the court made a distinction between the judgment as a bar or estoppel against the prosecution of a second action upon the same claim or demand, and its effect as an estoppel in another action between the same parties upon a different claim or cause of action.

The effect of the judgment in this case must be determined by the laws of Nevada.

Sec. 914 R. S.; Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426 (23: 286); Indianapolis, etc. R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291 (23: 898); Sawin v. Kenny, 93 U. S. 289 (23: 926); Weed Sewing Machine Co. v. Wicks, 3 Dill. 261.

The case at bar is not included among the cases which may be dismissed or in which a nonsuit may be entered under the Nevada Statute.

Phillpots v. Blasdel, 10 Nev. 19; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542.

Both the Supreme Courts of California and Nevada in construing the statutes of those States give to them the same effect as the courts of Kentucky give to a case "dismissed agreed." It will be observed by the cases, Bank of Commonwealth v. Hopkins, 2 Dana, 395, and Jarboe v. Smith, 10 B. Mon. 257, that an agreed dismissal of a case in Kentucky is a judgment on the merits and final.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law commenced by the United States, on the 18th of November, 1885, against Hubbard G. Parker, as principal, and William M. Stewart, as surety, upon an official bond executed on the 12th day of March, 1867, in the penal sum of $20,000, the condition of which was that whereas, the said Hubbard G. [90] Parker had been appointed superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada and had accepted such appointment, if the said Hubbard G. Parker should at all times carefully discharge the duties thereof, and faithfully expend all public moneys and honestly account for the same and for all public property which should or might come into his hands, without fraud or delay, the obligation should be void.

It is alleged in the complaint that after the execution of the bond, and while the defendant Parker still held and remained in said office, and prior to November 18, 1869, the plaintiff placed in his hands various and sundry large sums of money to be expended by him for the benefit of the Indians of Nevada, and to be properly accounted for by him; that on said November 18, 1869, "there then and ever since has remained and now remains of said moneys in said defendant Parker's hands, unexpended and unaccounted for, the sum of $6,184.14;" and he having failed to account for or to return the same to the plaintiff, judgment is prayed for against the defendants for that amount, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from November 18, 1869.

The defendants filed the following answer:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1871, the said above named plaintiff commenced an action in the Circuit Court of the United States, Ninth Circuit and District of Nevada, against said above named defendants, upon the official bond of the defendant Hubbard G. Parker, as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada (the same identical bond as set out in the complaint herein), to recover the sum of fifteen thousand one hundred and eight and $\frac{62}{100}$ ($15,108.62) dollars, together with interest and costs; that said action was commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuance of summons thereon in due form of law; that the said defendants appeared in said action by their attorneys, Ellis & King, and on, to wit, December 15, A. D. 1871, filed their answer to the complaint, and, among other things, denied that there was any balance due the United States from the said [91] defendant Hubbard G. Parker, as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise. That said United States Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter of said action.

"That afterwards, and on, to wit, the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873, said cause came on for trial in the said Circuit Court of the United States and District of Nevada, before Hon. Lorenzo Sawyer, Circuit Judge, and Hon. E. W. Hillyer, United States District Judge for Nevada, the plaintiff being represented by its duly authorized and appointed attorney for the District of Nevada, Jonas Seely, and the defendants being represented by their attorneys, Messrs. Ellis & King.

"That thereupon the defendants, by their attorneys, presented to the court a statement of accounts duly certified by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller of the Treasury Department of plaintiff, showing that said defendant Hubbard G. Parker's accounts with the United States as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada had been settled and adjusted, and that the said defendant Parker was discharged from all claims of the United States as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise, and that said Parker was not indebted to the United States in any sum whatever as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise.

"Whereupon, in open court, on motion of defendants' attorneys, the district attorney representing the United States consenting thereto, the following judgment was duly made and entered, to wit:

"'Upon motion of Ellis & King, attorneys for defendants, and it appearing to the court that the subject matter in this suit has been adjusted and settled by the proper parties in Washington; it is therefore ordered that this cause be and the same is hereby dismissed.'

"Defendants further aver that said judgment so as aforesaid made and entered is a bar to any and all claims of the plaintiff in this action against each and all of the said defendants, and that the said plaintiff is estopped thereby, and ought not to have or maintain this action.

[92] "And for further and separate answer defendants aver that on the 21st day of June, A. D. 1872, the said defendant Hubbard G. Parker, as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, made a full settlement with proper officers of the United States of all his accounts as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, and his accounts were finally adjusted and settled by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller of the Treasury Department of plaintiff, whereby he was fully discharged from all obligations and demands of the United States as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise.

"Defendants further aver that the pretended claims against these defendants for six thousand one hundred and eighty-four and $\frac{14}{100}$ ($6,184.14) dollars is founded upon a pretended readjustment of the accounts of the said defendant Parker by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller of the Treasury Department of plaintiff, made on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1884, and that such pretended readjustment was made without authority of law; that the said settlement and adjustment made on the 21st day of June, A. D. 1872, aforesaid, was final and conclusive, and a bar to the pretended claim for $6,184.14 herein, or any claim of the United States against these defendants, or either of them."

To this answer the plaintiff demurred, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a bar to the cause of action set out in the complaint. This demurrer was overruled and the attorney for the plaintiff resting his case upon the demurrer, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, to reverse which the United States has sued out and now prosecutes this writ of error.

In the view which we take of the case, it is not necessary to consider the validity of the second defense set up in the answer. The points relied upon by the plaintiff in error, so far as the first defense is concerned, are: 1, that the former judgment relied on as an estoppel does not appear to be for the same cause of action as that on which recovery is now sought; and 2, that the judgment is not a final judgment on the merits. The two actions are upon the same bond, but it is alleged that it does not sufficiently appear that the recovery sought in the two actions is upon the same breach. In the first action the amount alleged to be due was [93]
$15,108.62, the action having been brought November 27, 1871. On the trial on December 1, 1873, the averment is that the defendants presented to the court a statement of accounts, duly certified by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller of the Treasury Department, showing that the defendant Parker's accounts with the United States as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada had been settled and adjusted, and that Parker was thereby discharged from all claims of the United States against him as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise, and that said Parker was not indebted to the United States in any sum whatever as superintendent of Indian affairs for Nevada, or otherwise.

It is stated, by way of recital in the judgment itself, that it thus appeared to the court "that the subject matter in this suit has been adjusted and settled by the proper parties in Washington." This recital, together with the judgment founded on it, was entered by the consent of the attorney representing the United States, who thus in open court officially admitted the effect of the evidence to be as claimed. The present action was begun on the 18th of November, 1885, but the breach alleged occurred on November 18, 1869, the judgment demanded being for the amount stated then to have become due, with interest thereon from that date. The cause of action, therefore, arose and existed at that time; and if in existence now it must have been so at the date of the trial of the first action; to wit, December 1, 1873. It is therefore a fair and reasonable, if not a necessary, inference that the amount alleged to be due in the present action was part of the larger amount sought to be recovered in in the former action. It is not material that the two sums are not identical; it is sufficient that the smaller was part of the larger amount. In the first cause there might have been a recovery, if the proof had justified, for a sum less than that demanded. It was found and adjudged by the court in that cause, not only that the whole sum demanded was not due, but that there was nothing due from the defendant to the United States; and if nothing was then due, the amount now sought to be recovered must have been adjudged not to have been due; for if due now, according to the averments of the complaint, it was due from a time prior to the date of that trial and judgment. The averment is that it was due on and from November 18, 1869. It may be, according to the rule of pleading at common law, where a former judgment is set up by way of a bar to the action as an estoppel, the plea in this case would not be regarded as sufficiently certain, for want of an express averment that the amount sought to be recovered in this action was part of the same amount sought to be recovered in the prior action. But the rules of the common law as to pleading are not in force in Nevada, where the procedure is regulated by a statutory Code, which governs the practice of the courts of the United States sitting therein in common-law cases by virtue of section 914 of the Revised Statutes. This Code, like other similar codes regulating the practice of the state courts, has relaxed the strictness of the common-law rules of pleading, so that now, instead of construing pleadings strictly against the party, they are to be construed liberally in his favor for the furtherance of justice.

Section 70 of the Civil Procedure Act of the State of Nevada, approved March 8, 1869, being section 3092 of the General Statutes of Nevada of 1885, is as follows: "In the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties."

In commenting on this section, the Supreme Court of Nevada, in Ferguson v. Virginia and Truckee R. R. Co. 13 Nev. 184, 191, uses the following language: "But the rule construing pleadings most strongly against a pleader has been replaced in this State by the more liberal rule prescribed in section 70 of the Practice Act. This section is the same as section 159 of the New York Code. The result of the decisions in that State seems to be that on a general demurrer the allegations of a complaint will be construed as liberally in favor of the pleader as, before the Code, they would have been construed after the verdict for the plaintiff. That is, they will be construed in such a sense as to support the cause of action for the defense. Moak's Van Santvoord's Pl. 3d ed. side page, 771 et seq. In this State a similar doctrine has been declared in State against Central Pacific R. R. Co. 7 Nev. 103."

[95] Applying this rule, it becomes quite clear that the pleading in question sufficiently avers all the facts necessary to constitute the former judgment a bar to the present action.

The second question is whether the judgment rendered in the first action was final. It is claimed to be equivalent only to a nonsuit, and therefore not res judicata. A judgment of nonsuit, whether rendered because of the failure of the plaintiff to appear and prosecute his action, or because upon the trial he fails to prove the particulars necessary to make good his action, or when rendered by consent upon an agreed statement of facts, is not conclusive as an estoppel, because it does not determine the rights of the parties. Homer v. Brown, 57 U. S. 16 How. 354 [14:970]; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121 [27:878]; Haldeman v. U. S. 91 U. S. 584 [23:433]. But a nonsuit is to be distinguished from a retraxit. Minor v. Mechanics Bank, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 46 [7: 47]. Blackstone defines the difference as follows: "A retraxit differs from a nonsuit in this: one is negative and the other positive. The nonsuit is a mere default or neglect of the plaintiff, and therefore he is allowed to begin his suit again upon payment of costs; but a retraxit is an open, voluntary renunciation of his claim in court, and by this he forever loses his action." 3 Bl. Com. 296. And it has been held that a judgment of dismissal, when based upon and entered in pursuance of the agreement of the parties, must be understood, in the absence of anything to the contrary expressed in the agreement and contained in the judgment itself, to amount to such an adjustment of the merits of the controversy, by the parties themselves through the judgment of the court, as will constitute a defense to another action afterwards brought upon the same cause of action. Bank of Commonwealth v. Hopkins, 2 Dana, 395; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542. It is clearly so when, as here, the judgment recites that the subject matter of the suit had been adjusted and settled by the parties. This is equivalent to a judgment that the plaintiff had no cause of action, because the defense of the defendant was found to be sufficient in law and true in fact. [96] Upon general principles of the common law, regulating the practice and procedure of courts of justice, it must be held that the judgment here in question was rendered upon the merits of the case, is final in its form and nature, and must have the effect of a bar to the present action upon the same cause.

If its effect is to be determined by the Statutes of Nevada, the same conclusion will be reached. The Civil Practice Act of that State, passed March 8, 1869 (Gen. Stat. Nev. 1885, sec. 3173), is as follows:

"An action may be dismissed or a judgment of nonsuit entered in the following cases: First. By the plaintiff himself at any time before trial, upon the payment of costs, if a counterclaim has not been made. If a provisional remedy has been allowed the undertaking shall thereupon be delivered by the clerk to the defendant, who may have his action thereon. Second. By either party upon the written consent of the other. Third. By the court when the plaintiff fails to appear on the trial, and the defendant appears and asks for the dismissal. Fourth. By the court, when upon trial and before the final submission of the case the plaintiff abandons it. Fifth. By the court, upon motion of the defendant, when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury. The dismissal mentioned in the first two subdivisions shall be made by an entry in the clerk's register. Judgment may thereupon be entered accordingly. In every other case the judgment shall be rendered on the merits."

It thus appears that there are five instances in which the dismissal of an action has the force only of a judgment of nonsuit; "in every other case," the statute provides, "the judgment shall be rendered on the merits." If the case at bar is not included among the enumerated cases in which a dismissal is equivalent to a nonsuit, it must therefore be a judgment on the merits. In the present case the suit was not dismissed by the plaintiff himself before trial, nor by one party upon the written consent of the other, nor by the court for the plaintiff's failure to appear on the trial, nor by the court at the trial for an abandonment by the plaintiff of his [97] cause; neither was it a dismissal by the court upon motion of the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case for the jury at the trial. The judgment was rendered upon the evidence offered by the defendants, which could only have been after the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case. That evidence was passed upon judicially by the court, who determined its effect to be a bar to the cause of action. This was confirmed by the consent of the attorney representing the United States. The judgment of dismissal was based on the ground of the finding of the court, as matter of fact and matter of law, that the subject matter of the suit had been so adjusted and settled by the parties that there was no cause of action then existing. This was an ascertainment judicially that the defense relied upon was valid and sufficient, and consequently was a judgment upon the merits, finding the issue for the defendants. Being, as already found, for the same cause of action as now sued upon, it operates as a bar to the present suit by way of estoppel.

The judgment is affirmed.

DANIEL G. ROLLINS ET AL., Exrs. of CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Deceased, Late Collector of the PORT OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. "Heinemann v. Arthur's Exrs." Reporter's ed. 82-86.)

Duty on wool—"value" time and place of exportation—computation of foreign coin—statute applies as of date of entry.

Where a duty on imported goods is to be imposed according to their "value" at the time and place of exportation, and that "value" is stated in foreign coin in the invoice and entry, the statute as to the computation of such coin applies as of the date of entry to such entered value.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Patrick A. Collins and Sidney DeKay, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opin-
[83] ion of the court:

In October, 1873, the firm of Heinemann, Parson & Morgan bought, paid for, and exported from Taganrog in Russia some colored carpet wools, the actual cost of which, exclusive of charges, was below twelve cents per pound, at the time and place of exportation. They were imported into the Port of New York, and entered at the custom house there January 5, 1874, at the invoice value of 41,975.01 silver roubles. The Collector reduced the amount into United States money at $77\frac{17}{100}$ cents to the rouble. This made the value of the wool greater than twelve cents per pound, and the Collector exacted a duty on it of six cents per pound. The importers protested that the rouble should be computed at 75 cents, which would have made the value twelve cents or less per pound, and the duty would have been three cents per pound. The Tariff Act in force at the time of the entry was section 1 of the Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 197, 14 Stat. at L. 560, which, as applicable to the merchandise, which was wool of the third class, provided as follows: "Upon wools of the third class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported into the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be twelve cents or less per pound, the duty shall be three cents per pound; upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed twelve cents per pound, the duty shall be six cents per pound." The Secretary of the Treasury, on appeal, confirmed the action of the Collector, and the importers, after paying the duty exacted, to obtain their goods, brought this suit against the Collector to recover the alleged excess.

Section 1 of the Act of March 3, 1843, chap. 92, 5 Stat. at L. 625, provided "that in all computations of the value of foreign moneys of account at the custom houses of the United States, * * * the rouble of Russia shall be deemed and taken to be of the value of seventy-five cents."

On the third of March, 1873, the following Act was approved, 17 Stat. at L. 602, chap. 268:

"Sec. 1. That the value of foreign coin, as [84] expressed in the money of account of the United States, shall be that of the pure metal of such coin of standard value; and the values of the standard coins in circulation of the various nations of the world shall be estimated annually by the director of the mint, and proclaimed on the first day of January by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 2. That in all payments by or to the treasury, whether made here or in foreign countries, when it becomes necessary to compute the value of the sovereign or pound sterling, it shall be deemed equal to four dollars eighty-six cents and six and one-half mills, and the same rule shall be applied in appraising merchandise imported, when the value is, by the invoice, in sovereigns or pounds sterling, and in the construction of contracts payable in sovereigns or pounds sterling; and this valuation shall be the par of exchange between Great Britain and the United States; and all contracts made after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-four, based on an assumed par of exchange with Great Britain, of fifty-four pence to the dollar, or four dollars forty-four and four-ninths cents to the sovereign or pound sterling, shall be null and void.

Sec. 3. That all Acts and part of Acts inconsistent with these provisions be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

In pursuance of this statute the director of the mint estimated the value of the Russian rouble for the year 1874 at 77.17 cents in United States money of account, and the Secretary of the Treasury thereafter, on the 20th of December, 1878, proclaimed by a circular addressed to the collectors of customs, that, "from and after January 1, 1874, the following table of standard values of foreign moneys, reduced to the moneys of account of the United States, will, until otherwise provided for by law or regulation, be taken at custom houses in computing the invoice value of all imported merchandise expressed in such currency; to wit, Russian roubles of 100 copecks, silver, 77.17."

The foregoing facts appearing at the trial of the case before the court and a jury, the plaintiffs contended that the wool was purchased before the Act of March 3, 1873, took effect, and that the value in United States money should have been computed as of the time of [85] exportation. These positions were overruled by the court, and it directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which was done under the objection and exception of the plaintiffs. To review a judgment for the defendant the plaintiffs have brought this writ of error.

The decision of this court in Collector v. Richards, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 246 [23:95], establishes that the effect of the Act of 1873 was to fix the value of the Russian silver rouble, in the money of account of the United States, for the purpose of computing, at the custom house, the amount of an invoice of imported goods, and, consequently to repeal the Act of 1843. See also Cramer v. Arthur, 102 U. S. 612 [26:259]; Hadden v. Merritt, 115 U. S. 25 [29:333].

Evidence that the merchandise cost, exclusive of charges, less than twelve cents per pound, at the time and place of exportation, could not affect the question, because, although the duty was imposed according to the value of the goods "at the last port or place whence exported to the United States," yet, when that value was stated, in the invoice, in the foreign silver currency, its equivalent in the money of account of the United States could not be computed, for the purpose of the entry of the goods at the custom house, for duty, at any sum less than the invoice or entered value. Section 7 of the Act of March 3, 1865, chap. 80, 13 Stat. at L. 498, in force at the time of this importation, provided that, in all cases where the duty imposed by law should be based upon the value of any specified quantity of merchandise, the value upon which the duty should be assessed should be its actual market value or wholesale price at the period of exportation, in the principal markets of the country of exportation; but that the duty should not be assessed "upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value, any Act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding." This made it imperative on the Collector to compute the value of the silver rouble, at the time of the entry, according to that value as determined in accordance with the Act of [86] 1873, which was 77.17 cents. The duty was imposed by the statute according to the "value" of the goods at the time and place of exportation. The importer stated that "value," in the foreign coin, in his invoice and entry. The statute as to computation applied as of the date of entry, to such entered value. Hence it could not affect the question to show that the "cost" of the goods abroad, computing the rouble at a lower rate, as of the date of exportation, was twelve cents or less per pound.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN C. COOPER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 124-126.)

Direct taxes—sale for—action to recover surplus—Statute of Limitations—right of redemption—sale of.

Under the direct tax Act of June 5, 1861, where the surplus arising from a sale was deposited in the treasury, the owner, prior to his application therefor, has no right of action against the United States, and the Statute of Limitations runs only from the date of such application. The sale, by the owner, of his right of redemption, does not affect his right to recover such surplus.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, assistant attorney, for appellant.

Mr. Gilbert Moyers, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

In June, 1864, certain parcels of real estate in the County of Shelby, State of Tennessee, at that time the property of John C. Cooper, were sold by the United States tax commissioners for direct taxes, under the Act of Congress of June [August] 5, 1861, and Acts amendatory thereof. 12 Stat. at L. chaps. 45, 98. The taxes, including charges and commissions, amounted to $83.85. The property was sold for $425. The surplus, after payment of the taxes, charges and commissions, was paid into the Treasury of the United States. For this surplus, amount- [125] ing to $391.45, Cooper presented a claim to the Secretary of the Treasury in August, 1882, which was disallowed in April, 1884, and he thereupon brought this suit in the court of claims, and obtained a judgment for the amount from which the United States have appealed.

The grounds of the appeal, as set forth by counsel of the Government, are not sustained by the record. The court of claims found that in 1865 the claimant sold the property, subject to the tax title; and in 1882 released to the Government, and those claiming under it, all his interest, to secure it against a second payment of the surplus. Upon these findings, counsel assume that the claimant retained possession of the property after the tax sale; and that he sold it to a third person for a valuable consideration, regardless of the sale and conveyance by the tax commissioners. But there was no evidence that the claimant was in possession, either at the time of the sale or afterwards; nor does it appear that the claimant ever asserted ownership over the property after the tax sale, and sold it, regardless of that sale, for a valuable consideration. His sale was made subject to the tax title, and could, therefore, have been of nothing more than his right to redeem the property from the tax sale, and the consideration paid is not stated. Of course it is not necessary to consider the argument founded upon these assumed facts, however ingeniously framed or however replete with learning.

The thirty-sixth section of the Act of June [August] 5, 1861, in prescribing the manner in which property subject to a direct tax shall be sold, where it is not divisible, so that by a sale of a part the whole amount of the tax, with costs, charges, and commissions, may be raised, provides that "The surplus of the proceeds of the sale, after satisfying the tax, costs, charges, and commissions, shall be paid to the owner of the property, or his legal representatives; or if he or they cannot be found, or refuse to receive the same, then such surplus shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to be there held for the use of the owner or his legal representatives, until he or they shall make application therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury, [126] who, upon such application, shall, by warrant on the Treasury, cause the same to be paid to the applicant." 12 Stat. at L. chap. 45, sec. 86, p. 304.

In United States v. Taylor, 104 U. S. 216 [26: 721], this section was the subject of consideration by this court; and it was held that it was not repealed by the Act of June 7, 1862; that prior to the application of the owner for the surplus he has no claim therefor which can be enforced by suit against the United States; and that the Statute of Limitations begins to run against it only from the date of his application. This decision covers the present case. It is of no consequence to the Government what the claimant did with his right of redemption; it was never exercised by him or the purchaser from him, assuming that it could have been enforced, and the time for its assertion has long since elapsed. The United States did not guaranty the title it gave upon the tax sale; and it does not appear that the levy or the proceedings for the sale have ever been called in question. If the sale was for any reason invalid, and the United States could be held to indemnify the owner therefor, the release by his quitclaim of all interest in the property would secure the Government against any claim on that account.

We see no valid ground for the refusal of the Secretary of the Treasury to comply with the command of the law and pay to the claimant the money which the Government has always held as trustee for him, and payable on his application.

Judgment affirmed.

Messrs. William S. Hall and L. S. Dabney, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by the United States against the members of the firm of Naylor & Co., in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, to recover a sum of money claimed to be due as [110] duties on merchandise, imported into the Port of Boston from England, in January, 1880. The importers paid the estimated amount of duties, and obtained possession of the goods, and this suit was brought to recover the difference between the duties so paid and a larger amount at which the collector subsequently liquidated the duties. The case was tried by the court without a jury, evidence being introduced by both parties. The court found the following facts: "The defendants imported into Boston from Liverpool the merchandise named in plaintiffs' declaration, which they (the defendants) invoiced and entered as 'scrap steel,' dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem. At the time of the entry they paid the estimated duties thereon, calculated at 30 per cent ad valorem, and all the merchandise was thereupon then delivered to them. No question was made but that a portion of the merchandise was dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem, as entered. The other and disputed portion of the merchandise consisted of pieces of steel railway bars, sawed at both ends, from two feet to six feet in length. After entry the whole merchandise was weighed by customs officers, proper examination was made thereof by the appraiser, who duly made report thereon to the collector, who, in due course and form of law, liquidated the entries, classifying the undisputed portion of the merchandise as it was entered, and assessing the duty thereon at 30 per cent ad valorem, but classifying the disputed portion as 'steel in bars, dutiable at 2½ cents a pound, under department decision of October 31, 1879, No. 4273.' Against this classification of the disputed portion of the merchandise and the ascertainment and liquidation of the duty thereon the defendants duly protested, and appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who sustained the action of the collector, and, the defendants not paying the duty thus ascertained and assessed, this action was brought. The plaintiffs claimed that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the provisions of section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, was final and conclusive, the defendants not having paid the duties and [111] brought suit to recover the amount so paid, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the whole amount found due upon liquidation by the collector, with interest, which amount so found due was $2,125.80. It also appeared that, owing to error in the supposed weight and amount of the merchandise when the estimated duties were paid, the proper duty due upon all the importations, calling the merchandise 'scrap steel,' as entered, and dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem, was $116.50 more than had been paid as the estimated duty thereon; which sum of $116.50 is included in the above amount of $2,125.80. The defendants introduced testimony tending to show, and the court found, as a fact, that the steel railway bars above described were commercially known as 'scrap steel,' and that they were fit only to be remanufactured."

Upon the foregoing facts the court ruled, as matter of law, that the assessment of duty by the collector upon the disputed portion of the merchandise was illegal, and that the plaintiffs were not, under the provisions of section 2931, entitled to recover the full amount they claimed, and ordered judgment for the plaintiffs for $116.50 only. To this ruling and order the plaintiffs excepted; and judgment being entered for them for $116.50, they have brought this writ of error.

The circuit court, in its decision, made in December, 1882, 14 Fed. Rep. 682, construed sections 2931 and 3011 of the Revised Statutes. Section 3011, as it stood at the time of these importations and stands now, reads as follows: "Any person who shall have made payment under protest and in order to obtain possession of merchandise imported for him, to any collector, or person acting as collector, of any money as duties, when such amount of duties was not, or was not wholly, authorized by law, may maintain an action in the nature of an action at law, which shall be triable by jury, to ascertain the validity of such demand and payment of duties, and to recover back any excess so paid. But no recovery shall be allowed in such action unless a protest [and appeal shall have been taken as prescribed in section twenty-nine hundred and thirty-one.]" The portion contained in brackets was inserted by the Act of February 27, 1877, chap. 69, 19 Stat. at L. 247, in place of the words "in writing and signed by the claimant or his agent, was made and delivered at or before the payment, setting [112] forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the amount claimed." Section 3011, as it originally stood in the Revised Statutes, was a re-enactment of the Act of February 26, 1845, chap. 22, 5 Stat. at L. 727.

Section 2931 is a re-enactment of section 14 of the Act of June 30, 1864, chap. 171, 13 Stat. at L. 214, and is in these words: "On the entry of any vessel, or of any merchandise, the decision of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of such vessel or on such merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, master, commander, or consignee of such vessel, in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on merchandise, or the costs and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, the grounds of his objection thereto, and shall, within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision of the Secretary on such appeal shall be final and conclusive; and such vessel, or merchandise, or costs and charges, shall be liable to duty accordingly, unless suit shall be brought within ninety days after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such vessel, or on such merchandise, or costs or charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary. No suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any duties alleged to have been erroneously or illegally exacted, until the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall have been first had on such appeal, unless the decision of the Secretary shall be delayed more than ninety days from the date of such appeal in case of an entry at any port east [113] of the Rocky Mountains, or more than five months in case of an entry west of those mountains." The view of the circuit court was, that, under section 3011, there could be no suit against a collector to recover back an excess of duties paid on merchandise imported, unless the payment, in addition to being made under protest, was made "in order to obtain possession" of the merchandise; that section 2931 did not destroy the limitation imposed by section 3011 on the right to sue to recover back duties or create any right to sue independently of such limitation; and that, consequently, as it was plain, as a fact, that the $2,009.30 of duties liquidated and sought to be recovered were illegally imposed, the importers could not, after paying them, recover them back, but could obtain the benefit of the exemption from the duty demanded by a defense in this suit, and by that means alone.

We concur in this view, and are of opinion that the proper construction of section 2931, in view of the fact that section 3011 is in force concurrently with it, is that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury is not final and conclusive, except in a case where, after a protest and an appeal, a payment of duties is made in order to obtain possession of the goods, and then a suit is not brought to recover back the duties within the times and under the limitations prescribed by section 2931. That being so, it is not final in the present case, there having been a payment of estimated duties, a delivery of the goods, a reliquidation assessing further duties, a protest, an appeal, and a suit against the importers by the United States to recover the further duties.

The United States cite the decision of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York in U. S. v. Cousinery, 7 Ben. 252, and the cases of Watt v. U. S. 15 Blatchf. 29, and U. S. v. Phelps, 17 Blatchf. 312, as sustaining the view maintained by them. The first case cited was decided in April, 1874, before the enactment of the Revised Statutes, in June, 1874; the second case in July, 1878; and the third in November, 1879. But this court, in November, 1883, in [114] Arnson v. Murphy, 109 U. S. 238 [27: 920], a suit brought against a collector in 1879, to recover back duties executed in 1871, held that the only existing authority for such a suit was to be found in the provisions of sections 3011 and 2931 taken together. In the opinion of this court at October Term, 1875, in Barney v. Watson, 92 U. S. 449 [23: 730], a suit brought to recover back duties paid in March, 1864, on an importation made in December, 1863, it was suggested that the Act of February 26, 1845, now section 3011, was supplied by section 14 of the Act June 30, 1864, now section 2931, and was thus repealed by implication. That case, however, arose before the Act of June 30, 1864, was passed, and not under it, though adjudged here after it was enacted. But the decision in Arnson v. Murphy was based on the view that sections 3011 and 2931 coexist, and must be construed together. So, what was held in United States v. Cousinery, under the idea that section 14 of the Act of June 30, 1864, was the only statute to be considered (and the Act of February 26, 1845, is not alluded to in the decision), is of no force when sections 3011 and 2931 are both of them to be taken into consideration, as coexisting. The same remarks apply to what was ruled, on the same basis, in United States v. Phelps.

In Watt v. United States, the suit was by the United States to recover duties liquidated in 1876 on an importation made in 1872, and there was no appeal after liquidation; and it was held that for that reason the defendant could not attack the liquidation.

Nor does anything in the decision in Westray v. United States, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 322 [21: 768], control the present case. That case had reference, it is true, to section 14 of the Act of June 30, 1864, and the suit was one by the United States, on a bond given on the entry of goods for warehousing, conditioned to pay the amount of duties to be ascertained to be due and owing on the goods. The duties were afterwards liquidated. The defendants, at the trial, offered to show that the duties should have been less. The evidence was excluded, on the ground that there had been no appeal from the decision of the collector, and this court sustained the ruling.

Judgment affirmed.

Contracts for carrying the mail—construction of.

In a suit on certain contracts for carrying the mails in the City of New York, it is held that the new or additional service which was to be performed without additional compensation is such service in the City of New York, and does not include additional service in carrying the mails to a depot in Jersey City.

Submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

CROSS appeals from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 20 Ct. Cl. 315. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Robert A. Howard, Assistant Atty-Gen., for the United States:

The claim of the contractor is for extra service in carrying mails from the foot of Cortlandt Street to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at Jersey City. It is admitted that this service was not included in the designation of routes in the contract. The contract nowhere contains any provision for compensation for extra, additional, or new service. On the contrary, the contractor agreed to perform all other mail messenger and transfer service now being performed in the said City of New York, and any and all new or additional mail messenger or transfer service in the said city, whether to and between depots and landings now established and those which may hereafter be established, which may become necessary and be required by the Postmaster-General, without additional compensation. And it was further stipulated and agreed that the Postmaster-General may order new or additional service which may become necessary to be performed, which shall be performed without additional compensation.

There is no uncertainty in the terms of this contract. No necessity exists to go beyond its language. The fact that the contract was prepared and furnished by the defendant does not affect the matter of dispute. The advertisement by the United States and the proposal by the contractor preceded the contract and are recited in it. These were the mutual acts of the parties; and the contract can, in the correct uses of phrases, be brought within the doctrine of a contract prepared by another and under which obligations were incurred or property parted with, as spoken of in Noonan v. Bradley, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 407 (19:761)

No question of quantum meruit, or equitable right to reasonable allowance by reason of a departure from the terms of the contract by mutual consent, as mentioned in Robert's Case, 92 U. S. 41 (23:646), need be considered here. The defendant relies upon the express covenant to perform all other mail messenger service without additional compensation.

It matters not whether the extra service was "other" or "new," or "additional;" it is fully covered by the stipulations of the agreement. It is useless elaboration to discuss whether it was additional to the designated service "from the New York City postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot (Jersey City) fifty-four (54) times per week," or whether it was other service, or new service, as distinguished from that specified. It is sufficient to know it was mail messenger service to a depot then established, and that it was required by the Postmaster-General. It was then, by reference to the contemporaneous acts of the contracting parties, service in the City of New York.

Mr. J. Coleman, for claimant:

The defendant, having ordered the change in the service, and the change being of such a nature as to reasonably involve the claimant in additional expense, he is entitled to recover the money paid by him for ferriage and also for the extra service performed by him. And the contract being silent upon the amount to be paid for the extra service, the measure of damage is the reasonable value of the service performed and interest on the amount paid by him from the time of payment.

Grant's Case, 5 Ct. Cl. 72; Cooper's Case, 8 Ct. Cl. 199; Ford v. U. S. 17 Ct. Cl. 60.

The chief guide in construing the contract is the actual intention of the parties—the understanding which they both had—not the design of either individually.

Gunnison v. Bancroft, 11 Vt. 490; 2 Pars. Cont. 7th ed. 631.

The court will consider the object which the parties had in view.

Springsteen v. Samson, 32 N. Y. 706; Lacy v. Green, 84 Pa. 514; Akins v. U. S. 17 Ct. Cl. 260.

It will take into consideration all the surrounding facts and circumstances.

Dent v. North Am. Steamship Co. 49 N. Y. 390; Thomas v. Wiggers, 41 Ill. 470; Karmuller v. Krotz, 18 Iowa, 352; U. S. v. Gibbons, 109 U. S. 200 (27: 906).

If any doubt exists, it should be construed strongly against the party who prepared it.

Noonan v. Bradley, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 394 (19: 757); Garrison v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 688 (19: 277).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

These are appeals by both parties from a judgment rendered by the court of claims in favor of George K. Otis against the United States for $16,445.36. The claims of Otis are founded on two contracts for carrying the mails, on two routes, No. 6636 and No. 6635. The findings of fact by the court of claims, contained in the record, are set forth at length in the report of the case in 20 Ct. Cl. 315. Such of them as are material are as follows:

As to No. 6636. Finding No. 1. The United States advertised, March 1, 1877, by an advertisement headed "Mail Station Service, New York City," for proposals "For carrying the mails of the United States from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1881, in the City of New York, as herein specified. Route No. 6636." The findings state that the advertisement designated the points to and from which the mails should be carried, but those points are not set forth in the findings. The advertisement then proceeded: "It is to be understood and agreed that any increase in the service which may be rendered necessary by the removal to other localities of [116] any of the above named stations, or by any other cause, may be ordered by the Postmaster-General, and shall be paid for pro rata; and, also, that compensation, pro rata, shall be deducted in case of decrease in said service, caused by any such removal or by the discontinuance of any of said stations."

Under this advertisement Otis made a written proposal "To carry the mails of the United States from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1881, on Route No. 6636, between New York City post-office and branch offices, State of New York, under the advertisement of the Postmaster-General dated March 1, 1877," for the sum of $14,900 per annum. On the 18th of April, 1877, a written contract was executed by the United States and Otis, which recited that the proposal of Otis, under said advertisement, "for the performance of the mail station service at the City of New York, in the said advertisement described," at the price and for the term above named, had been accepted, and then proceeded: "Now, therefore, the said contractor and his sureties do, jointly and severally, undertake, covenant and agree with the United States of America to carry the mail of the United States, using such proper means therefor, and particularly the wagons hereinafter described, as may be necessary to transport the whole of said mail, whatever may be its size or weight, during the term of this contract. * * * And any new or additional mail station service which may become necessary and be required by the Postmaster-General during the term of this contract. * * * It is further understood and agreed that any increase in the service which may be rendered necessary by the removal to other localities of any of the above named stations, or by any other cause, may be ordered by the Postmaster-General, and shall be paid for pro rata; and also that compensation, pro rata, shall be deducted in case of decrease in said service, caused by any such removal, or by the discontinuance of any of said stations."

Otis, while engaged in carrying the mails under this contract, and also under the contract for mail messenger service, set forth hereinafter in finding No. 2, was directed by the postmaster in New York City to perform the following trips: Eighteen round trips per week [117] from station E, No. 465 Eighth Avenue, to the Hudson River Railroad depot, Thirtieth Street and Tenth Avenue; six trips per week from postoffice to Harlem Railroad depot, Forty-Second Street and Fourth Avenue, 6:30 A. M. train. These trips were duly performed. The service between station E and the Hudson River Railroad depot amounted to 2,784 miles. The allowance therefor under said station service contract would be $657.58. The service between the postoffice and the Harlem Railroad depot amounted to 2,607.82 miles. The allowance therefor under said station service contract would be $615.97.

As to No. 6635. Finding No. 2. The United States advertised March 1, 1877, by an advertisement headed, "Mail Messenger Service, New York City," for proposals "For carrying the mails of the United States between the postoffice in the City of New York and the railroad stations and steamboat landings, and between the several stations where transfer service is required, from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1881", on Route No. 6635. The advertisement then proceeded: "The following schedule shows the mail messenger and transfer service now required at New York; but the accepted bidder under this advertisement will be required to perform, without additional compensation, any and all new or additional service that may become necessary during the term of the contract, whether to and between depots and landings now established or those which may be hereafter established. Bids must be made with this distinct understanding, and must name the amount per annum for the whole service, and not by the trip. There will be no diminution of compensation on account of the discontinuance of such portions of the service as may become unnecessary during the contract term; but deductions will be made for neglect of [118] duty. * * *

Under this advertisement Otis made a written proposal "To carry the mails of the United States, from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1881, on mail messenger route No. 6635, between the postoffice at New York City and the railroad stations and steamship landings in said city, including transfers between stations, and under the advertisement of the Postmaster-General, dated March 1, 1877," for the sum of $57,900 per annum. On the 13th of April, 1877, a written contract was executed by the United States and Otis, which recited that the proposal of Otis, under said advertisement, "For the performance of the mail messenger service at the City of New York, in the said advertisement described," at the price and for the term above named, had been accepted, and then proceeded:

"Now, therefore the said contractor and his sureties do, jointly and severally, undertake, covenant and agree with the United States of America to carry the mails of the United States, [119] using such proper means therefor, and particularly the wagons hereinafter described, as may be necessary to transport the whole of said mail, whatever may be its size or weight, during the term of this contract, as follows, to wit:

From the New York City postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot (Jersey City) fifty-four (54) times per week; returning from said depot to postoffice twenty-seven (27) times per week.

From the New York City postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot (foot of Cortlandt Street) and back fifty (50) times per week.

From the New York City postoffice to the New Jersey Southern Railroad depot and back twelve (12) times per week.

From the New York City postoffice to the Staten Island Railroad depot and back eighteen (18) times per week.

From the New York City postoffice to the Fall River boat landing six (6) times per week; returning from said landing to postoffice seven (7) times per week.

From the New York City postoffice to the Long Island Railroad depot and back thirty-six (36) times per week.

Transfers. Grand Central depot to Erie Railway six times a week; Grand Central depot to Pennsylvania Railroad twenty-four times a week; Grand Central depot (Boston line) to Grand Central depot (New York Central and Hudson River line) as often as required.

The transfer service to include the conveyance of all cases of postoffice supplies arriving for transit through the city; each and every transfer to be made as often as may be required by the Postmaster-General; and will do and perform all other mail messenger and transfer service now being performed in said City of New York, and any and all new or additional mail messenger or transfer service in the said city, whether to and between depots and landings now established and those which may hereafter be established, which may become necessary and be required by the Postmaster-General during the time of this contract, without additional compensation; said service to be performed at such hours of arrival and departure at and from the above designated points or places, or those which may be hereafter established, as the postmaster at New York City may order and direct.

It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the Postmaster-General may, if it be required by [121] the public interest, order new or additional service which may become necessary to be performed, which shall be performed without additional compensation; also, that he may discontinue or curtail the service, in whole or in part, if in his judgment the public interest shall so require, he allowing as full indemnity to the contractor one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with, and a pro rata compensation for the amount of service retained and continued."

While Otis was engaged in the performance of this contract, the United States, on the 12th of November, 1878, directed him to transport mails which theretofore had been transferred, as required by the contract, "from the New York City postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot (foot of Cortlandt Street) and back, fifty times per week," across the Hudson River to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey. This service Otis performed from November 12, 1878, to July 1, 1881. The pro rata compensation for it, as also its reasonable value, is $15,787.78. When the contract was executed, this extra service was being performed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, under contract with the United States.

The item for the extra service between station E and the Hudson River Railroad depot, $657.58, and the item for the extra service between the foot of Cortlandt Street and Jersey City, $15,787.78, were allowed by the court of claims. The item for the extra service between the postoffice and the Harlem Railroad depot, $615.97, was disallowed.

No error is assigned by Otis as to the disallowance of the $615.97. But the United States question the propriety of the allowance of the other two items. They contend that the "eighteen round trips per week from station E, No. 465 Eighth Avenue, to the Hudson River Railroad depot, Thirtieth Street and Tenth Avenue," were mail messenger service, under the contract for Route No. 6635, and not, as held by the court of claims, mail station service, under the contract for Route No. 6636. The argument is made that mail station service, under the latter contract, comprehended only service between the city postoffice and the stations or branch offices, and did not include service between a station or branch office and a railroad depot; and that the latter was mail messenger service, and was governed by the terms of the contract for Route No. 6635, which forbade extra compensation in regard to it. Although it does not appear by the record what points were designated in the advertisement or in the contract for Route No. 6636, as those between which the mails were to be carried, the fair inference is that there was no specific designation which would include the trips between station E and the Hudson River Railroad depot. The opinion of the court of claims says, on this subject, that this service was not "named in the station contract, but that instrument provided that any increase in mail station service should be paid for pro rata." It held that the service was, on its face, station service, the mails being taken from a station. The mail station service for which Otis proposed was designated in his proposal as "between New York City postoffice and branch offices," and the "mail station service" named in the contract is referred to as that for which Otis proposed. Any increase in the service which might be ordered was to be paid for pro rata. The service in question was an increase in the service, beyond that for which the $14,900 per annum was to be paid. The mail messenger contract for route No. 6635 did not contemplate mail station service, but only service between the main postoffice and railroad stations and steamboat landings. The $657.58 was, accordingly, properly allowed. [122]

As to the extra service to Jersey City, under the contract for Route No 6635, the contract covered fifty-four trips per week from the New York City postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at Jersey City, and twenty-seven trips per week from that depot to that postoffice, and also fifty trips per week from that postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at the foot of Cortlandt Street, and fifty trips per week from the latter depot to that postoffice. The finding of the court of claims is, that on each occasion of a trip under the item of fifty trips per week from the postoffice to the depot at the foot of Cortlandt Street and back, Otis was required, in addition, to carry the mails across the Hudson River, and did so. These trips were [123] no portion of the trips contracted for from the postoffice to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at Jersey City and back. It is also found by the court of claims that, when the contract was executed, this extra service in regard to the fifty trips was being performed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, under a contract with the United States. This extra service was not included in the routes designated in the contract.

The contract provides that Otis shall "do and perform all other mail messenger and transfer service now being performed in the said City of New York, and any and all new or additional mail messenger, or transfer service in the said city, whether to and between depots and landings now established and those which may hereafter be established, which may become necessary and be required by the Postmaster-General during the time of this contract, without additional compensation." There is this further provision: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the Postmaster-General may, if it be required by the public interest, order new or additional service which may become necessary to be performed, which shall be performed without additional compensation."

It is contended for the United States that, as Otis specifically agreed in the contract to carry the mails to the Pennsylvania Railroad depot at Jersey City, 54 times, and back 27 times, each week, in addition to carrying them to Cortlandt Street and back 50 times each week, the extra service across the river is "new or additional service" and so to be performed without additional compensation. But the fair construction of the two clauses of the contract, taken together, is that the new or additional service which is to be performed without additional compensation is [124] new or additional service in the City of New York, as expressed in the first clause. Especially is this so, as the contract specifically designates the 54 trips and the 27 trips as being to and from Jersey City, and then provides for 50 other trips to Cortlandt Street and 50 back. Under those circumstances, the limitation of the new or additional service to be performed without additional compensation, to such service in the City of New York, would be natural; service under the contract, and out of that city and to Jersey City, being specially provided for in the case of mails deliverable at a depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad, at Jersey City; and service under the contract, and out of the City of New York, being also provided for in six other instances of delivery in Jersey City, and one in Hoboken, and one in Long Island City, at places to be reached only by ferries.

Judgment affirmed.

[86] MAMIE M. ROBERTS, EXTX. of FANNIE M. COOK, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

PHŒNIX MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 86-89.)

Life insurance—action by assignee of policy—proof of assignment, necessary.

One claiming to be the assignee of a policy of life insurance cannot maintain an action thereon without satisfactory proof of the assignment.

[No. 125.]

Argued Jan. 12, 13, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky. Affirmed.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Messrs. Marc. Mundy, Samuel Shellabarger and J. M. Wilson, for appellant:

A. B. Cook, as creditor of William G. Harvison, had an insurable interest in his life to the amount of the indebtedness.

Cammack v. Lewis, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 643 (21: 244); Thatch v. Metropole Ins. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 29.

The policy, being made payable to A. B. Cook, his executors, administrators or assignees, is assignable. The use of the word "assigns" is direct authority for the payment of the assignee.

Pomeroy v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. 40 Ill. 398; N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Flack, 3 Md. 341; Page v. Burnstine, 102 U. S. 664 (26:268).

Although the legal title remains in Cook, the equitable right to have, use and enjoy the donation as separate estate, passed to and vested in appellant in September, 1872, and equity created him her trustee.

Maraman v. Maraman, 4 Met. (Ky.) 84; Penn v. Young, 10 Bush, 628; Campbell v. Galbreath, 12 Bush, 459; Thomas v. Harkness, 13 Bush, 25.

Mr. Augustus E. Willson, for appellee:

Complainant cannot recover, because she had no insurable interest in the life insured; and the policy on that life could not be assigned to her.

Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775 (26:924); Basye v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368.

If Dr. Cook had assigned this policy directly to his wife, as alleged, he could, unless such assignment was exhibited to the Company, sell the policy to the Company even against her wishes.

Kitchen v. Bedford, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 413 (20: 637); Cassell v. Carroll, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 134 (6:438). See Moore v. Page, 111 U. S. 119 (28: 373).

The assignment to complainant is not proved. The only testimony to prove the execution or delivery of the assignment of the policy by Dr. Cook, the beneficiary named in the policy, to complainant, is that of complainant's husband, and he is not a competent witness to prove this for his wife.

Civ. Code Prac. Kentucky, §§ 606-1; Rev. Stat. U. S. § 858; Stein v. Bowman, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 221 (10:135); Lucas v. Brooks, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 452 (21:783).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 27th of August, 1872, the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Hartford, [87]
Connecticut, a Connecticut corporation, issued a policy, No. 66,488, whereby, in consideration of the representations made to them in the application for the policy, and the sum of $1,024 to it duly paid "by A. B. Cook, creditor," and of the annual payment of a like amount on or before the 27th day of August in every year during the continuance of the policy, it assured the life of William G. Harvison, of Louisville, Kentucky, in the amount of $20,000, for the term of his natural life, the amount of the insurance to be paid, after the death of Harvison, "to the said A. B. Cook, creditor, and his executors, administrators or assigns," "any indebtedness to the Company on account of this policy being first deducted therefrom." The policy was in force at the death of Harvison, which occurred August 25, 1880. Fannie M. Cook, the wife of the said A. B. Cook, both of whom resided at Louisville, Kentucky, commenced a suit in March, 1881, in a state court of Kentucky, against the Company, to recover on the policy $17,340, with interest, being the amount of the policy, less certain premium notes. She based her claim to recover on a written assignment, which she alleged had been executed by her husband, A. B. Cook, and delivered to her, on the 19th of September, 1872, twenty-three days after the date of the policy, and which was in these words:

"This instrument of writing certifies that the policy No. 66,488 I have taken out on the life of Wm. G. Harvison, for twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, in the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Hartford, Connecticut, was taken out by me for the sole benefit of my wife, Fannie M. Cook; and I hereby declare that the above mentioned life policy of $20,000, and the money secured thereby, is given and assigned to my said wife as separate estate, and shall continue to be the separate estate of my said wife; and whether the said Harvison dies before or after me, my said wife shall have and receive and hold said money as her separate estate and for her separate and sole benefit, to dispose of as she may think proper.

Witness my hand, this 19th day of September, 1872, at Louisville, Ky.

A. B. COOK."

The suit was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, where the plaintiff filed a bill in equity making the Company and A. B. Cook defendants, and praying judgment against the Company for the $17,340 and interest. The Company answered, setting up various defenses, on which issue was joined. A. B. Cook also answered. On a hearing on proofs, the court dismissed the bill, without delivering any opinion, oral or written. The plaintiff appealed to this court. She has since died, and her executrix has been substituted as plaintiff.

It appears, by the proofs, that A. B. Cook, on the 14th of June, 1880, and before Harvison's death, received from the Company $4,000, and delivered to it the policy and the following instrument, signed by him, indorsed on the policy:

"Louisville, Ky., June 14, 1880.

I hereby sell, transfer, and assign to the Phœnix Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn., all right and title to the within policy on the life of W. G. Harvison, in consideration of the sum of four thousand dollars in hand paid, by draft on the said Co., and a return of the premium notes.

A. B. COOK."

Among the defenses set up and urged by the defendant were: (1) that A. B. Cook, who was a witness for his wife, was not a competent witness for her under the Statutes of Kentucky; (2) that no assignment of the policy by A. B. Cook to his wife was ever in fact executed and delivered; (3) that Fannie M. Cook had no insurable interest in the life of Harvison, and, therefore, could not become assignee of the policy; (4) that the statement in the application for the policy, that Harvison was not addicted to the habitual use of spirituous liquors, was untrue; (5) that after the policy was issued the habits of Harvison became, as to the use of spirituous liquors, so far different from his habits as to such use represented in the application, as to make the risk more than ordinarily hazardous.

[89] Without considering any of the other questions raised, we are of opinion that, as a matter of fact, and even conceding that A. B. Cook was a competent witness, the assignment by him to his wife is not satisfactorily proved to have been made or delivered prior to the transaction of June 14, 1880. The evidence on that point is conflicting, and it would not be profitable to discuss it in detail. As the suit cannot be maintained without proof of the assignment, the decree is affirmed.

CRESCENT CITY LIVE-STOCK LANDING AND SLAUGHTER-HOUSE COMPANY ET AL., Plffs. in Err., [141]

v.

BUTCHERS' UNION SLAUGHTER-HOUSE AND LIVE-STOCK LANDING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 141-160.)

Jurisdiction—constitutional law—malicious prosecution—probable cause—prior adverse judgment of state court—history of litigation as to an alleged exclusive privilege to carry on the live-stock landing and slaughter-house business in New Orleans.

1. Whether a state court has given due effect to a decree or judgment of a court of the United States is a question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and is within the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

2. In an action for a malicious prosecution, brought in a state court, it is held that the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States in the action complained of is conclusive evidence of probable cause; although an adverse judgment had been rendered by the Supreme Court of the State in a prior action by the defendant against a different party.

3. Want of probable cause and the existence of malice, express or implied, must concur to entitle the plaintiff to recover in an action for a malicious prosecution.

Submitted Jan. 6, 1887. Decided Jan. 24, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Reported below, 37 La. Ann. 874. Affirmed in part, reversed in part.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., and Robert Mott, for plaintiffs in error:

The right set up by the plaintiffs in error to the protection of the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States in the injunction suit, was a right claimed under an authority exercised under the United States, within the meaning of section 709, R. S.

Dupasseur v. Rochereu, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22: 588); Buck v. Colbath, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 334 (18: 257); Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28: 582); New Orleans, etc. R. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 501 (29: 244).

To maintain an action for malicious prosecution there must be a concurrence of malice and want of probable cause.

Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 194 (25: 119).

"Probable cause is judicially ascertained by the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court thereon, although upon an appeal a contrary verdict and judgment be given in a higher court."

Griffis v. Sellars, 4 Dev. & B. Law, 177. See also Herman v. Brookerhoff, 8 Watts, 240; Kaye

v. Kean, 18 B. Mon. 845; Whitney v. Peckham, 15 Mass. 243; Palmer v. Avery, 41 Barb. 290; Reynold v. Kennedy, B. R. 1 Wils. 232; Witham v. Gowen, 14 Me. 362; Cooley, Torts, 185.

We deny that the decision of the State Supreme Court in the previous case against the City of New Orleans debarred the Crescent City, etc. Company from filing a bill against another party in the United States Circuit Court for the purpose of litigating the very point of constitutional law involved in the first suit, or that it was the duty of the circuit court to accept the doctrine laid down by the state court until it should be overruled by this court. No authority for this has been or can be shown.

What the Crescent City, etc. Company wanted was the decision of this court on the constitutional provision which it claimed had invaded its monopoly; and it is certainly not obnoxious to censure if, finding that the federal question involving that point was not properly raised in its suit against the City of New Orleans, or that there was room for doubt in that particular, it pursued the direct course of filing a bill in the United States Circuit Court which did fairly present that question.

Messrs. E. Howard McCaleb and B. R. Forman, for defendant in error:

We deny that in a suit brought to recover damages for a malicious prosecution the judgment of an inferior court, subsequently reversed, is conclusive, in all cases, of probable cause sufficient to exempt the prosecutor from liability.

The better opinion would seem to be that the judgment of the court of the first instance, afterward reversed, "if regarded as evidence of probable cause, is prima facie only, and not conclusive."

Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 236; Burt v. Place, 4 Wend. 591.

What is the probable force and effect of a reversed judgment? Whether such judgment amounts to full and complete evidence of probable cause is not a federal question, but one of general law, as to which the decision of the state court is not examinable here.

"The legal effect of the judgment set up in bar is a question of general law, as to which the decision of the state court is not reversible here. The federal questions, if any there were in the case, lay behind this defense, and could not be reached until it was out of the way."

Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 201 (28: 401).

"The general rule is, the lex fori governs the admissibility and effect of evidence."

Blocker v. Whittenburg, 12 La. Ann. 401; Story, Confl. L. § 629; Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 412 (23: 248); Whart. Ev. § 316.

The reversed decree of the circuit judge in the case of the Crescent City Company v. Butchers Union Company, granting and subsequently perpetuating the injunction complained of, was a direct violation of the prior judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of the Crescent City Slaughter-House Company v. City of New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 934. The decision of the State Supreme Court in the last mentioned suit was virtually a decree between the same parties on the same subject matter; because in the suit previously decided by the state court, the City of New Orleans, acting in its corporate capacity, represented all of its inhabitants, every person within its limits, both natural and artificial, individuals and corporations.

A judgment rendered for or against a city is res judicata as against its inhabitants.

Parker v. Scogin, 11 La. Ann. 629; Shields v. Chase, 32 La. Ann. 409; Freem. Judg. § 178.

The decree of the circuit court was void for want of jurisdiction over the controversy, because the suit did not arise under the Constitution of the United States and the parties were citizens of the same State.

The decree of a court without jurisdiction over the controversy furnishes no justification and is not even "prima facie" evidence of probable cause. All proceedings had under such decree are wrongful and a trespass.

Hayes v. Younglove, 7 B. Mon. 545.

In order to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, it is necessary to hold that a judgment of a federal circuit judge allowing an injunction, or maintaining an attachment, arrest or other writ, even though reversed on appeal, is, regardless of circumstances, a complete and perfect bar under federal laws and the Federal Constitution, to any action for damages, although the same questions had been twice decided by the highest court of the State adversely to the prosecutor in litigation provoked by himself.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court; [142]

This is a writ of error bringing into review a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, reported in 37 Louisiana Annual Reports, 874. The federal question arising upon the record presented for our consideration is, whether the Supreme Court of Louisiana in its determination of the case gave due effect to a certain decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, in a previous litigation between the same parties. That question is presented upon the following case:

The plaintiff in error is a corporation created by the laws of Louisiana, which, by an Act of the Legislature of that State, passed March 8, 1869, was invested with the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock landing and slaughter-house business within the City of New Orleans and the Parishes of Orleans, Jefferson and St. Bernard. The validity of this monopoly was sustained by the decision of this court in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36 [21: 394], on the ground that this grant of exclusive right or privilege was a police regulation for the health and comfort of the people within the power of the State Legislature, and not in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States. The Company continued thenceforward to use and enjoy its exclusive privileges until the adoption by the people of Louisiana of a new State Constitution in the year 1879. That [143] Constitution contained the following articles:

"Article 248. The police juries of the several parishes, and the constituted authorities of all incorporated municipalities of the State, shall alone have the power of regulating the slaughtering of cattle and other live stock within their respective limits; Provided, No monopoly or exclusive privilege shall exist in this State, nor such business be restricted to the land or houses of any individual or corporation; Provided, The ordinances designating places for slaughtering shall obtain the concurrent approval of the board of health or other sanitary organization.

"Article 258. The monopoly features in the charter of any corporation now existing in the State, save such as may be contained in the charters of railroad companies, are hereby abolished."

The City of New Orleans, by ordinances adopted in 1881, proceeded to declare, under article 248 of the Constitution, within what limits in the Parish of Orleans animals, intended for food, might be slaughtered, in which the board of health of the State of Louisiana concurred. In March, 1880, the Butchers Union Slaughter-House and Live-Stock Landing Company, the defendant in error, became incorporated under the general law of Louisiana, and was authorized by its charter "To erect, at any point or place in the Parish of Orleans, wharves, stables, sheds, yards and buildings necessary to land, stable, shelter, protect and preserve all kinds of horses, mules, cattle and other animals, for the purpose of carrying on the live-stock landing and slaughter-house business, and for the purpose of sheltering and protecting all such cattle or other animals which may be sent to said Company destined for slaughter; and the said Company shall, as soon as practicable, build and complete a slaughter-house; also a sufficient number of sheds and stables and other buildings as may be deemed necessary for the carrying on said slaughtering business."

This Company having begun to acquire the necessary plant for conducting the live-stock and slaughtering business, in pursuance of its [144] charter, the plaintiff in error, on the 23d of November, 1881, filed its bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana against the defendant in error, setting up its exclusive right and privilege as claimed by it under its original charter and grant, alleging that the defendant was about to violate the same, and praying for an injunction to restrain that Company from carrying out its purpose. On the 29th of December, 1881, after notice and hearing, the judges of that court granted the injunction as prayed for pendente lite. On final hearing on the 8th of May, 1882, this injunction was made perpetual. On May 5, 1884, this decree of the circuit court was reversed by this court by a decision reported in 111 U. S. 746 [28: 585], on the ground that the exclusive right originally granted to the plaintiff in error was valid only as an exercise of the police power of the State, and was of that character, having reference to the public health, that it could not be made the subject of contract, protected against subsequent legislation by the Constitution of the United States.

In granting the preliminary injunction referred to, the plaintiff in error was required to and gave an injunction bond in the sum of $8,000, with Bertrand Saloy as surety, reciting the allowance of the injunction pendente lite, and conditioned to pay to the defendant in said injunction all such damages as it might suffer or had suffered in consequence thereof. The present action was begun in the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans on May 28, 1884, by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error and Bertrand Saloy, by a petition in which a recovery is sought upon the bond against the defendants in solido for the sum of $8,000, with 5 per cent interest from judicial demand for a breach of its condition, and against the Company alone for the further sum of $70,000 damages, with 5 per cent interest from the date of the verdict, on the alleged ground of a malicious prosecution by the complainant therein of the said bill in equity for an injunction. This cause came on for trial by a jury when there was a verdict against both defendants for $6,588.80, with interest, and against the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company alone, upon the plea [145] of malicious prosecution, for the sum of $12,500 damages, and the further sum of $2,500 attorneys' fees. Upon the trial the defendant relied upon the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, granting and perpetuating the injunction, as conclusive proof of probable cause for the institution and prosecution of the suit complained of. The rulings of the civil district court upon this defense are set out in several bills of exception. In one of them it appears that the judge left it to the jury to determine whether the decree of the circuit court constituted probable cause or not, adding that in his opinion it was both remarkable and extraordinary, and, as explanatory of that, the bill of exceptions signed by him contains the following statement: "I describe the action of the federal court as 'remarkable and extraordinary,' because it set at naught the decisions of the State Courts of Louisiana, of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, set at defiance the positive mandate of the State Constitution, and because it was held by the unanimous Supreme Court of the United States to have involved a usurpation of jurisdiction; such action was truly 'remarkable and extraordinary,' though not without deplorable precedent."

It also appears that the defendants requested the judge to charge the jury as follows:

"A plaintiff, whose asserted right was conferred by an Act of Legislature and has been in force for a number of years, has a right to test the legality of a subsequent repeal of said right, when the validity of such repeal or modification has not been finally settled, and the plaintiff is advised by competent counsel that the repeal is invalid. In such a case the plaintiff has probable cause for asserting his rights and instituting an action for such purpose. If, in the action instituted, the lower court being the Circuit Court of the United States, presided over by two judges, render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the existence of probable cause for instituting such suit is demonstrated by the finding of the judges of the circuit court, although their judgment was reversed on appeal."

This charge the judge refused to give, on the ground that it was unsound in law. Judgment [146] was rendered on the verdict February 24, 1885, and the cause was removed by a suspensive appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana for the final decision of that court, by which, on December 14, 1885, it was affirmed.

It is contended by counsel for the defendant in error that, in examining the record in this case, this court will only consider the opinion and judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in order to ascertain if the authority relied upon by the plaintiff in error was wrongfully disregarded by that tribunal, and that without reference to the rulings of the inferior court, the opinion of the supreme court being made a part of the record by law for that purpose. Such appears to be the law of Louisiana as recognized by the decisions of this court. Code, Prac. La. art. 905; Parks v. Turner, 53 U. S. 12 How. 48 [13: 885]; Hennen, Dig. p. 92, No. 3; Cousin v. Blanc's Exrs. 60 U. S. 19 How. 202 [15: 601]; Grand Gulf R. R. & Banking Co. v. Marshall, 53 U. S. 12 How. 165 [13: 938]; Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 634 [22: 443]; Crossley v. New Orleans, 108 U. S. 105 [27: 667]; Caperton v. Bowyer, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 216 [20: 882].

It must therefore be conceded that the sole question to be determined is, Did the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in deciding against the plaintiffs in error, give proper effect to the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, subsequently reversed by this court?

It is argued by counsel for the defendant in error that this does not embrace any federal question; that the effect to be given to a judgment or decree of the Circuit Court of the United States sitting in Louisiana by the courts of that State is to be determined by the law of Louisiana, or by some principle of general law as to which the decision of the state court is final; and that the ruling in question did not deprive the plaintiffs in error of "any privilege or immunity specially set up or claimed under the Constitution or laws of the United States." But this is an error. The question whether a state court has given due effect to the judgment of a court of the United States is a question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and comes within the jurisdiction of the federal courts by proper process, although, as was said by this court in Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130, 135 [147] [22: 588, 590]: "No higher sanctity or effect can be claimed for the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States rendered in such a case, under such circumstances, than is due to the judgments of the state courts in a like case and under similar circumstances." Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3 [27: 346]. It may be conceded, then, that the judgments and decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States, sitting in a particular State, in the courts of that State are to be accorded such effect, and such effect only, as would be accorded in similar circumstances to the judgments and decrees of a state tribunal of equal authority. But it is within the jurisdiction of this court to determine, in this case, whether such due effect has been given by the Supreme Court of Louisiana to the decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States here drawn in question.

The decree of the circuit court was relied upon in the state court as a complete defense to the action for malicious prosecution, on the ground that it was conclusive proof of probable cause. The Supreme Court of Louisiana, affirming the judgment of the inferior state court, denied to it, not only the effect claimed, but any effect whatever.

It is conceded that according to the law of Louisiana the action for a malicious prosecution is founded on the same principles, and subject to the same defenses, as have been established by the common law prevailing in the other States.

In the case of Hubgh v. New Orleans & Carrollton R. R. Co. 6 La. Ann. 495, it was said that "The dispositions of article 2294 are found in the Roman and Spanish laws. So far from being new legislation, that article embodies a general principle as old as the science of jurisprudence itself, and it must still be understood with the limitations affixed to it by the jurisprudence of Rome and Spain. Domat, Lois Civiles, title, Dommages Causés par des Fautes, p. 180, par. 1." In the same case the court said on a rehearing: "The article 2294 of our Code provides that every act whatever of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it. The provisions of this article, however general and comprehensive its terms may be, may be found more than once recited in terms equally general and comprehensive in the laws of the fifteenth title of the seventh Partidas. The article was in- [148] serted in the Code of 1809, at a time when the Spanish laws were in force. It was put and retained to this time in the Code, not for the purpose of making any change in the law, but because it was a principle which was in its proper place in a code, a principle which would be equally recognized as a necessary conservative element of society, and equally obligatory whether it was formally enacted in a code or not."

In the case of Senecat v. Smith, 9 Rob. (La.) 420, it had been previously decided that "In cases of this kind it is well settled that malice and the want of probable cause in the original action are essential ingredients. Malice may be expressly proved or it may be inferred from the total want of a probable cause of action; but malice alone, however great, if there be a probable cause upon which the suit or prosecution is based, is insufficient to maintain an action in damages for a malicious prosecution."

In the case of Gould v. Gardner, 8 La. Ann. 11, it was determined that the defendants in the case were not without probable cause for the arrest of the plaintiff, which was the ground of the action, because they acted by the advice of eminent and learned counsel, though his opinion was held to be erroneous. The court refer to the case of Stone v. Swift, 4 Pick. 389, in Massachusetts, and that of Foshay v. Ferguson, 2 Den. 619, in New York, as sufficient authority in support of their opinion, and add as follows: "Our Code and statutes have not provided any rules to guide us on the trial of such actions, and we are governed in the absence of positive legislation by the rules laid down in the authorities quoted, because we consider them just and reasonable in themselves." In the opinion in the present case, the Supreme Court of Louisiana says that to sustain the charge of malicious prosecution it is necessary to show: "1, that the suit had terminated unfavorably to the prosecutor; 2, that in bringing it the prosecutor had acted without probable cause; 3, that he was actuated by legal malice, i. e. by improper or sinister motives. The above three elements must concur."

And when there is no dispute of fact, the [149] question of probable cause is a question of law for the determination of the court. Stewart v.

Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 194 [25:116, 119]. Want of probable cause and the existence of malice, either express or implied, must both concur to entitle the plaintiff in an action for a malicious prosecution to recover. So that if probable cause is shown, the defense is perfect, notwithstanding the defendant in instituting and carrying on the action may have been actuated solely by a motive and intent of malice. If he had probable cause to institute his action, the motives by which he was actuated and the purposes he had in view are not material.

How much weight as proof of probable cause shall be attributed to the judgment of the court in the original action, when subsequently reversed for error, may admit of some question. It does not appear to have been judicially determined in Louisiana. In the case of Griffin v. Sellars, 4 Dev. & B. L. 177, Ruffin, C. J., said "That probable cause is judicially ascertained by the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court thereon, although upon an appeal a contrary verdict and judgment be given in a higher court." In Whitney v. Peckham, 15 Mass. 243, such a judgment was held to be conclusive in favor of the existence of probable cause. To the same effect is Herman v. Brookerhoff, 8 Watts, 240, in an opinion of Chief Justice Gibson. The decision in the case of Whitney v. Peckham, ubi supra, however, was questioned by the Supreme Court of New York in the case of Burt v. Place, 4 Wend. 591, 598, where Marcy, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said that the Massachusetts decision rested entirely upon Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wilson, Rep. 232, which had been qualified by the decision of Eyre, Baron of the Exchequer, in Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 Term Rep. 505, and by what was said by Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough in the same case, which came before them on a writ of error. 1 Term Rep. 512. The effect of these English authorities, as stated by Marcy, J., in Burt v. Place, ubi supra, is as follows: "That if it appears by the plaintiff's own declaration that the prosecution, which he charges to have been malicious, was before a [150] tribunal having jurisdiction, and was there decided in favor of the plaintiff in that court, nothing appearing to fix on him any unfair means in conducting the suit, the court will regard the judgment in favor of the prosecution satisfactory evidence of probable cause."

In that case the judgment relied upon by the defendant was held not to be conclusive. The reason is stated to be as follows: "Though the plaintiff admits in his declaration that the suits instituted before the magistrate by the defendant were decided against him, he sufficiently countervails the effect of that admission by alleging that the defendant, well knowing that he had no cause of action, and that the plaintiff had a full defense, prevented the plaintiff from procuring the necessary evidence to make out that defense by causing him to be detained a prisoner until the judgments were obtained, and by alleging that the imprisonment was for the very purpose of preventing a defense to the actions."

Commenting on this case, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in Spring v. Besore, 12 B. Mon. 551, 555, says: "The principle settled in the case last cited we understand to be that such a judgment will not in every possible state of case be deemed to be conclusive of the question of probable cause; but that, like judgments in other cases, its effect may be destroyed by showing that it was procured by fraud or other undue means." That court proceeds to state the rule as follows: "The correct doctrine on the subject is, in our opinion, that the decree or judgment in favor of the plaintiff, although it be afterwards reversed, is, in cases where the parties have appeared and proof has been heard on both sides, conclusive evidence of probable cause, unless other matters be relied upon to impeach the judgment or decree and show that it was obtained by fraud; and, in that case, it is indispensable that such matter should be alleged in the plaintiff's declaration; for, unless it be done, as the other facts which have to be stated establish the existence of probable cause, the declaration is suicidal. The plaintiff's declaration will itself always furnish evidence of probable cause when it states, as it must do, the proceedings that have taken place in the suit alleged to be malicious, and shows that a judgment or decree has been rendered against the [151] plaintiff. To counteract the effect of the judgment or decree and the legal deduction of probable cause, it is incumbent upon him to make it appear in his declaration that such judgment or decree was unfairly obtained, and was the result of acts of malice, fraud and oppression on the part of the defendant, designed and having the effect to deprive him of the opportunity and necessary means to have defeated the suit and obtained a judgment in his favor."

The limitations upon the general principle declared in Burt v. Place, ubi supra, were followed by the Supreme Court of Maine in Witham v. Gowen, 14 Me. 362, and both decisions were referred to in the subsequent case of Payson v. Caswell, 22 Me. 212, 226, where the court said: "In these two cases, we have instances of exceptions to the general rule, indicative of the general nature of the characteristics which might be expected to attend them; but the rule itself remains unimpaired. If there be a conviction before a magistrate having jurisdiction of the subject matter, not obtained by undue means, it will be conclusive evidence of probable cause."

The propriety of this limitation of the rule seems to have been admitted by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217, 230, though in later cases it reiterated the broader rule as originally stated in Whitney v. Peckham, ubi supra. Parker v. Huntington, 7 Gray, 36.

This seems to reconcile the apparent contradiction in the authorities, and states the rule, which we think to be well grounded in reason, fair and just to both parties, and consistent with the principle on which the action for malicious prosecution is founded.

It is, perhaps, not material in this case to define the rule with precision, and to attempt to state with accuracy the precise effect to be given to a judgment or decree of the court as proof of probable cause under all circumstances, because in the present case the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States was adjudged to be entitled to no effect whatever as evidence in support of the defense of the plaintiff in error.

The ground on which the Supreme Court of [152]

Louisiana proceeded, as stated in its opinion, is explained to be as follows:

Shortly after the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, the plaintiff in error instituted a suit in the State Court of Louisiana, which was finally decided by the Supreme Court of the State in Crescent City Slaughter-House Company v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 934. The object of the suit was to obtain a writ of injunction "restraining the City of New Orleans from entertaining any petitions for, and from ever designating any place or places for, the landing, yarding, sheltering or slaughtering any animal or animals intended for human food in the Parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard, other than at the slaughter-houses and premises of the petitioner, and above the United States barracks on the east or left bank of the Mississippi River, and above the depot of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad, on the west or right bank or side of the Mississippi River."

There was a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's suit, and dissolving the injunction provisionally granted, from which the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court of Louisiana. That court affirmed the judgment, holding that the articles of the new Constitution had destroyed the monopoly claimed by the plaintiff, and that this was a valid exercise of power on the part of the State of Louisiana, not in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States. Speaking of the action of the present plaintiff in error in bringing that suit, the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in its opinion in the present case (37 La. Ann. 874, 876), says: "The questions involved were serious and important. Defendant's right to assert judicially the validity of his contract, and to resist by all legal remedies the execution of any state law which impaired it, was unquestioned. The question involved was federal in its nature, and the courts of the State, and perhaps of the United States, were equally open to it for the vindication of its alleged right; and, in either forum, it was entitled to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States for the final and conclusive settlement of the question." And, referring to the judgment in that suit, it also says: "It is important to estimate the scope and effect of this decision. It was an authoritative [153] judicial determination, by a competent court, of questions submitted to it at the instance of the Company itself. In denying the rights claimed by the Company, and in affirming the right of the city to regulate slaughtering within her limits and to designate places for the conduct of such business, it necessarily affirmed the right of persons complying with such regulations to transact that business at such places, and denied the right of this Company to interfere with them. If there was error in the decision, that error could be corrected by one tribunal only, the Supreme Court of the United States. Until the questions involved had been determined differently by that high tribunal, the decision of this court was entitled to be accepted as the law by this litigant. Technical principles of lis pendens and res judicata might not debar the Company from prosecuting another suit against a different party involving the same subject matter; but if such suit rested exclusively upon the assertion of rights which this court had directly determined that the Company did not possess, it could find no p tection against the charge of being a malici prosecution, save in the production of a d sion of the Supreme Court of the United Sta holding that our opinion was error."

The following extracts from the same op ion are on the same point:

"We are bound to hold that there was ent absence of probable cause. The suit involv absolutely nothing but questions of law. Th identical questions had been submitted to t court by this very prosecutor in a case precis analogous, and had been determined agai him. It was thus authoritatively advised w the law was. If it was dissatisfied with opinion, its remedy was clear by appeal to United States Supreme Court, and it had r ually availed itself of that remedy on a writ error which was pending and determined wh this suit was brought. It must be carefu observed that, though the Butchers' Union Co pany was not technically a party to the s against the city, the questions of right betwe it and the Crescent City Company were as rectly involved as if it had been a party. the city had the right to regulate slaughteri within her limits, and to designate places its lawful conduct, obviously persons comp ing with such regulations had the right to tra act the business. If she had not that right, person could lawfully slaughter elsewhere th at the old Company's slaughter-house. * *

"But it is claimed that the prosecutor act under the advice of counsel learned in the la That is certainly true, and would ordinar protect. But here the client was in possessi of the opinion of this court on the very point its own case, involving the same subject matt It had no need for advice of counsel. Th advice was simply that the opinion of this co was error. Counsel had the undoubted rig to entertain such opinion, and so to advise client; the only lawful remedy under such vice consisted in an appeal to the United Sta Supreme Court. If it chose to act otherw on such advice it acted at its peril, and can ta no protection therefrom. The only lawful tion it could take under such advice had ready been taken in the writ of error from t United States Supreme Court. * * *

"Nor does the decision of the judges of t Circuit Court of the United States afford a b ter shield. They are not vested with author to review or reverse the decisions of this cou The effect of their action was not only to ov rule our opinion, but practically to reverse c decree; for of what avail was the right creed by us in favor of the city, to regul slaughtering and to designate places theref if persons complying with those regulatio could be enjoined by the United States Circ Court from conducting the business at su places? It is obvious that the entire subj matter of the injunction suit was embraced and disposed of by our decree; and that thou the Butchers' Union Company was not no inally a party, its rights and those of all perso to transact the business of slaughtering in t city, being subsidiary to and springing direc from the right of the city, were necessarily volved in and protected by our decree. * *

"But the ground on which we rest our co clusion on the question of probable cause that our decree in the suit, to which the defendant corporation was a party, was, until reversed, the law to it so far as the subject matter [155] thereof is concerned; that the prosecution of a suit which had no foundation, except in the assumption that our decree was not law, was without probable cause; and that neither the advice of counsel, nor the opinions of judges of a co-ordinate court that our decree was error, could furnish any cause whatever for the prosecution of such suit."

It is conceded by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in this opinion, that its prior judgment in the case between the plaintiff in error and the City of New Orleans could not operate as an estoppel upon the principle of res judicata, in the suit which the plaintiff in error brought in the Circuit Court of the United States, the prosecution of which is charged against it as being malicious, because it was between different parties. It is also admitted that the judgment was not a final one, but by reason of the federal question involved was subject to review and possible reversal by a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States. The prosecution of such a writ of error, which was in fact actually sued out but subsequently dismissed, is declared by the Supreme Court of Louisiana to be the only lawful course which the plaintiff in error had a right to pursue. The failure to prosecute that writ of error is charged against the plaintiff in error, so as not only to deprive him of the benefit of the defense of probable cause, but as sufficient proof of malice in the subsequent institution of his suit in the Circuit Court of the United States; and these consequences, in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, are not alleviated by the admitted fact that the plaintiff in error acted under the advice of counsel. Notwithstanding such advice, the client itself, the Supreme Court of Louisiana declared, was bound at its peril to take notice of its legal rights as defined in that opinion of the Supreme Court of the State.

It is not shown in the present record on what grounds counsel proceeded in their advice, or the plaintiff in error in failing to prosecute the writ of error from that judgment. It will be observed that the only relief sought in that suit was a writ of injunction against the City of New Orleans from taking the preliminary steps under the ordinances of the city in reference to entertaining petitions, and designating places, [156] for the prosecution of the business of which it claimed to have a monopoly under its charter.

In a similar case of the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company v. Police Jury, Parish of Jefferson, right bank, decided by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, 32 La. Ann. 1192, the plaintiff, who is the plaintiff in error herein, sought to enjoin the defendant from granting permission to any one to establish a slaughter-house in the Parish of Jefferson, on the ground that such a grant of authority would be in violation of the exclusive rights given to it under its charter; a case precisely analogous to that between the plaintiff in error and the City of New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 934. In the case against the Police Jury of Jefferson Parish, the appeal and the petition of the plaintiff were dismissed. In disposing of the case, the court says (p. 1196): "The averments of the petition disclose a clear case of prematurity of complaint. It will be time enough for the plaintiff to apply for an injunction upon a sworn averment of proper facts if, after the police jury will have passed the resolution or given the permission, some party assumes to act upon that resolution and permission. For the determination of the motion to dismiss an opinion necessarily had to be expressed, not upon the merits, for none as yet exist, but upon the sufficiency of the sworn averment to justify the injunction."

It might, therefore, on the authority of this decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, be argued that the expression of its opinion in the case of Crescent City Slaughter-House Company v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 934, was unnecessary to the decision of the cause, and obiter dictum, and for aught that appears counsel may have advised that a writ of error to reverse that judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States would fail on the ground that the record did not disclose the existence of a federal question necessarily to be passed on; for it has been the uniform doctrine of this court that, where it appears that the judgment of the state court must be affirmed on other grounds disclosed in the record, it will not be reversed for an erroneous ruling of the state court on a federal question not necessary to the decision of the cause. Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. [157] 20 Wall. 590, 634 [22:429, 443]; Jenkins v. Lawenthal, 110 U. S. 222 [28: 129]; Erwin v. Lowry, 48 U. S. 7 How. 172 [12:655]; Gibson v. Chouteau, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 314 [19:317].

However that may be, we are of the opinion, on other grounds, that the Supreme Court of Louisiana in this case erred in not giving due effect to the decree in question of the Circuit Court of the United States. The latter is a court co-ordinate to the Supreme Court of Louisiana in authority, and equal in dignity, being the highest federal court sitting in that State, whose judgments and decrees are final and conclusive, subject only to review and reversal in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case in which the decree complained of was pronounced the circuit court did not act without jurisdiction, the subject matter of the suit being a controversy arising under the Constitution of the United States. The argument of the counsel for the defendant in error to the contrary, which deduces what the judge of the inferior court in his charge to the jury alleged to be a usurpation of jurisdiction, merely from the fact that its decree was reversed by this court, could only be true if the general proposition were true that all judgments reversible for error are void for want of jurisdiction. Having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter of the suit, the judges of the circuit court were bound to declare the law of the case between the parties in the light of their own convictions, and under a sense of their official responsibilities, not being under any legal obligation to regard the decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana upon a question of federal law as controlling by reason of its authority, whatever respect and deference they might see fit to accord to it by way of persuasion and argument. And their judgment or decree when rendered is binding and perfect between the parties until reversed, without regard to any adverse opinion or judgment of any other court of merely concurrent jurisdiction. Its integrity, its validity, and its effect are complete in all respects between all parties in every suit and in every forum where it is legitimately produced as the foundation of an action, or of a defense, either by plea or in proof, as it would [158] be in any other circumstances. While it remains in force it determines the rights of the parties between themselves, and may be carried into execution in due course of law to its full extent, furnishing a complete protection to all who act in compliance with its mandate; and even after reversal it still remains, as in the case of every other judgment or decree in like circumstances, sufficient evidence in favor of the plaintiff who instituted the suit or action in which it is rendered, when sued for a malicious prosecution, that he had probable cause for his proceeding.

Neither was there anything in the situation or conduct of the plaintiff in error that could deprive it of the protection of the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States in this action. The fact that it had exercised an election to bring its suit against the City of New Orleans in the state court could have no legal effect upon its right afterwards to bring a similar suit against other parties in the Circuit Court of the United States. Its right of choice was not exhausted by a single exercise, and justified it in subsequently invoking the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, no matter with what motive or for what purpose. As we have already seen and declared, the existence of express malice, however flagrant or unjustifiable, could not affect the exercise of this right, or deprive the party of the benefit of the judgment of the court as proof of a probable cause for the institution of the suit. Neither was the plaintiff in error bound to reject the advice of its counsel on the ground of its own presumed knowledge of the law, as declared in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the prior suit. It had a right to test the soundness of that judgment by seeking the jurisdiction of a co-ordinate court, whose decision would be of equal authority and dignity with that of the Supreme Court of the State, both being final between the parties to the particular litigation until reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The plaintiff in error owed no allegiance to the courts of the State greater than that due to the courts of the United States; it had an equal right in both to vindicate what it [159] claimed to be its rights by remedies appropriate to that purpose, and against all parties infringing them. The fact that the Supreme Court of Louisiana had spoken first gave no additional weight to its decision. Whatever deference may be due to the decisions of the state court of final resort in every case in which it has spoken, and whatever may be the respect to which its decisions upon questions of purely local law established as rules of property may be entitled, they are not authority binding upon the courts of the United States, sitting even in the same State, where the questions involved and decided relate to rights arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

But the rule in question, which declares that the judgment or decree of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, in favor of the plaintiff, is sufficient evidence of probable cause for its institution, although subsequently reversed by an appellate tribunal, was not established out of any special regard to the person of the party. As we have already seen, it will avail him as a complete defense in an action for a malicious prosecution, although it may appear that he brought his suit maliciously for the mere purpose of vexing, harassing, and injuring his adversary. The rule is founded on deeper grounds of public policy in vindication of the dignity and authority of judicial tribunals constituted for the purpose of administering justice according to law, and in order that their judgments and decrees may be invested with that force and sanctity which shall be a shield and protection to all parties and persons in privity with them. The rule, therefore, has respect to the court and to its judgment, and not to the parties, and no misconduct or demerit on their part, except fraud in procuring the judgment itself, can be permitted to detract from its force. It is equally true and equally well settled in the foundations of the law that neither misconduct nor demerit can be imputed to the court itself. It is an invincible presumption of the law that the judicial tribunal, acting within its jurisdiction, has acted impartially and honestly. The record of its proceedings imports verity; its judgments cannot be impugned except by direct process from superior authority. The integrity and [160] value of the judicial system, as an institution for the administration of public and private justice, rests largely upon this wholesome principle.

That principle has been disregarded in the present case by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in failing to give due effect to the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States as sufficient evidence in support of the defense of the plaintiff in error in this action, so far as it is an action for the recovery of damages for a malicious prosecution.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana on the bond itself, for damages occasioned by its breach, against the principal and surety, is not attacked in this proceeding. It is so far affirmed. But that part which constitutes a judgment against the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company solely, for damages for the malicious prosecution, is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings therein not inconsistent with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

HIBERNIA INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW ORLEANS, Appt., [166]

v.

ST. LOUIS AND NEW ORLEANS TRANSPORTATION COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 166–169.)

Insurance—negligence—inevitable accidents—fraud.

Upon a bill filed by an Insurance Company against a Transportation Company, engaged in transporting merchandise on the Mississippi River by means of towboats and barges, and its vendee, to recover certain amounts paid by the complainant, as insurer, to the owners of goods lost through the negligence of the Transportation Company, and to have a sale of its property by said Company to the other defendant declared fraudulent as against the complainant, it is held that the losses complained of were the results of inevitable accidents, falling within the excepted dangers of the river and of navigation.

[No. 187.]

Argued and submitted Jan. 17, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reported below, 5 McCrary, 397. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. O. B. Sansum, for appellant.

Mr. Given Campbell, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, by the Hibernia Insurance Company, a Louisiana Corporation, against the St. Louis and New Orleans Transportation Company and the Babbage Transportation Company, two Missouri Corporations, and Henry Lowery, a citizen of Missouri.

The bill alleges that in August, 1879, the Babbage Company, of which Lowery was president and director, being engaged in transporting merchandise for hire on the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans by means of certain steam towboats and barges which it owned, contracted with the firm of Gordon & Gomila to transport for it from St. Louis to New Orleans a quantity of wheat, "the dangers of the river, fire, and collision only excepted;" that it loaded [167] a part of the wheat on the barge Sallie Pearce, which it took in tow by its towboat John Means; and that by negligent navigation on the part of the Babbage Company, the barge broke away from the towboat, and was allowed to drift down the river until she brought up against a steamboat which was lying at rest along the bank on the Missouri side of the river, and was broken and crushed, so that some of the wheat was lost in the river and some of it was damaged by water.

The bill also alleges that in September, 1879, one Pleasants owned certain rye, corn, oats and hay, which were at St. Louis, on the barge Colossal; that the Babbage Company contracted with Pleasants to carry those goods on that barge from St. Louis to New Orleans, "the dangers of navigation, fire, explosion, collision, bridges, and all other known and unknown obstructions excepted;" and that the Company, by its towboat E. M. Norton, took the barge in tow, and the towboat was so negligently managed that she drew the barge against an obstruction then visible and known to the master, pilot, and officers of the towboat, and the barge was broken, and allowed by them to remain, without any attempt to rescue the goods, and nearly all of them were lost.

The bill also alleges that the plaintiff, as insurer of the goods in both cases, paid to Gordon & Gomila and Pleasants, $19,633.16.

The bill also alleges that, in January, 1880, the Babbage Company, by Lowery, as its president, sold all its property, consisting of four steam towboats and thirteen barges, to the St. Louis Company; that such sale was without consideration, and fraudulent as against the rights of the plaintiff as a creditor of the Babbage Company; and that Lowery and the St. Louis Company had notice of the fraud.

The bill waives an answer on oath, and prays that the court will decree payment of said debt to the plaintiff, with interest; that the St. Louis Company be restrained from disposing of any of said property until the plaintiff's debt shall be paid; and that until that time the plaintiff have a lien on said property.

The defendants demurred to the bill for want of equity; for want of privity between the plaintiff and the defendants; and for multifariousness. The court (3 McCrary, 368) dismissed the bill as to Lowery, and overruled the [168] demurrer as to the other defendants, with leave to them to answer, holding that it was not necessary that the plaintiff should recover a judgment at law against the Babbage Company before bringing this suit.

The defendants then put in a plea to that part of the bill which relates to the transfer of the property, and asks for relief by a lien and an injunction, denying the fraud and alleging the bona fides of the transaction. They, at the same time, put in an answer to the part of the bill not covered by the plea, denying the negligence, and averring that the losses were due to the perils of navigation. There were special replications to the plea and the answer.

Proofs being taken on the plea, the court (4 McCrary, 432) overruled it, on a hearing, holding that the allegations of the bill involved in the plea were established, and that the debts of the Babbage Company could be enforced in equity against the other Company to the extent of the property received by the latter.

The case was afterwards brought to a hearing on proofs on the issues raised by the answer, and the court (5 McCrary, 397) dismissed the bill. The plaintiff has appealed. The circuit court held, as to The Sallie Pearce, that the contract was that of a common carrier; that, as to The Colossal, it was immaterial whether the contract was that of towage merely, or that of a common carrier; and that each disaster was caused by an inevitable accident, falling within the excepted dangers of the river and of navigation, alleged in the bill as forming part of each contract. We concur in this conclusion. In the first case a sand reef had been recently formed in the channel; the pilot of the towboat had no reason to suppose it was there; and she was being handled with skill and care when the accident occurred. In the second case, The Colossal was unseaworthy when she started. The towboat was prudently navigated, but the river bank had shortly before caved in, and a tree from the land had fallen into the river, its presence being unknown, and The Colossal struck it under water, causing the ac- [169] cident, there being no want of care, skill, or attention on the part of those in charge of the towboat, either before or after the occurrence, in regard to the navigation or the saving of the cargo of The Colossal.

The appellees have contended in this court that the rulings of the circuit court as to the demurrer and the plea were erroneous, but, without passing on those questions, we affirm the decree, for the reason stated.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Alabama. Reversed.

Mr. Milton Humes, for George M. Everhart.

Mr. S. F. Rice, for Hugh L. Clay, administrator.

Messrs. John D. Brandon, L. P. Walker and D. D. Shelby, for the Huntsville Female College.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

These are appeals from a decree dismissing the original bill and a cross bill in a suit begun in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Alabama, by George M. Everhart against the Huntsville Female Academy, George W. F. Price, Martha T. Rison, Myra J. Erwin, Robert M. Erwin, William H. Erwin, Joseph B. Erwin, and Marcus A. Erwin, and in which Hugh L. Clay, as administrator de bonis non of Abraham R. Erwin, deceased, was afterwards added as a defendant;
[224] but on looking into the record we find no sufficient evidence of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, which depends alone on the citizenship of the parties. It is stated in the original bill that Everhart is a resident of Wisconsin, and the same fact is also shown by the testimony; but this, as it has often been held, is not enough. An averment of residence is not the equivalent of an averment of citizenship for the purposes of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States. According to the pleadings the Huntsville Female Academy is an Alabama corporation, and the other defendants are residents of either Alabama or Tennessee. The decree dismissing both the original and cross bills is reversed, because the record fails to show the jurisdiction of the circuit court; but as the fault rests alone on Everhart, the complainant in the original bill, whose duty it was to put on record the facts necessary to show the jurisdiction, the reversal will be at his costs in this court. This whole subject has already been considered twice during the present term, once in Continental Ins. Co. v. Rhoads, 119 U. S. 237 [ante, 380], and again in Peper v. Fordyce, Id. 469 [ante, 435]. The reasons for our judgment sufficiently appear in the opinions delivered in those cases. If on the return of the case to the circuit court it is made to appear that the citizenship necessary for the jurisdiction existed at the time the suit was brought, it will be for that court to determine whether an amendment of the pleadings ought to be allowed, so as to cure the present defects.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, at the costs of the appellant Everhart, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

KING IRON BRIDGE AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
COUNTY OF OTOE, IN THE STATE OF NEBRASKA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 225–227.)

Jurisdiction—presumption against—suit by assignee of warrants—Act of March 3, 1875—practice—amendments.

1. On writ of error or appeal the first and fundamental question is that of jurisdiction, first of this court, and then of the court below. This court will consider this question, although it is not raised by the parties.
2. Unless the contrary appears affirmatively from the record, the presumption, upon error or appeal, is that the court below was without jurisdiction.
3. Under the Act of March 3, 1875, affecting suits by assignees of contracts, a suit on two warrants, one payable to a third person and the other to his order and not indorsed by him, is not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, unless such third person might have maintained an action thereon in said courts.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reported below, 27 Fed. Rep. 800. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. N. S. Harwood and John H. Ames, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John C. Watson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought, November 10, 1885, by the King Iron Bridge and Manufacturing Company, a corporation of Ohio, against Otoe County, in the State of Nebraska, to recover the amount of two county warrants or orders, each signed by the chairman of the county commissioners of the County and countersigned by the county clerk. One was dated October 9, 1878, and directed the "Treasurer of Otoe County to pay to Z. King, or order, sixteen hundred and five dollars, and charge to account of special bridge fund," and the other, dated January 9, 1879, directed the "Treasurer of Otoe County to pay to Z. King, sixteen hundred and five dollars, and charge to account of special bridge fund." The first one being presented for payment on the 23d of October, 1878, was indorsed by the treasurer, "Presented and not paid for want of funds." The other was presented on the 15th of January, 1879, and received a like indorsement. The petition states, in respect of each warrant, that it had been for a valuable consideration "sold, transferred and delivered" by Z. King to the plaintiff, who sues as the holder and owner thereof.

[226] Judgment was asked for $3,210, with 10 per cent interest on $1,605 thereof from October 23, 1878, and for $1,605 with like interest from January 15, 1879.

The defense was the limitation of five years prescribed by the local law for an action "Upon a specialty, or any agreement, contract, or promise in writing or foreign judgment." The court below overruled a demurrer to the answer and dismissed the action.

This case was argued upon the question of limitation. But we have no occasion to consider that question; for it does not appear that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the action. Unless the contrary appears affirmatively from the record, the presumption, upon writ of error or appeal, is that the court below was without jurisdiction. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646 [24: 1057]; Grace v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 283 [27: 934]; Bors v. Preston, 111 U. S. 252 [28: 419]. That the point as to jurisdiction was not made here by either party is immaterial, because, as said in M. O. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 382 [28: 464]: "The rule, springing from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States, is inflexible and without exception, which requires this court, of its own motion, to deny its own jurisdiction and, in the exercise of its appellate power, that of all other courts of the United States, in all cases where such jurisdiction does not affirmatively appear in the record on which, in the exercise of that power, it is called to act. On every writ of error or appeal, the first and fundamental question is that of jurisdiction, first, of this court, and then of the court from which the record comes." See also Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 231 [28: 715].

The Act of March 3, 1875, section 1, excludes from the cognizance of a Circuit or District Court of the United States "Any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court [227] to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant, and bills of exchange." One of the warrants is payable to Z. King and the other to Z. King, or order. The latter is not indorsed by him in blank or to the order of the plaintiff. Plainly, therefore, upon any view of the statute the plaintiff, as the holder or owner of the warrants, could not maintain a suit in the court below, unless King could have sued in that court, had he not sold the warrants. But it does not appear that King could have maintained the suit. There is no averment as to his citizenship, nor does his citizenship otherwise appear from the record. We must, therefore, presume, on this writ of error, that the circuit court was without jurisdiction.

It will be for the court below to determine whether an amendment of the pleadings upon the point of jurisdiction will be proper.

The plaintiff in error must pay the costs in this court.

CITY OF QUINCY, Appt., [241]
v.
JAMES W. STEEL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 241-249.)

Jurisdiction—bill by stockholder against corporation and another—Rule 94—failure to comply with.

Upon a bill filed in the circuit court by a stockholder in a gas company against said company and a municipal corporation, the defendants being citizens of the same State, to enforce the payment of a claim alleged to be due from the latter to the former, it is held: that the allegations of the bill touching the efforts of the complainant to secure action by the gas company are insufficient under Rule 94: that the proceeding appears to be an attempt to have a common-law action tried in a court of equity, and to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the federal courts; and that the bill should have been dismissed by the court below.

Submitted Jan. 4, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

Reversed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. L. H. Berger, George A. Anderson, Joseph N. Carter and Wm. H. Govert, for appellant:

Before the complainant is entitled to sue in a court of equity in his own name as a stockholder, he must show that the directors of the corporation have been guilty of fraud.

Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 343 (15: 406); Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450 (26: 827); Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 537 (27: 300); Rule 94 of Rules of Practice for Courts of Equity of the United States.

We insist that even if a proper request had been made by complainant to the directors, and proper and reasonable time given for them to comply, still under the allegations of this bill it would not have been sufficient to authorize the complainant to file it in his own name, without first having submitted the matter of suing for these demands to the stockholders.

Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461; Hawes v. Oakland, and Detroit v. Dean, supra.

Mr. Wm. McFadon, for appellee:

In view of the facts involved, we say, upon the question of the right of the stockholder to sue, it is to be remembered that this case is one of nonfeasance and neglect on the part of the directors of the gas company, and as such we insist the allegations of the bill are up to the requirements of Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 542 (27: 302); Davenport v. Dows, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 627 (21: 938); Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 331 (15: 401).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [242] the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

James W. Steel, the complainant in the circuit court, is a citizen of Alabama, and he brings his bill against the City of Quincy, a municipal Corporation of the State of Illinois, and the Quincy Gas Light and Coke Company, also a corporation of that State. He sets out a contract between the City of Quincy and the gas company, dated February 14, 1877, the only parts of which in this connection of any importance being that the gas company was to furnish a certain number of lighted lamps for the streets of said City, for which the City agreed to pay a fixed price per annum. This contract was to continue for five years. The City failed to pay the full amount due for gas in any one year, but paid a part of the bill on each year as long as the gas company continued to furnish the gas. On May 11, 1881, the City passed an ordinance declaring that it no longer recognized as binding the agreement between it and the gas company, under which the gas had been furnished, and notifying the company of that fact. The company, however, continued to furnish gas until November, 1883.

Instead of a suit by the gas company against the City of Quincy, in an action at law to enforce the rights of the company by a judgment, and by an appropriate writ of mandamus if the City did not pay the judgment, the present suit is brought by Mr. Steel in his own name, on the ground that he is a stockholder in the gas company; and, as the allegations on this branch of the subject, on which he relies as his authority to maintain this suit, are important, they are given here verbatim from the bill.

He says: "That your orator is advised and believes, and so states the fact to be, that the said company has a just and valid claim against said City of Quincy, and one recoverable in the courts by some suit or suits in the name of said company; that your orator has at different [243] times endeavored to induce the board of directors of said company to institute a suit or suits to recover the said claim against said City; that your orator now is, and for more than four years last past has been, a stockholder in said company; that he now has, and during the entire period last aforesaid has had, seventy-five shares of the capital stock of said company; that said last named endeavors have been made while your orator was said stockholder; that so far, and up to now, your orator has not succeeded in persuading said directors to institute as aforesaid; that your orator, on August 1, 1885, caused to be addressed to said board a communication in writing, directing and requiring said board to resolve to at once institute suit against said City of Quincy, in the name of said company, in such court or courts as were proper, for the recovery of said claim; that said board of directors laid said communication upon the table, as your orator is informed and believes and therefore so states, and refused to agree to comply with the request therein contained; that whatever claim said company has by reason of the matters and things above alleged will be barred in considerable part before a meeting of the stockholders of said company will occur; that a part of said claim either has been or is about to be barred by the Statute of Limitations; that further delay in bringing suit will result in a part of said claim being barred by the Statute of Limitations; and that this suit is brought in good faith, and for the collection of, and to compel the collection of, what your orator believes to be a meritorious claim."

The decree of the court below was rendered on a demurrer to the bill filed by the City of Quincy, which, being overruled, the City refused to plead further, and decree was thereupon rendered against it. This decree, made on the 1st day of March, 1886, among other things, "Orders, adjudges and decrees that said The Quincy Gas Light and Coke Company have and recover of said defendant City of Quincy the sum of $36,116.21." It then makes provision for the enforcement of this decree by certain orders concerning future annual appropriations to be made by the City for payment out of its annual tax levy. [244]

We are of opinion that the demurrer of the City of Quincy should have been sustained, for the reason that Mr. Steel shows no sufficient ground why he should have been permitted as a stockholder of the gas company to sustain this bill. In order to do this the circumstances must be such as to justify the court, in the interest of justice, to override two cardinal principles of federal jurisprudence. One of these is that the litigants in the federal courts, where the right to sustain such litigation depends upon the citizenship of the parties, shall be citizens of different States. In this case the real right of action and the real contest before the court, if it had proceeded, would have been between the two corporations, organized under the laws of Illinois, and existing and doing business in the same place; to wit, the gas company and the City of Quincy. By sustaining this bill the gas company recovers a judgment in terms against the City for the amount in controversy under the contract.

The other principle which it is necessary to override is that in the federal courts the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity has always been kept up. In the present case it is but a plain suit to recover damages on a written contract by the one corporation against the other on account of a violation of that contract, except as Mr. Steel endeavors to bring himself into the case as having rights which he cannot enforce in a court of law. It is purely and simply a suit to recover money on a written contract in an action in the nature of assumpsit.

If, therefore, Mr. Steel, by virtue of being a citizen of Alabama, has any right to prosecute this suit in a court of the United States, and in a court of equity instead of a court of law, it is very obvious that he should make this right plain.

Prior to 1875 cases had come into the courts of the United States, especially into the circuit courts, where citizenship had been simulated, and parties improperly made or joined either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable in the circuit courts [245] originally, or removable thereto from the state courts; and as it very frequently occurred that both plaintiffs and defendants were willing to seek that court in preference to the state courts, it had been found very difficult to prevent these improper cases from being tried in those courts. In the Act of March 3, 1875, an attempt was made to correct this evil, and by the fifth section of that Act it was declared "That if, in any suit commenced in the circuit court, or removed from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this Act, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from whence it was removed, as justice may require."

In the cases of Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 456 [26: 830], and Huntington v. Palmer, Id. 482 [26: 838], the question of the growth of the form of invoking federal jurisdiction, where it does not otherwise exist, by the attempt of a corporation which cannot sue in the federal court to bring its grievance into that court by a suit in the name of one of its stockholders who has the requisite citizenship, was very much considered. In order to give effect to the principles there laid down this court at that term adopted Rule 94 of the Rules of Practice for Courts of Equity of the United States, which is as follows:

"Every bill brought by one or more stockholders in a corporation, against the corporation and other parties, founded on rights which may properly be asserted by the corporation, must be verified by oath, and must contain an allegation that the plaintiff was a shareholder at the time of the transaction of which he complains, or that his share had devolved on him since, by operation of law, and that the suit is not a collusive one to confer on a court of the United States jurisdiction of a case of which it would not otherwise have cognizance. It must also set forth with particularity the efforts of the plaintiff to secure such action as he desires on the part of the managing directors or trustees, and, if necessary, of the shareholders, and [246] the causes of his failure to obtain such action."

The bill in the present case, although verified by oath, is far from complying with the letter or the spirit of this rule. It does not contain an allegation that the plaintiff was a shareholder at the time of the transaction of which he complains, although the allegation on that subject includes a part of the time in which the City of Quincy failed to pay for its gas; but inasmuch as the sworn allegation in the bill was made on the 18th day of August, 1885, and he there swears that he had been the owner of the stock on which he brings this suit over four years, it is easy to suppose that he acquired this stock after the 11th day of May, 1881, on which day the City by its official action notified the gas company that it repudiated the contract and would no longer be bound by it. And it is not an unreasonable supposition that the gas company, foreseeing litigation which it might be desirable for that company to have carried on in a federal court, immediately after receiving notice of that resolution had this stock placed in the hands of Mr. Steel for the purpose of securing that object, and though the suit was delayed for two or three years it was probably because the City continued to pay some part of the demand for the gas furnished by the company. The bill does not contain the allegation expressly prescribed by this rule, that "The suit is not a collusive one to confer on a court of the United States jurisdiction of a case of which it would not otherwise have cognizance."

The allegation of the bill, "That this suit is brought in good faith, and for the collection of and to compel the collection of what your orator believes to be a meritorious claim," is by no means the equivalent of this provision of the rule; for it may very well be understood that the party who is seeking to enforce a debt which he believes to be due is acting in good faith for the purpose of compelling its collection, while he may be well aware that he is imposing upon the court to which he actually resorts a jurisdiction which does not belong to it.

The rule also requires that he must set forth [247] with particularity his efforts to secure action on the part of the managing directors or trustees of the corporation of which he is a member, and, if necessary, of the shareholders, and the causes of his failure to obtain such action. In the case before us he seems to have made but a single effort to induce the directors of the gas company to institute a suit against the City to recover the money, and this was by a communication in writing addressed to the board August 1, 1885. No copy of that letter is produced, but it is said that the board of directors laid the communication on the table. No copy of the order of the board upon that subject is produced; no effort at conversation with any of the directors, or any earnest effort of any kind upon his part to induce the directors to bring the suit is shown in the bill; no attempt to call the attention of the shareholders to this matter during the four years in which he said he was a shareholder, and during which time the City was failing to pay its debt to the gas company, nor any effort at any of the meetings of the shareholders or of the directors to induce them to enforce the rights of the company against the City, is shown. The most meager description possible of a bare demand in writing, made sixteen days before the institution of this suit, is all we have of the efforts which he should have made to induce this corporation to assert its rights. This letter was addressed to the board of directors August 1, 1885, from what point is not stated, but it may reasonably be inferred that it was from Alabama, of which State he was a citizen. The bill itself is sworn to the 18th day of August thereafter. How long a time was left for the consideration of this question by the board of directors, and what earnest efforts Mr. Steel may have made to induce their favorable action, may be easily inferred from the speed with which the bill was sworn to in Alabama and filed after he addressed his letter to the board. The inference that the whole of this proceeding was a preconcerted and simulated arrangement to foist upon the Circuit Court of the United States jurisdiction in a case which did not fairly belong to it, is very strong.

In the case of Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 461 [26: 832], in speaking of this perfunctory effort to induce the trustees of the corporation to act, it is said: "He (the plaintiff) must make an earnest, not a simulated, effort with the [248] managing body of the corporation to induce remedial action on their part, and this must be made apparent to the court. If time permits or has permitted, he must show, if he fails with the directors, that he has made an honest effort to obtain action by the stockholders, as a body, in the matter of which he complains. And he must show a case, if this is not done, where it could not be done, or it was not reasonable to require it." Again it is said: "He merely avers that he requested the president and directors to desist from furnishing water free of expense to the City, except in case of fire or other great necessity, and that they declined to do as he requested. No correspondence on the subject is given. No reason for declining. * * * No attempt to consult the other shareholders to ascertain their opinions or obtain their action. But within five days after his application to the directors this bill is filed."

In the case of Huntington v. Palmer, 104 U. S. 488 [26: 834], the court says: "Although the company is the party injured by the taxation complained of, which must be paid out of its treasury, if paid at all, the suit is not brought in its name, but in that of one of its stockholders. Of course, as we have attempted to show in the case just mentioned (Hawes v. Oakland, supra, 450), this cannot be done without there has been an honest and earnest effort by the plaintiff to induce the corporation to take the necessary steps to obtain relief." See Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 537 [27: 300].

We think upon the face of the bill in this case there is an entire absence of any compliance with the rule of practice laid down for equity courts in such cases, and of any evidence of an earnest and honest effort on the part of the complainant to induce the directors of the gas company to assert the rights of that corporation. On the contrary, the clear impression left upon reading the bill is that it is an attempt to have a plain common-law action tried in the court of equity, and the rights of parties decided in a court of the United States who have no right to litigate in such a court, and that there is no sufficient reason in the bare fact that Mr. Steel is a stockholder in the corporation which justifies such a proceeding.

[249] If other evidence were wanting of the soundness of our inferences on this subject, it is to be found in the fact that while the decree in this case was rendered on the first day of March, 1886, a suit was commenced by the gas company against the City of Quincy, on the same causes of action, in the Circuit Court of Adams County, in the State of Illinois, on the 31st day of March of the same year. This fact was brought to the attention of the Circuit Court of the United States at the same term in which the decree now appealed from was rendered, by a petition to vacate and set aside the decree, which that court overruled. It seems very obvious that the gas company, having obtained through the instrumentality of this collusive suit by Mr. Steel a decree settling its rights against the City of Quincy, then brought in its own name a suit in the state court, which it had not dared to do until those rights were adjusted in a court of the United States.

We are of opinion that the demurrer to the plaintiff's bill ought to have been sustained and the bill dismissed.

The decree is, therefore, reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court with instructions to that effect.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 169-183.)

Fees of clerk of district court—section 833 R. S., construction of—fees in naturalization cases not included.

1. In the construction of a doubtful and ambiguous law, the contemporaneous and uniform construction by executive officers charged with its execution, is entitled to great weight.

2. In an action on the official bond of the clerk of a district court to recover damages for an alleged breach in a failure to account for fees charged by him in naturalization cases, it is held that such fees are not within section 833 R. S., requiring such clerks to account for all fees and emoluments of their offices, of every name and character.

Argued Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Reported below, 25 Fed. Rep. 875. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error:

Proceedings connected with naturalization are judicial proceedings of the highest importance.

Spratt v. Spratt, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 393 (7:897); The Acorn, 2 Abb. U. S. 444.

There is no difficulty encountered in applying the tariff of fees prescribed by section 828 R. S.

It seems that in the District of Massachusetts the opinion has become inveterate that the administration of oaths, the filing of papers, the making of records and copies thereof, and affixing seals of courts in connection with proceedings in naturalization are all services entirely outside the statute, for which the court may authorize any fees they see proper, and with which the clerks are not chargeable.

If Mr. Hill or his predecessors had made known to the fiscal department of the Government that they were withholding certain fees from their returns, and the practice had been acquiesced in by the department, the case might have been different. But no such case is presented, and there is nothing to show that the executive branch of the Government had any knowledge of the practice in question until the discovery made by the examiner of the Department of Justice.

It is therefore quite inadmissible to say that this practice in violation of law has become so rooted by time and governmental sanction that it cannot be corrected except by legislation, and that until such legislation is had the clerk of the District Court of the District of Massachusetts shall continue to enjoy exemption from accountability for certain fees which the clerk of the circuit court of that district, and every other clerk in every other district, regularly accounts for.

Mr. John Lowell, for defendants in error:

If it be granted—as we submit that it must be—that the statute does not prescribe the fees for naturalization, then they are not to be returned. However general and comprehensive the language requiring returns may be, it will be confined to the fees regulated by the statute itself and later statutes on the same subject, according to the familiar rule of construction that general words are controlled by the specifications.

Moore v. American Trans. Co. 65 U. S. 24 How. 1 (16:674); Commonwealth v. Hartnett, 3 Gray, 450; Appleton v. Hopkins, 5 Gray, 530; Kitchen v. Shaw, 6 Ad. & El. 729; Sandiman v. Breach, 7 Barn. & C. 96; Ex parte Dawes, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 275; Staniels v. Raymond, 4 Cush. 314.

Contemporaneous construction by all the judges and officers concerned, and its continuance for forty years, will have great, if not controlling weight with the court.

U. S. v. Richardson, 28 Fed. Rep. 61; The Queen v. Cutbush, L. R. 2 Q. B. 379; Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 144.

[170] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 5th of February, 1879, Clement Hugh Hill was duly appointed clerk of the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, by the judge of that court. On the same day he and William Goodwin Russell and another person executed a joint and several bond to the United States in the penal sum of $20,000, conditioned that Hill, "by himself and by his deputies," should "faithfully discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably record the decrees, judgments and determinations of the said court, and properly account for all moneys coming into his hands, as required by law." The statute requiring a bond, in force at the time, was section 8 of the Act of February 22, 1875, chap 95, 18 Stat. at L. 333, which required the clerk to give a bond, with sureties, "faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably to record the decrees, judgments, and determinations of the court of which he is clerk."

This suit was brought by the United States against Hill and Russell on said bond by a writ dated December 4, 1884, claiming $22,000 damages. The declaration alleges, as a breach of the bond, that Hill "has not properly ac-[171] counted for all moneys coming into his hands, as required by law, according to the condition of said bond." The answer of the defendants denies that allegation, and avers that Hill "has made full and sufficient returns of all moneys received by him, as required by law, and that he owes no sum of money to the said United States."

The following agreed statement of facts was filed July 1, 1885, signed by the attorneys for the respective parties, and upon it the case was, by written agreement, submitted to the decision of the court:

"The defendant Hill was appointed clerk of said court on the fifth day of February, 1879, and duly qualified as clerk, and the defendants gave the bond, a copy of which is annexed to the declaration. As clerk, he has made half yearly returns of fees and emoluments received by him, but he has not included in the same the amounts received by him for the naturalization of aliens in the district court.

"It has been the custom in the United States Courts in the District of Massachusetts, for a long time, not less than forty-five years before the date of the writ in the present action, and known and approved by the judges, for the clerk to charge one dollar as a fee for a declaration of intention to become a citizen, and two dollars as a fee for a final naturalization and certificate thereof; and the clerk of the district court has never included these in the fees and emoluments returned by him, and this has been known to the judges to whom the accounts have been semi-annually exhibited, and by whom they were passed without objection in this particular. Following this custom, and believing and being informed that these fees formed no part of the emoluments to be returned to the Government, the defendant Hill has not included these amounts in his accounts, and this was known to the judge when his accounts were examined, and he made on each a certificate in the form hereto annexed; and his accounts, so made out, up to July 1, 1884, have been examined and adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

"The clerks of the several courts of the State of Massachusetts made similar charges for like services, and made no returns to the [172] treasurers of the counties of the fees so received until the passage of the Statute of the State of 1879, chap. 300.

"If, upon the facts before stated and agreed, the court shall be of opinion that the said fees, charged by the defendant Hill, in respect to naturalizations, or any part thereof, should have been returned in his accounts to the United States as part of the emoluments of the clerk, from which his compensation is to be taken, in accordance with section 833 of the Revised Statutes, and that the settlements and adjustments of his several accounts, as above mentioned, constitute no defense to this action, the case shall be sent to an assessor to ascertain the amount due the United States, in accordance with the law as laid down by the court, unless the parties shall, within fifteen days after the announcement of the opinion of the court, agree upon the amount.

"The blanks used for the report of clerks' fees and emoluments, and the blanks used in naturalization of aliens, may be considered as part of the record of the case.

"The instructions of the Department of Justice to the several clerks, dated January, 1879, may be read for any purpose for which they are properly applicable; but neither the defendant Hill nor his deputy, Mr. Bassett, has any recollection of receiving or seeing such a circular before October, 1884.

"The court may draw such inferences from the above facts as a jury might."

Section 833 of the Revised Statutes provides that every clerk of a district court shall, "On the first days of January and July in each year, or within thirty days thereafter, make to the Attorney-General in such form as he may prescribe, a written return for the half year ending on said days, respectively, of all the fees and emoluments of his office, of every name and character, and of all the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk hire, together with the vouchers for the payment of the same for such last half year. He shall state separately in such return the fees and emoluments payable under the Bankrupt Act. * * * Said returns shall be verified by the oath of the officer making them."

Section 839 of the Revised Statutes provides [173] that "No clerk of a district court * * * shall be allowed by the Attorney-General * * * to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office, * * * for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, including necessary clerk hire, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding three thousand five hundred dollars a year for any such district clerk, * * * or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year."

Section 844 provides that every clerk shall "At the time of making his half-yearly return to the Attorney-General, pay into the Treasury, or deposit to the credit of the Treasurer, as he may be directed by the Attorney-General, any surplus of the fees and emoluments of his office, which said return shows to exist over and above the compensation and allowances authorized by law to be retained by him."

Section 845 provides, that in every case where the return of a clerk "Shows that a surplus may exist, the Attorney-General shall cause such returns to be carefully examined, and the accounts of disbursements to be regularly audited by the proper officer of his department, and an account to be opened with such officer in proper books to be provided for that purpose."

The foregoing provisions of sections 838, 839, 844, and 845 were taken from section 8 of the Act of February 26, 1853, chap. 80, 10 Stat. at L. 165, 166, the supervision being changed from the Secretary of the Interior to the Attorney-General by section 15 of the Act of June 22, 1870, chap. 150, establishing the Department of Justice. 16 Stat. at L. 164.

Section 846 provides that the accounts of clerks "Shall be examined and certified by the district judge of the district for which they are appointed, before they are presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlement. They shall then be subject to revision upon their merits by said accounting officers, as in the case of other public accounts." This provision was taken from section 1 of the Act of August 16, 1856, chap. 124, 11 Stat. at L. 49.

The blank used for the report of clerks' fees and emoluments, and the oath appended to the report and the certificate of the judge upon it, were in the following form, as contained in the record: [174]

"[Blank for emolument return, to be filled up when a return is due, and forwarded to the Attorney-General of the United States, with the necessary vouchers. Should the return be verified before any officer other than a judge or clerk of a court of the United States, the additional certificate of authentication should be appended, as the printed instructions of July 18, 1870, require. Similar blanks will be furnished for each semi-annual return.]

I, , judge of the Court for the district of , do hereby certify that I have carefully examined the vouchers referred to in the foregoing return; that the disbursements charged therein for clerk hire and office expenses were necessary to the convenient transaction of the business of the clerk's office; and that the sums paid therefor are, in my opinion, reasonable.

NOTE 1.—No money can be paid from the Treasury to any clerk while his emolument return shall remain in arrear."

On the foregoing facts and statutes it was contended by the United States, before the circuit court, held by the circuit judge and the district judge, that the sums received as fees in naturalization proceedings were "fees and emoluments" within the meaning of section 833, and ought to have been included by the clerk in his returns, on the ground that they were received for services rendered by the clerk in his official capacity, and he was, therefore, bound to account for them, whether they were or were not chargeable under section 828, prescribing fees for clerks. The circuit court held [176] that the action could not be maintained and entered a judgment for the defendants, to review which the United States have brought a writ of error.

The opinion of the circuit court, which accompanies the record, and is reported in 25 Fed. Rep. 375, gives the following statement as to the former and the existing legislation of Congress on the subject and as to the action of the courts and of the executive departments of the Government: "By the Act of March 8, 1791, 1 Stat. at L. 217, § 1, the compensation of the clerks was fixed at five dollars a day for attending court, and their travel. To this was added by the Act of May 8, 1792, 1 Stat. at L. 277, § 3, such fees as were allowed in the Supreme Court of the State, with a provision that for discharging duties not performed by the clerks of the state courts, and for which the laws of the State made no allowance, the court might allow a reasonable compensation. Under these Acts the clerks were allowed to retain all their fees, and were not required to render any account of them to the Government. The first law requiring returns to be made was the Act of March 8, 1841, 5 Stat. at L. 427. This Act established the compensation of clerks of courts at $4,500 a year, above clerk hire and office expenses, payable from fees only, and required them to pay the overplus into the public Treasury, under such rules and regulations as might be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The next in order of time was the Act of May 18, 1842, 5 Stat. at L. 488. That Act required the clerks to make to the Secretary of the Treasury semi-annual returns, embracing all the fees and emoluments of their office, of every name and character, distinguishing those received or payable under the Bankrupt Act from those received or payable for any other service. It authorized the clerk of the district court to retain from the fees and emoluments of his office, above office expenses and clerk hire, as his personal compensation, $3,500 a year, and required him to pay the surplus into the Treasury. It has been stated that the provision in this Act as to bankruptcy fees was inserted to change the law, as ruled by Judge Story, that the clerks were not bound to account for fees earned under the Bankrupt Act of August 19, 1841. The Act of March 3, 1849, 9 Stat. at L. [177] 395, § 4, establishing the Department of the Interior, transferred the supervision of the accounts of clerks to the Secretary of the Interior. Until the Act of February 26, 1853, 10 Stat. at L. 161, the official fees of the clerks remained in substance as fixed by the Acts of 1791 and 1792. The Act of 1853 was the first uniform statute regulating the fees of the clerks and other officers of the courts throughout the United States. It established the present fee-bill, and is reproduced in sections 823 to 857 of the Revised Statutes. Its provisions in regard to returns to be made by the clerks were the same as in the Act of 1842, except that they were to be made to the Secretary of the Interior, as directed by the Act of 1849, instead of to the Secretary of the Treasury. Since the Act of June 22, 1870, creating the Department of Justice, the returns have been made to the Attorney-General, and supervision of these accounts has been exercised by that officer of the Government."

Referring then to the fee-bill of February 26, 1853, as found in sections 823 et seq. of the Revised Statutes, the court proceeds: "Upon an examination of the statute it will be seen that it applies to taxable costs in all ordinary litigation, whether at law or in equity, or admiralty, and undoubtedly governs the taxation in all such actions, suits and proceedings, civil and criminal, in personam and in rem, in the courts of the United States. But it has not usually been considered, at least in this district, as applying to certain special and peculiar cases, of which the courts have jurisdiction, where only the party asking for the right or privilege is before the court, and from the nature of the case no costs are taxable as in ordinary litigated suits. Of such a character are proceedings under the naturalization laws, under the shipping commissioners' Act, and applications to be admitted to practice as an attorney. Thus Judge Shepley early refused to allow the clerk to tax costs by the fee-bill on applications under the shipping commissioners' Act of June 7, 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 272, Rev. Stat. § 4544, for the money and effects of deceased seamen deposited in the circuit court by the shipping commissioner.

"In respect to naturalization cases, it has [178] never been hitherto understood, either by the judges or the departments, that the fees of the clerk were for services rendered in his official capacity. At times, especially before elections, these applications are extremely numerous. The papers are usually prepared by the parties themselves or their friends, or more frequently by agents of candidates. The hearings are ex parte, at no stated times, and it is rare that any person appears in opposition. It has, therefore, been necessary, both in the interest of the applicants, and for the due and orderly execution of the law, and to enable the court to dispose of the cases, that the papers should be looked over and corrected by some person familiar with the law and practice, and in many instances that the witnesses should be examined before the cases were presented to the court for final action. It was for this service that the clerk has been allowed to make these charges to the parties. These are duties which the court has the undoubted right to have performed by some other person than the presiding judge. In these cases the clerk acts rather as a person appointed to assist the court in exercising its functions, like a master or examiner in an equity cause, or an assessor in admiralty, or an auditor in a suit at law. It is the universal practice of all courts of large jurisdiction to appoint special officers, at the expense of the parties, to make inquiries, investigate details, examine papers, take accounts, make computations, and perform ministerial acts. Their reports, when returned into court and accepted, become part of the case, and form the basis of the orders and decrees of the court in the cause.

"It was with this view, to regulate the practice in naturalization cases, and define the duties required of the clerk, that Judge Sprague, in 1855, adopted the following rules, which have ever since been in force:

"'Ordered, by the court, that applications by aliens to be admitted to become citizens of the United States shall be presented to the court while in session, and that proof of the facts whereof the court is required by law to be satisfied, shall be made by at least two credible and disinterested witnesses, who are citizens of the United States, to be produced and examined in open court.

[179] "'Ordered, that before such applications are presented, all necessary papers shall be filed with the clerk, who shall report to the court, when the application is made, that he has examined the same, and whether they are all in due form and in conformity with the requirements of law, or how otherwise.'"

This fact, as to these rules made in 1855, was not made a part of the agreed statement of facts, but the counsel in the cause, in this court, stipulated in open court, that the fact should be taken as agreed.

The opinion of the circuit court then proceeds: "It is for services rendered under these rules, and as a special officer of the court, and not as clerk, that these fees have been permitted. They were not duties pertaining to the office of clerk. They could as well have been performed by any other person designated by the court for the purpose; as by the district attorney, or a commissioner of the circuit court, or an attorney, or any suitable person not an officer of the court.

"Reference has been made to the circular of Attorney-General Devens of January 14, 1879, issued to the clerks. In it he says, referring to section 833: 'This' language embraces every possible fee or emolument accruing to you by reason of your official capacity, and does not allow the withholding of any. Whatever is done by you that you could not do if out of office has an official color and significance that brings it within the compass of the language of the statute.' This is undoubtedly a forcible and accurate statement of the meaning of the statute. But the naturalization fees do not come within this rule. They did not accrue to the clerk by reason of his official capacity, and were for work which might as well have been done by him when out of office as when in. It is also to be noticed that this circular calls upon the clerks for 'a statement of sums received for searches, for all copies for naturalization papers and oaths, and all other sums received through your office,' but makes no mention in terms of naturalization fees. Reg. Dep. Just. 1884, p. 223.

"No complaint of these fees has ever come to the ear of the court from any quarter. On the contrary, this service performed by the clerks has been of great advantage to those seeking to be admitted as citizens. It has had the effect, as originally intended, to simplify the process of becoming a citizen, and to make it more expeditious and inexpensive. It saves the parties the expense of employing an attorney, and the fee charged therefor is much less than would be allowed by the fee-bill, if the application is to be treated and entered on the docket of the court as an ordinary suit. In rejected cases no fee has been charged. This practice has prevailed for more than forty years, ever since the Act of 1842, which first required returns, and has been perfectly well known to everybody conversant with the courts. It was begun by Judge Story and Judge Sprague, and has had the approval of all the judges of this district since their day. It has also had the sanction successively of the Department of the Treasury, the Department of the Interior, and the Department of Justice. Until this suit was brought it has never been called in question by any accounting officer of the Government; nor has Congress seen fit to put a stop to it by legislation. This construction of the statute in practice, concurred in by all the departments of the Government, and continued for so many years, must be regarded as absolutely conclusive in its effect. Edwards' Lessee v. Darby, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 206 [6:603]; U. S. v. Temple, 105 U. S. 97 [26:967]; Ruggles v. Ill. 108 U. S. 526 [27:812]; U. S. v. Graham, 110 U. S. 219 [28:126]. [180]

"It was stated at the bar that a bill was introduced in the last Congress to require the clerks to make returns of all fees which they should receive for naturalizations and as masters and commissioners, but failed to become a law. If a change in the practice should be thought desirable, it is obvious that it should be made by Congress, and not by the courts.

"It is also to be noticed as significant, that the clerks of the courts of Massachusetts, under a fee-bill much like ours, and a statute requiring them to make to the county treasurer yearly a return 'of all fees received by them for their official acts and services,' were never required to include in their returns the fees received in [181] naturalization cases. Rev. Stat. 1836, chap. 88, § 15; Gen. Stat. 1860, chap. 121, § 22. This was changed by the Act of 1879, chap. 300, which defined what the fees in such cases should be, and directed the clerks to include them in their returns.

"The decision of the court is that, upon the agreed facts in this case, this action cannot be maintained."

Viewing the whole subject in the light in which it appears on the face of the statute, in regard to the fees of the clerk, we are met by the fact that section 823 of the Revised Statutes, taken from section 1 of the Act of February 26, 1853, chap. 80, 10 Stat. at L. 161, provides that "the following, and no other, compensation shall be taxed and allowed" to clerks of the district courts. This applies prima facie to taxable fees and costs in ordinary suits between party and party, prosecuted in a court. There is no specification of naturalization matters in the fees of clerks. From as early as December, 1839, the practice set forth in the agreed statement of facts has obtained in the District Court of Massachusetts, of charging the fees of $1 and $2, as gross sums, in naturalization proceedings, without any division for specific services, according to any items of the fee-bill. The Act of March 3, 1841, before referred to, the first one on the subject of returns, implied that there should be reports of "fees and emoluments" by the clerk to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Act of May 18, 1842, provided for semi-annual returns to that officer, and included, specifically, fees and emoluments under the Bankrupt Act. But the clerk never has included in these returns his fees and emoluments for naturalization proceedings, and his action from 1842 to and including 1884 has been with the knowledge of the successive district judges, to whom his accounts have been semi-annually exhibited. From 1842 to 1849 these accounts went to the Secretary of the Treasury; from 1849 to 1870, to the Secretary of the Interior; and since 1870 they have gone to the Attorney-General. From 1856 the statute has required that these accounts before going forward, "shall be examined and certified by the district judge," and that, after being sent to the several heads of departments, they shall be subject to revision on their merits [182] by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. The agreed statement of facts shows that this course has been pursued; that the district judge has examined and certified the accounts, knowing that they did not include naturalization fees; and that those accounts have been revised on their merits by these accounting officers, for this long series of years, and been examined and adjusted by them with the naturalization fees not included.

With this long practice, amounting to a contemporaneous and continuous construction of the statute, in a case where it is doubtful whether the statute requires a return of the disputed fees, judges of eminence, heads of departments, and accounting officers of the Treasury having concurred in an interpretation in which those concerned have confided, the surety in the present bond, as well as his principal, had a right to rely on that interpretation in giving the bond; and the semi-annual accounts of the principal having been actually examined and adjusted at the Treasury, with the naturalization fees excluded, down to and including the one last rendered five months before this suit was brought, a court seeking to administer justice would long hesitate before permitting the United States to go back, and not only as against the clerk, but as against the surety on his bond, reopen what had been settled with such abundant and formal sanction. This principle has been applied, as a wholesome one, for the establishment and enforcement of justice, in many cases in this court, not only between man and man, but between the Government and those who deal with it, and put faith in the action of its constituted authorities, judicial, executive and administrative.

In Edwards' Lessee v. Darby, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 206, 210 [6:603, 604], it was said: "In the construction of a doubtful and ambiguous law, the contemporaneous construction of those who were called upon to act under the law, and were appointed to carry its provisions into effect, is entitled to very great respect." To the same effect are U. S. v. Dickson, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 141, 145 [10:689, 691]; U. S. v. Gilmore, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 330 [19:396]; Smythe v. Fiske, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 374, 382 [23:47, 50]; U. S. v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 763 [24:588, 589]; U. S. v. Pugh, 99 U. S. 265, 269 [25:322, 323]; Hahn v. [183] U. S. 107 U. S. 402, 406 [27:527, 529]; and Five Per Cent Cases, 110 U. S. 471, 485 [28:198, 202]. In the case of Brown v. U. S. 113 U. S. 568 [28:1079], the same doctrine was applied, the cases in this court on the subject being collected, and it being said that a "contemporaneous and uniform interpretation" by executive officers charged with the duty of acting under a statute "is entitled to weight" in its construction, "and in a case of doubt ought to turn the scale." A still more recent case on the subject is U. S. v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52 [ante, 559] where this language is used: "A cotemporaneous construction by the officers upon whom was imposed the duty of executing those statutes is entitled to great weight; and since it is not clear that that construction was erroneous it ought not now to be overturned."

Judgment affirmed.

Removal of causes — citizenship — application after verdict, barred.

1. To bar a removal on the ground of citizenship under the Act of March 3, 1875, the case must be actually on trial by the court, all the parties acting in good faith, before the application is made.
2. Such an application after a verdict, subject only to the decision by the court of questions presented by a demurrer to the evidence, is barred.

[No. 143.]

Submitted Jan. 20, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. H. Smith, for plaintiff in error:

If there is any doubt about the application for removal being made in time, any objection to the jurisdiction of the district court on that ground was completely waived by the defendants when, after being informed by the supreme court that the proper way in which to raise and enforce such objection was by a motion to remand, they decline and neglect to make that motion for so long a period; and a motion to remand, coming two and a half years after the submission of the cause, and while the court was holding the same to consider of its final judgment, should not have been granted or entertained.

The time of removal is not a jurisdictional question, but matter of form, and may be waived.

Canal etc. Street R. R. Co. v. Hart, 114 U. S. 654 (29: 226); Ayers v. Watson, 113 U. S. 598 (28: 1094); French v. Hay, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 244 (22: 856); Dill. Removal of Causes, § 66, p. 83, and cases cited in note; Texas & Pac. R. R. Co. v. Kirk, 115 U. S. 1 (29: 319).

The plaintiff's claim is just and fully proved.

The defense is purely technical and rests upon an oversight of plaintiff's counsel, and is entitled to no consideration, except such as it must receive from the most rigid construction of principles of law and rules of practice.

Mr. J. Holdsworth Gordon, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error for the review of an order of a district court, having circuit court jurisdiction, remanding a cause which had been removed from a state court under section 2 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, on the ground of citizenship. The record shows a suit begun by the Bank of Maysville in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, September 24, 1877, against Claypool, as maker, and Thayer, as indorser, of a promissory note. After a demurrer, which was overruled, a plea was filed November 26, on which the parties went to trial the same day before a jury. After the evidence on the part of the plaintiff was all in, the defendant Thayer prayed judgment because on the facts proven no case had been made out against him. The [269] jury, under instructions from the court, found the amount due on the note, "subject to the judgment of the court on the demurrer to the evidence," and were discharged. Afterwards, on the 10th of January, 1878, the Bank moved for leave to amend its declaration so as to show that it was a corporation created by the laws of the State of Kentucky, "and existing in said State of Kentucky." This motion was denied, and the Bank then moved for leave "to withdraw its joinder to the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence," and that the verdict be set aside and a new trial granted. While these motions were pending undisposed of, the Bank filed its petition for the removal of the suit to the District Court of the United States sitting at Charleston, on the ground that the plaintiff was a Kentucky corporation and the defendants were citizens of West Virginia. Objection was made by the defendants, on the 4th of November, 1879, to the entry of the case in the district court, but this objection was overruled, and the cause docketed by order of the court November 17, 1880. Thereupon the demurrer to the evidence was argued and submitted to the court.

On the 6th of December, 1880, there was filed in this court a petition by the defendant Thayer, sworn to September 18, 1880, for a rule on the district judge to show cause why a mandamus should not issue requiring him to remand the suit. In this petition it did not appear that the court had taken any action in the matter, and it was denied because no application had been made for an order to remand. In the opinion it was said: "We cannot doubt that if such an application is made it will be promptly granted, if the facts are as they are stated here. The petition for removal was not filed in the state court until after both trial and verdict, when the law requires it should be filed before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." Afterwards, May 7, 1883, a motion to remand was made by Thayer and at once granted by the court. To review that order this writ of error was brought.

In the Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457 [25: 593], which were decided December 15, 1879, it was held that a petition for removal under the Act of 1875 to be in time must be "presented to the [270] court before the trial is in good faith entered upon," and we there said, p. 478 [599]: "There may be exceptions to this rule; but we think it clear that Congress did not intend, by the expression 'before trial,' to allow a party to experiment on his case in the state court, and, if he met with unexpected difficulties, stop the proceedings and take his suit to another tribunal. But, to bar the right of removal, it must appear that the trial had actually begun and was in progress in the orderly course of proceeding when the application was made. No mere attempt of one party to put himself on record as having begun the trial is enough. The case must be actually on trial by the court, all the parties acting in good faith, before the right of removal is gone." This rule was recognized and followed in Jifkins v. Sweetzer, 102 U. S. 179 [26: 130], and Alley v. Nott, 111 U. S. 472 [28: 491], and must now be considered as settled. Clearly, therefore, this application for removal came too late. When it was filed, the trial had not only begun, but it had progressed far enough to get a verdict of a jury, subject only to the decision of the court on the questions presented by the demurrer to the evidence.

In this connection it is proper to say that the ruling in the Removal Cases [supra] was not probably known to the district judge when his order to docket the cause was made, because the volume of our reports in which those cases are found was not published and generally distributed until a very considerable time after our adjournment for the term in May, 1880. The court did not actually proceed in the case after it was docketed, further than to take it on the submission of the demurrer to the evidence made at that time; and the order to remand was granted as soon as a motion to that effect was made by the Bank.

The order remanding the case is affirmed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD CO., Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 227-240.)

Military necessity—reconstruction of bridges by the government—railroad company not liable.

*1. The United States are not responsible for the injury or destruction of private property caused by their military operations during the late civil war; nor are private parties chargeable for works constructed on their property by the United States to facilitate such operations.

2. Accordingly, where bridges on the line of a railroad were destroyed during the civil war by either of the contending forces, their subsequent rebuilding by the United States as a measure of military necessity, without the request of, or any contract with, the owner of the railroad, imposes no liability upon such owner.

CROSS appeals from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 20 Ct. Cl. 200. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Watson, Assistant Attorney, for the United States:

The first paragraph of the finding of facts shows a definite proposal by General Rosecrans, as the representative of the defendant, to rebuild such bridges as the claimant could not rebuild at once, upon condition that the Government should be reimbursed the outlay incurred by retention of sums to become due for transportation over the road when repaired.

The Company at once set vigorously to work repairing the road, and, with full knowledge of General Rosecrans' understanding of the conditions upon which the Government aided in the work of repairing, not only did not object while the Government was building the four bridges in controversy, but actually co-operated with it in the work.

The circumstances prove assent to the proposal as satisfactorily as any formal instrument that could be drawn.

The right of the United States to compensation, as claimed, is unaffected by the fact that the Osage and Moreau bridges were destroyed by the federal forces as a military necessity.

Co.* 6 Cold. 646; Parham v. The Justices, 9 Ga. 348; Surocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 1 Zab. 248; Russell v. The Mayor, etc. 2 Den. 461; Whittney, War Powers, 340, 341.

Here there was no use and occupation of the property to offset value of improvements. The Government built bridges that were imperatively demanded by the Company's necessities; turned them over to the Company when built; the Company accepted them, used them, derived profit from them, and charged the Government full rates for service performed by their use, which could not have been performed without them.

Messrs. John F. Dillon and James Coleman, for the Pacific Railroad Company, claimant:

The Pacific Railroad is not liable, either generally or under the special circumstances of the case, to reimburse the Government the expense of replacing bridges destroyed by the Confederate and Union Armies and rebuilt by the Government as a military necessity.

The Railroad Company owed no duty, at least none of perfect obligation, to the United States, to restore the bridges, even those which had been destroyed by the enemy; and a request to the United States to perform such duty for the Company or to replace the bridges at the Company's expense cannot be implied from the relation between the Company and the United States. Nor can it be implied from the fact that the Company afterwards used the bridges built by the Government. Use under such circumstance constitutes no ground of liability, for the reason that the Company had no choice but to use the bridges placed upon its line.

If the owner of land gives permission to another to erect a house thereon, this is a license, and the utmost effect of it is that it relieves the act from the character of a trespass, and may amount to a permission to remove the structure. No case can be found in which the courts have deduced from a license of this character an obligation on the part of the owner of the land to pay the value of the house erected under such a license.

Wells v. Banister, 4 Mass. 514.

Justice requires that this court should leave the Company and the Government just where the events of the war left them; and there is no reason why the courts should invent or uphold a fiction to sustain the Government's demand for compensation for an expenditure which natural justice and equity would require it to make.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The Pacific Railroad Company, the claimant in this case, is a Corporation created under the laws of Missouri, and is frequently designated as the Pacific Railroad of that State, to distinguish it from the Central Pacific Railroad Company incorporated under the laws of California, and the Union Pacific Railroad Company incorporated under an Act of Congress, each of which is sometimes referred to as the Pacific Railroad Company.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice FIELD.

From the 14th of August, 1867, to the 22d of July, 1872, it rendered services by the transportation of passengers and freight, for which the United States are indebted to it in the sum of $136,196.98, unless they are entitled to offset the cost of labor and materials alleged to have been furnished by them, at its request, for the construction of certain bridges on the line of its road. The extent and value of the services rendered are not disputed. It is only the offset or charge for the bridges which is in controversy; and that charge arose in this wise: During the civil war, the State of Missouri was the theater of active military operations. It was on several occasions invaded by confederate forces, and between them and the soldiers of the Union conflicts were frequent and sanguinary. The people of the State were divided in their allegiance, and the country was ravaged by guerilla bands. The railroads of the State, as a matter of course, were damaged by the contending forces, as each deemed the destruction of that means of transportation necessary to defeat or embarrass the movements of the other. In October, 1864, Sterling Price, a noted confederate officer, at the head of a large force, invaded the State and advanced rapidly towards St. Louis, approaching to within a few days' march of the city. During this invasion, thirteen bridges upon the main line and southwestern branch of the Company's road were destroyed. General Rosecrans was in command of the federal forces in the State, and some of the bridges were destroyed by his orders, as a military necessity, to prevent the advance of the enemy. The record does not state by whom the others were destroyed; but their destruction having taken place during the invasion, it seems to have been taken for granted that it was caused by the confederate forces, and this conclusion was evidently correct. All the bridges except four were rebuilt by the Company. These four were rebuilt by the Government, and it is their cost which the Government seeks to offset against the demand of the Company. Two of the four (one over the Osage River and one over the Moreau River) were destroyed by order of the commander of the federal forces. The other two, which were over the Maramec River, it is presumed, were destroyed by the confederate forces.

Soon after the destruction of the bridges, and during the same month, General Rosecrans summoned to an informal conference, in St. Louis, several gentlemen regarded as proper representatives of the Railroad Company, being its president, the superintendent and the engineer of the road, and several of the directors. The court below makes the following finding as to what there occurred:

"By General Rosecrans it was stated that the immediate rebuilding of the bridges was a military necessity; that he should expect and require the Company to do all in their power to put the roads in working order at the earliest possible moment; and that he intended to have what work they did not do done by the Government, and withhold from the freight earnings of the road a sum sufficient to repay the Government for such outlays as in law and fact it should be found entitled to have repaid.

"The gentlemen present assured General Rosecrans that they would do all in their power to rebuild the bridges and put the roads in working order at the earliest moment; but they at the same time represented that several of the bridges, as they believed, had been destroyed [230 by the proper military authority of the United States, and that in such cases the Government was properly responsible for the loss, and should replace the bridges. Those which the public enemy had destroyed they conceded that the Company should replace.

"General Rosecrans replied in substance: 'Gentlemen, the question of the liability of the Government for repairing damages to this road is one of both law and fact, and it is too early now to undertake the investigation of that question in this stirring time. I doubt myself whether all the damages which you say the Government should be responsible for will be found liable to be laid to the charge of the Government. Nevertheless, whatever is fair and right I should like to see done. You tell me now, and I have been informed by some of your representatives individually, that the Company's means are insufficient to make these large repairs and make them promptly. Therefore I want to say to you that, as a military necessity, we must have the work done, and shall be glad to have the Company do everything it can; and I will undertake to have the remainder done, and we will reserve out of the freights money enough to make the Government good for that to which it shall be found to be entitled for rebuilding any or all of the bridges, and we will return the freights to you or settle with you on principles of law and equity.'

"The gentlemen interested in the Company reiterated their view of the case, that the Company should pay for bridges destroyed by the the public enemy, and that the Government should replace at its own cost the bridges destroyed by its own military authorities."

The court also finds that these mutual representations and assurances were not intended or understood on either side to form a contract or agreement binding on the Government or the Company; that no formal action upon them was taken by the board of directors; and that there was no proof that they were ever communicated to the directors, except as may be inferred from subsequent facts and circumstances mentioned; but that the Company, through its directors and officers, promptly exerted itself, to its utmost power, to restore the roads to running order, and to that end co-operated with the Goverment. [231

At the same time, General Rosecrans informed the Secretary of War that the rebuilding of the bridges was "essential, and a great military necessity" in the defense of the State, and requested that Colonel Myers should be authorized "to have them rebuilt at once, the United States to be reimbursed the cost out of freight on the road." The Secretary referred the matter to the Quartermaster-General, who recommended that General McCallum, Superintendent of Military Roads, be directed to take the necessary measures immediately for that purpose. The Secretary approved the recommendation, and General McCallum was thereupon ordered to cause the bridges to be rebuilt by the quickest and surest means possible. It does not appear that the Company had any notice of these communications or of the order.

"The gentlemen interested in the Company reiterated their view of the case, that the Company should pay for bridges destroyed by the the public enemy, and that the Government should replace at its own cost the bridges destroyed by its own military authorities."

The court also finds that these mutual representations and assurances were not intended or understood on either side to form a contract or agreement binding on the Government or the Company; that no formal action upon them was taken by the board of directors; and that there was no proof that they were ever communicated to the directors, except as may be inferred from subsequent facts and circumstances mentioned; but that the Company, through its directors and officers, promptly exerted itself, to its utmost power, to restore the roads to run- [231]
ning order, and to that end co-operated with the Goverment.

At the same time, General Rosecrans informed the Secretary of War that the rebuilding of the bridges was "essential, and a great military necessity" in the defense of the State, and requested that Colonel Myers should be authorized "to have them rebuilt at once, the United States to be reimbursed the cost out of freight on the road." The Secretary referred the matter to the Quartermaster-General, who recommended that General McCallum, Superintendent of Military Roads, be directed to take the necessary measures immediately for that purpose. The Secretary approved the recommendation, and General McCallum was thereupon ordered to cause the bridges to be rebuilt by the quickest and surest means possible. It does not appear that the Company had any notice of these communications or of the order.

The bridge over the Osage River was destroyed on the 5th of October, 1864, by order of the officer commanding the central district of Missouri, acting under instructions from General Rosecrans to "use every means in his power to prevent the advance of the enemy." The court finds that the destruction was ordered for that purpose, and that the exigency appeared to the officer, and in fact was, of the gravest character, and an imperative military necessity. The Government rebuilt the bridge at an expense of $96,152.65; and this sum it seeks to charge against the Company.

The bridge across the Moreau was also destroyed by command of the same officer, under the same military exigency. The Company commenced its reconstruction, but, before it was completed, the work was washed away by a freshet in the river. The Government afterwards rebuilt it at an expense of $30,801; and this sum it also seeks to charge against the Company.

The two bridges across the Maramec were destroyed during the invasion, as already stated, but not by the forces of the United States. They were, however, rebuilt by the Government as a military necessity, at an expense of $54,595.24; and this sum, also, it seeks to charge [232] against the Company. The court of claims allowed the cost of three of the bridges to be charged against the Company, but rejected the charge for the fourth—the one over the Osage River. The United States and the claimant both appealed from its judgment; the claimant, because the cost of the three bridges was allowed; the United States, because the charge for one of the four was disallowed.

The cost of the four bridges rebuilt by the Government amounted to $181,548.89. The question presented is whether the Company is chargeable with their cost, assuming that there was no promise on its part, express or implied, to pay for them. That there was no express promise is clear. The representations and assurances at the conference called by General Rosecrans to urge the rebuilding of the bridges were not intended or understood to constitute any contract; and it is so found, as above stated, by the court below. They were rebuilt by the Government as a military necessity, to enable the federal forces to carry on military operations, and not on any request of or contract with the Company. As to the two bridges destroyed by the federal forces, some of the officers of the Company at that conference insisted that they should be rebuilt by the Government without charge to the Company, and, although they appeared to consider that those destroyed by the enemy should by rebuilt by the Company, there was no action of the board of directors on the subject. What was said by them was merely an expression of their individual opinions, which were not even communicated to the board. Nor can any such promise be implied from the letter of the president of the Company to the Quartermaster General in November, subsequent to the destruction of the bridges, informing him that the delay of the War Department in rebuilding them had prompted the Company to "unusual resources;" that it was constructing the bridges over the Gasconade and the Moreau Rivers, and that the only bridge on the main line to be replaced by the Government was the one over the Osage River, the Company having replaced all the smaller and was then replacing all the larger ones. The letter only imparts information as to the work done and to be done in rebuilding the bridges on the main line. It contains no promise, as the court below seems to have thought that, if the Goverment would rebuild the bridge over the Osage River, it should be reimbursed for any other it might rebuild on [233] the main line of the Company. Nor do we think that any promise can be implied from the fact that the Company resumed the management and operation of the road after the bridges were rebuilt; but on that point we will speak hereafter. Assuming for the present that there was no such implication, we are clear that no obligation rests upon the Company to pay for work done, not at its request or for its benefit, but solely to enable the Government to carry on its military operations.

It has been held by this court in repeated instances that, though the late war was not between independent nations, yet, as it was between the people of different sections of the country, and the insurgents were so thoroughly organized and formidable as to necessitate their recognition as belligerents, the usual incidents of a war between independent nations ensued. The rules of war, as recognized by the public law of civilized nations, became applicable to the contending forces. Their adoption was seen in the exchange of prisoners, the release of officers on parole, the recognition of flags of truce, and other arrangements designed to mitigate the rigors of warfare. The inhabitants of the Confederate States on the one hand, and of the States which adhered to the Union on the other, became enemies, and subject to be treated as such, without regard to their individual opinions or dispositions; while during its continuance commercial intercourse between them was forbidden, contracts between them were suspended and the courts of each were closed to the citizens of the other. Brown v. Hiatts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 184 [21:130].

The war, whether considered with reference to the number of troops in the field, the extent of military operations, and the number and character of the engagements, attained proportions unequaled in the history of the present century. More than a million of men were in the armies on each side. The injury and destruction of private property caused by their operations, and by measures necessary for their safety and efficiency, were almost beyond calculation. For all injuries and destruction [234] which followed necessarily from these causes no compensation could be claimed from the Government. By the well settled doctrines of public law it was not responsible for them. The destruction or injury of private property in battle, or in the bombardment of cities and towns, and in many other ways, in the war, had to be borne by the sufferers alone as one of its consequences. Whatever would embarrass or impede the advance of the enemy, as the breaking up of roads, or the burning of bridges, or would cripple and defeat him, as destroying his means of subsistence, were lawfully ordered by the commanding general. Indeed, it was his imperative duty to direct their destruction. The necessities of the war called for and justified this. The safety of the State in such cases overrides all considerations of private loss. Salus populi is then, in truth, suprema lex.

These views are sustained in treatises of text writers, by the action of Congress, and by the language of judicial tribunals. Respublica v. Sparhawk, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 357 [1:174]; Parham v. The Justices, 9 Ga. 341; Taylor v. Nashville & C. R. R. Co. 6 Cold. 646; The Mayor v. Lord, 18 Wend. 126.

Vattel, in his Law of Nations, speaks of damages sustained by individuals in war as of two kinds—those done by the State and those done by the enemy. And after mentioning those done by the State deliberately and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, or a garden, belonging to a private person, is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town rampart, or other piece of fortification; or when his standing corn or his storehouses are destroyed to prevent their being of use to the enemy; and stating that such damages are to be made good to the individual, who should bear only his quota of the loss, he says: "But there are other damages, caused by inevitable necessity; as, for instance, the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from the enemy. These are merely accidents; they are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall. The sovereign, indeed, ought to show an equitable regard for the sufferers, if the situation of his affairs will [235] admit of it; but no action lies against the State for misfortunes of this nature—for losses which she has occasioned, not willfully, but through necessity and by mere accident, in the exertion of her rights. The same may be said of damages caused by the enemy. All the subjects are exposed to such damages; and woe to him on whom they fall! The members of a society may well encounter such risk of property, since they encounter a similar risk of life itself. Were the State strictly to indemnify all those whose property is injured in this manner, the public finances would soon be exhausted, and every individual in the State would be obliged to contribute his share in due proportion, a thing utterly impracticable." Book III, chap. 15, p. 402, § 232.

Three cases in Congress, one before the House of Representatives in 1797, and two before the Senate, one in 1823 and one in 1872, illustrate this doctrine. In the first of these a Mr. Frothingham, of Massachusetts, presented a petition to the House of Representatives, asking compensation for a dwelling house, the property of his mother, burned at Charlestown, in March, 1776, by order of General Sullivan, then commanding the American troops at that place. The committee on claims, to whom it was referred, made a report that they found [236] that the house, for which compensation was sought, was, with several other buildings in the vicinity at that time, in possession of the British troops; and that, for the purpose of dislodging them, the general sent a party of troops with orders to set fire to the buildings, which was done accordingly; and that they apprehended that the loss of houses and other sufferings by the general ravages of war had never been compensated by this or any other government; that in the history of our Revolution, sundry decisions of Congress against claims of this nature might be found; and that the claim presented rested upon the same basis with all others where sufferings arose from the ravages of war. As the government had not adopted a general rule to compensate individuals who had suffered in a similar manner, the committee were of opinion that the prayer of the petitioner could not be granted; and no further action was had upon the claim. Am. State Papers, Class 14, Claims, p. 199.

In the second of the cases referred to, a Mr. Villiers, of Louisiana, presented a petition to the House of Representatives, stating that during the invasion of the British in 1814-15, after the enemy had landed near the City of New Orleans, in order to prevent him from bringing up his cannon and other ordnance to the city, General Morgan, commanding the Louisiana militia, caused the levee to be cut through, at or near the plantation of the petitioner, whereby the greater part of his plantation was inundated, and remained so till after the departure of the invading army from the State; that in consequence, the petitioner had suffered great losses in the destruction of his sugar cane, cane plants, and in the expenses of repairing the levee, appraised at $19,250; for which he prayed compensation. The committee on claims, to whom the petition was referred, recommended that its prayer should not be granted, on the ground that the losses were sustained in the necessary operations of war, for which the United States were not liable; and their recommendation was adopted. American State Papers, Class 14, Claims, p. 835; Annals of Congress, 17th Cong. 1st Sess. Part 1, p. 311.

The third of the cases referred to is that of J. Milton Best, which was much discussed in the Senate. His claim was for the value of a dwelling house and contents destroyed by order of the officer commanding the Union forces in defense of the City of Paducah, Kentucky, [237] in March, 1864. The city being attacked by the Confederates in force, the federal troops, numbering seven hundred, were withdrawn into Fort Anderson. The claimant's house, which was about one hundred and fifty yards from the fort, was taken possession of by the sharpshooters of the enemy, who did great execution picking off men at the guns within the defenses. They were driven from the house by shells from the fort and gunboats, and late that night the Confederates retired from their assault without success. They appeared with reinforcements the next morning, and the Union officer, regarding his command in great peril, his ammunition being nearly exhausted, gave orders for the destruction of all houses within musket range of the fort. The claimant's loyalty was unquestioned. The officers in command at the post from time to time during the war testified to his reliability and the effective aid he rendered the Union cause.

The senate committee on claims reported the case as one presenting the "simple question of who shall pay for the destruction of a loyal citizen's property, destroyed by the order of a commanding officer to save his imperiled army, at the claimant's home, a place never in possession of the enemy, and in a nonseceding State." Upon this question they say: "It appears to your committee that the facts establish a just claim against the Government for private property taken and destroyed to prevent a greater destruction of its own property and the massacre of its troops."

They reported that "The injuries to the claimant's house, by shelling out the rebels in the battle of the 25th of March (the day preceding the destruction of the property), may be regarded as a casualty by the general ravages of war, which might properly be deducted from the amount of loss proved by claimant," and they made what they deemed a proper deduction on that account in the bill presented by them for the payment of the damages. The bill was intended to cover the value of his property at the time it was burned to prevent its use by the reinforced enemy on the following day. In the debate which followed, it was contended by advocates of the bill, that while the damage by shelling from our own fort during the battle came within the ravages of war, the [238] subsequent burning of the house to prevent its being used by the sharpshooters of the enemy was a taking by the Government, of private property for public use, for which compensation should be made.

The bill passed in the Senate January 5, 1871, but was not acted upon by the House during that Congress. It again passed in the Senate April 8, 1872, and in the House May 18, 1872. It was vetoed by the President June 1, 1872. In his message to the Senate the President, after speaking of the claim as one for compensation on account of the ravages of war, and observing that its payment would invite the presentation of demands for very large sums of money against the Government for necessary and unavoidable destruction of property by the army, said: "It is a general principle of both international and municipal law that all property is held subject, not only to be taken by the Government for public uses (in which case, under the Constitution of the United States, the owner is entitled to just compensation), but also subject to be temporarily occupied, or even actually destroyed, in times of great public danger, and when the public safety demands it; and in this latter case governments do not admit a legal obligation on their part to compensate the owner. The temporary occupation of, injuries to, and destruction of property caused by actual and necessary military operations, is generally considered to fall within the last mentioned principle. If a government makes compensation under such circumstances, it is a matter of bounty rather than of strict legal right." Cong. Globe, 42d Cong. 2d Sess. Part V, p. 4155.

The message was referred to the committee on claims, and on the 7th of February, 1873, it was reported back with a recommendation that the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. On the 24th of the same month, the bill was reached on the calendar and was passed over upon objection. No further action was ever taken upon it in the Senate, and consequently it never reached the House.

The claim has been repeatedly presented to Congress since, but has never been considered by either House. The principle that, for injuries to or destruction of private property in necessary military operations during the civil war, the Government is not responsible is thus considered established. Compensation has been made in several such cases, it is true; but it has generally been, as stated by the President in his veto message, "a matter of bounty rather than of strict legal right."

In what we have said as to the exemption of Government from liability for private property injured or destroyed during war, by the operations of armies in the field, or by measures necessary for their safety and efficiency, we do not mean to include claims where property of loyal citizens is taken for the service of our armies, such as vessels, steamboats, and the like, for the transport of troops and munitions of war, or buildings to be used as storehouses and places of deposit of war material, or to house soldiers or take care of the sick, or claims for supplies seized and appropriated. In such cases, it has been the practice of the Government to make compensation for the property taken. Its obligation to do so is supposed to rest upon the general principle of justice that compensation should be made where private property is taken for public use, although the seizure and appropriation of private property under such circumstances by the military authorities may not be within the terms of the constitutional clause. Mitchell v. Harmony, 54 U. S. 13 How. 134 [14: 83]; U. S. v. Russell, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 623 [20: 474].

While the Government cannot be charged for injuries to, or destruction of, private property caused by military operations of armies in the field, or measures taken for their safety and efficiency, the converse of the doctrine is equally true: that private parties cannot be charged for works constructed on their lands by the Government to further the operations of its armies. Military necessity will justify the destruction of property, but will not compel private parties to erect on their own lands works needed by the Government, or to pay for such works when erected by the Government. The cost of building and repairing roads and bridges to facilitate the movements of troops, or the transportation of supplies and munitions of war, must, therefore, be borne by the Government. [240]

It is true that in some instances the works thus constructed may afterwards be used by the owner; a house built for a barrack, or for the storage of supplies, or for a temporary fortification, might be converted to some purposes afterwards by the owner of the land, but that circumstance would impose no liability upon him. Whenever a structure is permanently affixed to real property belonging to an individual, without his consent or request, he cannot be held responsible because of the subsequent use. It becomes his by being annexed to the soil; and he is not obliged to remove it to escape liability. He is not deemed to have accepted it so as to incur an obligation to pay for it, merely because he has not chosen to tear it down, but has seen fit to use it. Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 107. Where structures are placed on the property of another, or repairs are made to them, he is supposed to have the right to determine the manner, form, and time in which the structure shall be built, or the repairs be made, and the materials to be used; but upon none of these matters was the Company consulted in the case before us. The Government regarded the interests only of the army; the needs or wishes of the Company were not considered. No liability, therefore, could be fastened upon it for work thus done.

We do not find any adjudged cases on this particular point: whether the Government can claim compensation for structures erected on land of private parties, or annexed to their property, not by their request, but as a matter of military necessity, to enable its armies to prosecute their movements with greater efficiency; and we are unable to recall an instance where such a claim has been advanced.

It follows from these views, that the Government can make no charge against the Railroad Company for the four bridges constructed by it from military necessity. The court will leave the parties where the war and the military operations of the Government left them.

The judgment of the Court of Claims must, therefore, be reversed, and judgment be entered for the full amount claimed by the Railroad Company for its services; and it is so ordered.

[241] UNITED STATES, Appt., v. ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC R. R. Co.

[No. 729.]

Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of court:

It is agreed by counsel of the parties that this case involves the same question as that decided in United States v. Pacific Railroad, [ante, 634], and, therefore, on the authority of that decision, the judgment below is affirmed.

[256] INDIANAPOLIS ROLLING MILL COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

ST. LOUIS, FORT SCOTT AND WICHITA RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 256-260.)

Corporations—release of contract by officers—validity of, under by-laws of corporation—ratification of release by acquiescence—payment by third party, sufficient consideration to support release.

1. The release of a contract for the sale of iron by the treasurer of a Rolling Mill Company, at the direction of another, who was both president and superintendent, is held, under the by-laws of the Company, to be a valid release of the contract.

2. The failure of the board of directors formally to disaffirm the action of their agents for a period of two years, or to bring suit until six months had passed, amounts to a ratification of the release.

3. The payment by a third party of an obligation already due on the contract is a sufficient consideration to support such release.

[No. 988.]

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. H. C. McDougal, for plaintiff in error:

The contract released was a part of the assets of the Rolling Mill Company.

State v. Staten, 6 Cold. 243; Davies v. McKeely, 5 Nev. 369; Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 262.

The president and treasurer of the Rolling Mill Company had no authority, ex officio, to execute the release; nor did the board of directors give them such authority.

Upon its face the release purports to have been executed by Thomas and in his name. Hence it was not the act of Jones.

Story, Ag. 7th ed. 147, 172; Whart. Ag. § 284.

But if executed by both it would be no better, because they could not, ex officio, release the claims of their Corporation against anyone.

Hodge v. Nat. Bank, 22 Gratt. 51; Fulton Bank v. N. Y. etc. Co. 4 Paige, 134; Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. 158; Union Gold Co. v. Rocky M. Bank, 2 Col. 565; Olney v. Chadsey, 7 R. I. 224; Titus v. R. R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 98; Walworth Co. Bank v. Farmers Loan, etc., Co. 14 Wis. 351.

They could not even set off debts, nor could they assign choses in action in their Company.

Brown v. Weymouth, 36 Me. 414; Jackson v. Campbell, 5 Wend. 572; Knight v. Lang, 2 Abb. Pr. 227.

Express authority to buy and sell material and make contracts for the same does not include the power to release a contract or sell or give away corporate assets.

Jackson v. Campbell, 5 Wend. 572

To authorize an agent to execute such a release he must be appointed by the directors and by a written vote properly taken.

Smith v. Gas Co. 1 Adol. & E. 526; Osborn v. Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738 (6:204); Bates v. Bank of Ala. 2 Ala. N. S. 451.

Even if Jones had been granted authority to release this contract, as the thing to be done required discretion and judgment, he could not delegate that power to Thomas.

Ins. Co. v. Chase, 56 N. H. 341, and cases cited; Brewster v. Hobart, 15 Pick. 302; Percy v. Millaudon, 3 La. 568; McCormick v. Bush, 38 Tex. 314.

Unauthorized acts of officers of corporations are null and void.

It is not only not within the implied power of the board of directors to alienate property needed for the continuance of the corporate business (Rollins v. Clay, 33 Me. 132; Church v. Duru, 19 La. Ann. 302; Abbott v. American etc. Co. 21 How. Pr. 193), but it is against public policy to permit them to do so; and their action "cannot be sustained on the ground of estoppel, admission or acquiescence."

Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Ind. & C. R. Co. 5 Am. Law. Reg. N. S. 789.

There was no consideration for the execution of the release. Moran Brothers were the agents of the Railroad Company and as such paid out of the funds of their principal the $54,000.

The Railroad Company was under a legal obligation to pay the drafts; and the payment of this just debt was no consideration for the release executed by Thomas.

Harris v. Watson, Peake, 72; Stilk v. Myrick, 2 Camp. 317; Smith v. Bartholomew, 1 Met. 276; Reynolds v. Nugent, 25 Ind. 328; Ritenour v. Mathews, 42 Ind. 7; Fensler v. Prather, 43 Ind. 119; Smith v. Boruff, 75 Ind. 412.

The release was void on grounds of public policy. Jones and Thomas, two officers and directors of the Rolling Mill Company, were indorsers on the draft that went to protest, and, for the purpose of protecting themselves, acted in concert in securing payment of the amount due their Company. Such contracts are against public policy and are always voidable at the instance of the corporation or its shareholders.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas.

The plaintiff in error, which was also the plaintiff below, is a corporation existing under the laws of Indiana, and doing business in that State. The defendant in error is a corporation of the State of Kansas. The latter Company, while building its railroad, contracted, on the 8th day of October, 1881, with the former for the purchase of iron rails. The contract was for ten thousand tons, to be delivered, during the period between October and June inclusive, on board of the railroad cars at Indianapolis. [257] A jury was waived and the case was tried before the court, which made a finding of facts on which it declared the law to be for the defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly.

During the trial the defendant Company produced a release, apparently executed by the plaintiff Company, from the obligation of the contract to receive and pay for the iron, except so far as it had been fulfilled; and upon the validity of this release the decision depends.

It appears from the facts found by the court that the plaintiff was in the habit of receiving payment for iron delivered, by drafts on the defendant, payable in New York, and that Moran Brothers were the financial agents of the defendant, through whom such payments were made; that drafts to the amount of $54,000 were due on the 4th day of October, 1882, and the Company, being hard pressed for money, asked an extension of payment, which was granted for four months; that when these drafts again fell due they were protested for nonpayment, and the defendant Company was insolvent, which fact was well known to the plaintiff. It appears, also, that Mr. Thomas, who was the treasurer of the plaintiff Company, visited New York and called upon the firm of Moran Brothers, at whose banking house said drafts were payable, and endeavored to induce them to pay the drafts, but that Moran Brothers, who had no funds of the defendants at the time, declined to do so, but finally said: "We, Moran Brothers, will pay these drafts if you will sign a release for the balance of the contract." To this Mr. Thomas replied that he was not authorized to execute such a release; but he communicated with Mr. Jones, who was the president and superintendent of the Company, and obtained from him authority to accept the money and sign the release. This was accordingly done, the release being dated "New York, 8th February, 1883," and signed "Indianapolis Rolling Mill Co., by J. Thomas, treasurer."

It is said by the plaintiff that Mr. Thomas had no authority to execute this release, or to [258] make this contract, and therefore it is void. Bearing upon this proposition it is found as a matter of fact by the court that Mr. Jones was president and Mr. Thomas treasurer at the time of this transaction. The original contract for the sale of the iron is executed by Mr. Jones, as president, without the seal of the Company; and there is no evidence of any resolution of the board of directors authorizing or approving that contract. The by-laws of the plaintiff Corporation, as the court finds, declare that the superintendent, who in this case was Mr. Jones, "shall have charge of the works, property, and operations of the Company, and shall employ all operatives and certify all wages due and other expenditures to the secretary, * * * and shall, with the approval of the president, buy and sell material and make all contracts for the same, and for work," etc. And the court further finds that under this by-law Mr. Jones had the power to buy and sell material, and to make all contracts for the same. Another by-law declares that "The superintendent and all other persons shall in all cases be subject to the control of the board of directors, in everything where the board shall elect to exercise such control," and the court finds that in the making of the original contract sued on, and in the extension of the time for the payment of drafts, as hereinafter mentioned, the board of directors of plaintiff did not at any time or in any way elect to exercise the control over its officers given said board by said by-laws

The court further finds "That, after the return of Mr. Thomas from the City of New York to Indianapolis, some time in March, there was a meeting of the board of directors of plaintiff, at which the validity of the release executed by Mr. Thomas was discussed, but the records do not show that at that particular meeting any definite action was taken; that the directors at that meeting did in fact agree to submit the question to counsel of plaintiff, let him investigate it, and then act upon his advice; that about two years after this meeting, and a year and a half after this suit was commenced, a nunc pro tunc entry was made upon the records of plaintiff of the proceedings of plaintiff's board of directors, which showed a repudiation upon the part of the board of directors of the release so exe- [259] cuted, and that this suit was originally instituted in this court at the first term hereof after the execution of the release."

We concur with the court below, that on the facts thus stated the release was a valid release. Its execution was of that class of business which, under the by-laws of the Corporation and the course of business between these parties, had been confided to the president and superintendent, both of which offices were held by Mr. Jones. The direction given by Mr. Jones to the treasurer, Mr. Thomas, both of whom were also directors in the Corporation, was within the line of his authority. He had under this same authority, without any express resolution or ratification of the board of directors, made the contract on which this suit is brought; and it would seem that, not being under seal, a simple contract concerning the ordinary business of the Company, the same power which enabled him to make it was sufficient to enable him to release it, unless the power had been withdrawn.

Another principle leads to the same result. These by-laws show that the board of directors retained the power in their hands to control the president and superintendent in any transaction, whenever it was thought proper to do so. This matter was reported to the directors; they had a meeting upon the subject some six weeks after the whole thing had been consummated, and after they had received the benefit of the release by the payment of their drafts. The rule of law upon the subject of the disaffirmance or ratification of the acts of an agent required that if they had the right to disaffirm it they should do it promptly, and if, after a reasonable time they did not so disaffirm it, a ratification would be presumed. In regard to this it appears that the board, when notified of what had been done by their agents, did not disaffirm their action at that time, but that the act or resolution of disaffirmance was passed about two years after notice of the transaction, and that if the suit brought in this case can be considered as an act of disaffirmance it came too late, as it was commenced some six months after they had knowledge of the release. As was stated in the somewhat analogous case of the Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. [260] 592 [23:331], "The authorities to the point of the necessity of the exercise of the right of rescinding or avoiding a contract or transaction as soon as it may be reasonably done, after the party, with whom that right is optional, is aware of the facts which gave him that option, are numerous. * * * The more important are as follows: Badger v. Badger, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 87 [17:836]; Harwood v. R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 78 [21:558]; Marsh v. Whitmore, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 178 [22:482]; Vigers v. Pike, 8 Cl. & Fin. 650; Wentworth v. Lloyd, 32 Beav. 467; Follansbe v. Kilbreth, 17 Ill. 522." See also Gold Mining Co v. National Bank, 96 U. S. 640 [24:648]; Law v. Cross, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 533 [17:185].

It is said that the release was without consideration, because Moran Brothers had the means in their hands to pay the drafts,—of the property of the defendants; but we think the finding of facts clearly disproves that; indeed, the court found, as a matter of fact, that the defendants were then insolvent, and that Moran Brothers had no funds in their hands out of which they could have paid the drafts. It is obvious, therefore, that the consideration for this release was the voluntary payment by Moran Brothers of the existing protested drafts of the plaintiff Company out of their own means and not out of the means of the defendant Corporation. We think this was a sufficient consideration to support the release.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed.

Argued Dec. 15, 16, 1886. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Reported below, 35 La. Ann. 221. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John H. Kennard and William Wirt Howe, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Gus A. Breaux, for defendants in error.

[207] Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

These are suits on injunction bonds given by the plaintiffs in error to the defendants in error, respectively, Friedlander being a surety.

On the 20th of January, 1874, Meyers & Levi, Lehman, Godchaux & Co. and Michael Frank filed a petition in the District Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana to have their alleged debtors, Block Brothers, a firm composed of Simon and Joseph Block, declared bankrupts; and the petition charged, amongst other things, that the alleged bankrupts had, on the 9th of January preceding, sold a certain store of goods, situated at Opelousas, to Solomon Isaacs, their brother-in-law, with intent to defraud their creditors. At, or immediately after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the petitioning creditors filed a special petition for an injunction to prevent Isaacs from disposing of the store or its contents. A similar petition was filed against David Block, a brother of the members of the firm of Block Brothers, alleging that the bankrupts had sold to him another store of goods at Opelousas with intent to defraud their creditors. Writs of arrest and provisional seizure were issued against the bankrupts, and injunctions against Solomon Isaacs and David Block, in accordance with the prayers of the several petitions. Applications were immediately made by the parties to set these proceedings aside, and such a showing was presented to the district court that on the 31st of January the following order was made, to wit:

"The rules to set aside the arrest, provisional seizure and injunction came up, * * * when, after hearing the pleadings, evidence and arguments, it is ordered by the court that the writs of arrest and provisional seizure be set aside, but that the injunction be maintained on the complaining creditors giving bond and security to save the parties harmless from the effects of said injunction in such sum as will be fixed by the court upon ascertaining the value of the property, and to that end the parties shall take their evidence before Register Kellogg." [208]

Evidence having been taken under this order, the court on the 7th of February, 1874, made the following order, to wit:

"After hearing counsel on both sides, it is ordered by the court that the complaining creditors do give bond and security in the sum of $5,000 in favor of Solomon Isaacs, and another bond in the sum of $1,500 in favor of David Block, to save the parties harmless from the effects of the injunction issued in this cause."

Bonds were accordingly given in pursuance of these orders, and the injunctions were retained. Motions to dissolve them, however, were pressed, and after a large amount of evidence had been taken and laid before the court, they were dissolved on the merits on the 18th and 20th of March, 1874.

The bonds referred to were executed for the respective penalties required, but the conditions did not follow the precise terms of the orders. The bond given to Isaacs (with which that given to Block corresponded) was in the following words, to wit:

"Know all men by these presents that we, Meyers & Levi [Lehman, Godchaux & Co.], Meyer Weill, Michael Frank, and Samuel Friedlander, are held and firmly bound, jointly and severally, unto Solomon Isaacs in the sum of $5,000, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to the said Solomon, etc. Dated 19th February, 1874.

"Whereas, The said Meyers & Levi, Meyer Weill, and Michael Frank have presented a petition to the honorable, the District Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana, praying for a writ of injunction against the said Solomon Isaacs: Now, the condition of the above obligation is, that we, the above bounden Meyers & Levi, Meyer Weill, and Michael Frank and ———, will well and truly pay to the said Solomon Isaacs, the defendant in said injunction, all such damages as he may recover against us in case it should be decided that the said writ of injunction was wrongfully issued."

Signed "Meyer Weill, M. Frank, Lehman, Godchaux & Co., Meyers & Levi, Sam'l Friedlander." [209]

In January, 1875, suits were brought on these bonds by Solomon Isaacs and David Block, respectively, in the Sixth District Court for the Parish of Orleans, to recover the damages sustained by reason of the injunctions; and on the 30th day of March, 1876, judgment was rendered in favor of Isaacs for the sum of $3,250, with interest from judicial demand, and costs; and on the 22d of November, 1877, judgment was rendered in favor of Block for $1,500 (the whole penalty of the bond), with interest and costs.

These judgments were severally appealed to the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and, after much consideration were affirmed. The cases are now here on writs of error to the latter court; and the same errors are assigned in both cases; namely,

First. The Supreme Court of Louisiana erred in subjecting the plaintiffs in error to the law and jurisprudence of Louisiana, when they were parties to an injunction bond given in equity in and by order of the federal court.

Second. The Supreme Court of Louisiana erred in holding that the bond was regular.

Third. The Supreme Court of Louisiana erred in holding that an action could be maintained on the bond in suit before its condition was broken.

Fourth. The Supreme Court of Louisiana erred in holding that the bond in suit, construed with the order requiring it, could cover and bind the obligors for damages which had been sustained before it was given.

For supporting the first three assignments of error reliance is mainly placed on the case of Bein v. Heath, 53 U. S. 12 How. 168 [13:939]. There an injunction had been obtained in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana to suspend proceedings of seizure and sale under a mortgage; and to obtain the injunction the complainants were required, by order of the court, to give bond, with sureties, to answer all damages which the defendant might sustain in consequence of said injunction being granted, should the same be thereafter dissolved. The bond given was conditioned that the principal and sureties would pay to the defendant in the injunction (the plaintiff in the case of seizure and sale) all such damages as she might recover against them [210] in case it should be decided that the said injunction was unlawfully obtained; being in nearly the same form as the bonds now in controversy. The case proceeded to hearing, and a decree was made establishing the mortgage and dissolving the injunction, which decree was affirmed on appeal to this court. The mortgage debt was over $11,000, besides interest and costs. The property mortgaged was sold for $7,000. Suit was then brought, in the same court, on the injunction bond, the plaintiff claiming not only damages for expense and delay, but 10 per cent per annum on the amount of the debt. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. On the trial, the court allowed the plaintiff, in proof of damages sustained, to give evidence of counsel fees and other expenses incurred by the plaintiff before the injunction was issued, and of the value of lawyers' services in this court not paid for, and of the amount of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises pending the suit; to all of which exceptions were taken; and judgment was rendered for the penalty of the bond, the court being of opinion that the damages from the injunction were greater than that amount.

This court, on writ of error brought, reversed the judgment, Chief Justice Taney delivering the opinion. The bond was regarded by this court as a departure from the order requiring it, and as being in effect equivalent to an injunction bond given to suspend seizure and sale under the Louisiana practice, which operates as a security for the debt, as well as the damages arising from the injunction, the same as a recognizance in error in the English practice. Such a bond requires a recovery against the parties before the condition is broken; that is, a judgment for the debt in suit. This the court considered as entirely different from the bond required by a court of equity as a condition of granting an injunction, and different from the bond required by the order of the court in that case. "In proceeding upon such a bond," said the Chief Justice, "the court would have no authority to apply to it the legislative provisions of the State. The obligors would be answerable for any damage or cost which the adverse party sustained by reason of the injunction, from the time it was issued until it was dissolved, but to nothing more. They would [211] certainly not be liable for any aggravated interest on the debt, nor for the debt itself, unless it was lost by the delay, nor for the fees paid to the counsel for conducting the suit." The Chief Justice also referred to the fact that no recovery had been had against the parties—nothing but a seizure and sale of the mortgaged premises—and a dissolution of the injunction; and, therefore, as the court construed the bond, the contingency on which the obligors agreed to pay had not happened, and the condition of the bond was not broken. Under the construction given to the bond in that case, the court could not well do otherwise than reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

But, according to our view, the bonds sued on in the cases before us do not demand any such construction. It is plain that they could not be intended as security for any debt or demand in litigation, but as security only for the damages that might be sustained by the issuing of the injunctions. The condition is to pay "all such damages as he [Isaacs, in the one case, and Block, in the other] may recover against us in case it should be decided that the said writ of injunction was wrongfully issued." Recover, how? By the law of Louisiana damages may be recovered for suing out an injunction without just cause, independently of a bond. Florance v. Nixon, 8 La. 291. But this cannot be done in the United States Courts. Without a bond no damages can be recovered at all. Without a bond for the payment of damages or other obligation of like effect, a party against whom an injunction wrongfully issues can recover nothing but costs, unless he can make out a case of malicious prosecution. It is only by reason of the bond, and upon the bond, that he can recover anything. When, therefore, the condition of the bond in these cases declares that the obligors will pay such damages as the obligee may recover against them, it must mean that they will pay such damages as he may recover by a suit on the bond itself. Otherwise it is senseless and vain. Construed in this way it is in strict conformity with the order which required it. It is in this [212] way that the bonds in question were finally construed by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and we think that its construction was right. In its opinion in the Block Case the court says:

"Under our construction we find no difference in the obligation of parties 'to save David Block harmless from the effects of an injunction issued against him,' and the obligation contracted in this bond, 'to pay to David Block, the defendant in said injunction, all such damages as he may recover against the obligors in case it should be decided that the said writ of injunction was wrongfully issued.' We, therefore, hold that the bond in this case did comply with the condition prescribed in the judge's order, and that it was a valid bond." The court not only construed the bonds in this way, but decided the cases upon this view as to their meaning and effect, awarding to the plaintiffs respectively only such damages as arose from the effects of the respective injunctions. The actions were brought to recover such damages. The petition in each case set forth the facts, showing the injuries which the plaintiff sustained as the immediate result of the injunction, and based his claim to a recovery entirely on the damages arising from such injuries. The evidence was directed to the establishment of these facts, and conformed to the allegations of the petition. The court, in its opinion in the case of David Block, after showing that the bond must be construed as intended to cover these damages, says: "After a careful examination and consideration of the evidence in the record, we are satisfied that plaintiff suffered damages to the full extent of the amount allowed him by the lower court. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed." In the case of Isaacs, the court at first reversed the judgment of the inferior tribunal, conceding that the order of the district court required security for the entire damages, past as well as future, but considering the bond as not framed in conformity with it, and as not covering any damages but such as arose after it was given, as to which there was no distinct evidence. Supposing, however, that damages might be recovered against the plaintiffs in the injunction, independently of the bond, the court reserved to Isaacs the right to bring a suit for that purpose. But on a rehearing of the case, and [213] after the argument and decision in the Block Case, the court came to a different conclusion, and held that the bond was in substantial conformity with the order, and was to be construed as intended to save the parties harmless from the effects of the injunction, adopting in all things the views expressed in the opinion in the Block Case. It then adds: "This leaves open for consideration the question of the quantum of damages allowed by the judgment appealed from. We have gone over the evidence on this point with care and deliberation, and reviewed all the authorities cited bearing on this point, the same in both cases, and are satisfied that the amount awarded by the judgment is fully justified and sustained by the proof and the law." The court thereupon set aside its former judgment and affirmed that of the inferior court.

The fourth assignment of error is that the court erred in holding that the bond, construed with the order requiring it, bound the obligors for damages sustained before it was given. The solution of the question raised by this assignment depends upon the fair construction of the order, and of the bond given in pursuance of it, and read (as it should be read) in the light of it. The order was "that the injunction be maintained on the complaining creditors giving bond and security to save the parties harmless from the effects of said injunction." The last words clearly mean all the effects of the injunction. The condition of the bonds was to pay "all such damages as he [the obligee] may recover against us in case it should be decided that the said writ of injunction was wrongfully issued." It seems plain to us that all the damages arising from the wrongful issue of the injunctions were intended to be covered by the bond as well as by the order; in other words, that the bond was intended and understood as a compliance with the requirements of the order. That is the natural and obvious meaning of its language when the two are read together; and the parties signing the bond must be presumed to have been cognizant of the order under which it was given.

It is unnecessary to review the authorities on this subject. It is undoubtedly true that a surety cannot be held beyond the terms or legal effect of his engagement; and when that has [214] respect to the conduct or fidelity of the principal, or to any other matter usually contemplated as arising in the future, it is to be interpreted prospectively, and not retrospectively. But if, from the nature of the case, the subject of guaranty is a past transaction in whole or in part, and the language of the engagement, taken in its natural sense or legal effect, is broad enough to cover it, such language may properly be construed to do so.

As to the power of a court of equity to impose any terms in its discretion, as a condition of granting or continuing an injunction, there can be no question. This subject is considered in the case of Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433 [26: 1060].

We see no error in the judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases, and they are affirmed, with costs.

PHŒNIX MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Piff. in Err., [183]
v.
FRITZ H. RADDIN, Special Admr. of SEWELL RADDIN, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 183-197.)

Life insurance—application—incomplete answer—waiver of objection—acceptance of premium as—general rules—representations of assured, not the consideration for promise of insurer—practice—bill of exceptions.

1. Where, upon the face of an application for a policy of life insurance, a question appears to be not answered at all, or to be imperfectly answered, the issue of a policy without further inquiry is a waiver of the want or imperfection, which renders immaterial the omission to answer more fully.

2. The issue of a policy of life insurance, with knowledge of a breach of a condition of the policy, is a waiver of the right to avoid the policy for such breach.

3. The expression in a policy of insurance that it is made "in consideration of the representations made in the application," and of certain sums paid and to be paid, does not make such representations part of the consideration, in the technical sense, or render it necessary or proper to plead them as such.

4. This court cannot consider an exception to an instruction where there is nothing in the bill of exceptions to show what was proved, or what any of the evidence tended to prove.

5. This court strongly condemns the practice of making the entire charge to the jury a part of the bill of exceptions.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. F. Dickinson, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

There was a fatal variance between the declaration of the defendant in error and his proof. The consideration of a contract must be proved as alleged.

Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309; Stone v. White, 8 Gray, 594.

Question 28 consists of four interrogatories, grouped closely together and all relating to one topic. The answer, as given, purports to be a reply to the whole inquiry, and occupies substantially the whole space opposite said question. Fairly construed, it means that no application has been made to this or any other company, except to the Equitable Life Assurance Society for $10,000, which has been accepted.

See Caesenove v. British Assur. Co. 6 C. B. N. S. 437; S. C. on appeal, 29 L. J. C. P. 160.

Where the parties have stipulated that the contract shall be void if the statements are untrue, the only question to be decided is, Are the statements true, or false?

Thompson v. Weems, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 671; Jeffries v. Life Ins. Co. 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 47 (22: 833); Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 91 U. S. 510 (23: 401); Ins. Co. v. Trefz, 104 U. S. 197 (26: 706).

Statements concerning prior insurance and prior rejected applications are material.

See Carpenter v. Providence, etc. Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495 (10: 1044); London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. D. 363; McDonald v. Law Union Ins. Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. 328; Edington v. Ætna Life Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 564; Same v. Same, 100 N. Y. 536.

The willful suppression of the facts touching the prior insurance and the prior rejected applications vitiated the policy.

London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. D. 363; Rivas v. Gerussi, L. R. 6 Q. B. D. 222; M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 170 (7: 98).

Question 28 is prolonged into four clauses, for the purpose of calling the attention of the applicant to the several points on which information is desired. As grouped together, and spaced, and ruled with lines, it does not call for four separate answers, but rather for one answer that shall cover and reply to all the clauses.

Moulor v. Ins. Co. 101 U. S. 708 (25: 1077).

Messrs. Robert M. Morse, Jr., and Wm. M. Richardson, for defendant in error:

The issue of a policy on an application which contains no answer to certain questions is a waiver of such answer.

A case identical in its facts to the present one has been decided by the Supreme Court of Mississippi.

Co.* v. Mansel, 48 L. J. Ch. 331; Bennett v. Anderson, 1 Irish Jur. 245; Re General Prov. Co. 18 W. R. 396; are distinguished from the Mississippi Case, and the case in suit, by the fact that although in each several interrogatories were grouped under one head, the answer made was not a true or complete answer to any one of the separate interrogatories.

To the same effect as the Mississippi Case see also Carson v. Jersey City Ins. Co. 43 N. J. L. 300.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of [186] the court:

This was an action brought by Sewell Raddin, and prosecuted by his administrator, upon a policy of life insurance, dated April 25, 1872, the material parts of which were as follows:

"This policy of assurance witnesseth, That the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., in consideration of the representations made to them in the application for this policy, and of the sum of one hundred and fifty-two dollars and ten cents, to them duly paid by Sewell Raddin, father, and of the semi-annual payment of a like amount on or before the twenty-fifth day of April and October in every year during the continuance of this policy, do assure the life of Charles E. Raddin, of Lynn, in the County of Essex, State of Massachusetts, in the amount of ten thousand dollars, for the term of his natural life."

"This policy is issued and accepted by the assured, upon the following express provisions and agreements;" namely, among others, that "if any of the declarations or statements made in [187] the application for this policy, upon the faith of which this policy is issued, shall be found in any respect untrue, this policy shall be null and void."

The application was signed by Sewell Raddin, both for his son and for himself, and contained twenty-nine printed "questions to be answered by the person whose life is proposed to be insured, and which form the basis of the contract," three of which, with the written answers to them, and the concluding paragraph of the application, were as follows:

"10. Is the party addicted to the habitual use of spirituous liquors or opium?	No
"28. Has any application been made to this or any other company for assurance on the life of the party? If so, with what result? What amounts are now assured on the life of the party, and in what companies? If already assured in this Company, state the No. of policy?	$10,000, Equitable Life Assurance Society.

"29. Is the party and the applicant aware that any untrue or fraudulent answers to the above queries, or any suppression of facts in regard to the health, habits, or circumstances of the party to be assured, will vitiate the policy, and forfeit all payments thereon? Yes.

"It is hereby declared that the above are fair and true answers to the foregoing questions, and it is acknowledged and agreed by the undersigned that this application shall form the basis of the contract for insurance, which contract shall be completed only by delivery of policy, and that any untrue or fraudulent answers, any suppression of facts, or should the applicant become, as to habits, so far different [188] from condition now represented to be in as to make the risk more than ordinarily hazardous, or neglect to pay the premium on or before the day it becomes due, shall and will render the policy null and void, and forfeit all payments made thereon."

It was admitted at the trial that all premiums were paid as they fell due; that Charles E. Raddin died July 18, 1881; and that at the date of this policy he had an endowment policy in the Equitable Life Assurance Society for $10,000, which was afterwards paid to him.

One of the defenses relied on at the trial was that the answer to question 28 in the application was untrue, and that there was a fraudulent suppression of facts material to the insurance, because the plaintiff, by his answer to that question, "$10,000, Equitable Life Assurance Society," intended to have the defendant understand that the only application which had been made to any other company for assurance upon the life of his son was one made to the Equitable Life Assurance Society, upon which that society had issued a policy of $10,000; whereas, in fact the plaintiff, within three weeks before the application for the policy in suit, had made applications to that society and to the New York Life Insurance Company for additional insurance upon the son's life, each of which had been declined.

The defendant offered to prove that the two other applications were made and declined as alleged, and that the facts as to the making and the rejection of both those applications were known to the plaintiff, and intentionally concealed by him, at the time of his application to the defendant; and upon these offers of proof asked the court to rule: first, that the answer to question 28 was untrue, and therefore no recovery could be had on this policy; second, that there was a suppression of facts by the plaintiff, and therefore he could not recover; and third, "that the answer to question 28 must be construed to be an answer to all the clauses of that question, and as such was misleading, and amounted to a concealment of facts which the defendant was entitled to know and the plaintiff [189] was bound to communicate."

But the court excluded all the evidence so offered, declined to give any of the rulings asked for, and ruled "that if the answer to one of the interrogatories of question 28 was true, there would be no breach of the warranty; that the failure to answer the other interrogatories of question 28 was no breach of the contract; and that if the Company took the defective application, it would be a waiver on their part of the answers to the other interrogatories of that question."

The jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the full amount of the policy, the defendant's exceptions to the refusal to rule as requested and to the rulings aforesaid present the principal question in the case.

The rules of law which govern the decision of this question are well settled, and the only difficulty is in applying those rules to the facts before us.

Answers to questions propounded by the insurers in an application for insurance, unless they are clearly shown by the form of the contract to have been intended by both parties to be warranties, to be strictly and literally complied with, are to be construed as representations, as to which substantial truth in everything material to the risk is all that is required of the applicant. Moulor v. American Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 335 [28:447]; Campbell v. New England M. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 381; Thomson v. Weems, 9 App. Cas. 671.

The misrepresentation or concealment by the assured of any material fact entitles the insurers to avoid the policy. But the parties may by their contract make material a fact that would otherwise be immaterial, or make immaterial a fact that would otherwise be material. Whether there is other insurance on the same subject, and whether such insurance has been applied for and refused, are material facts, at least when statements regarding them are required by the insurers as part of the basis of the contract. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495 [10:1044]; Jeffries v. Life Ins. Co. 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 47 [22:833]; Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. Cas. 484; Macdonald v. Law Union Ins. Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. 328; Edington v. Ætna Life Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 564; and 100 N. Y. 536.

Where an answer of the applicant to a direct question of the insurers purports to be a complete answer to the question, any substantial [190] misstatement or omission in the answer avoids a policy issued on the faith of the application. Cazenove v. British Equitable Assur. Co. 29 Law Jour. N. S. C. P. 160, affirming S. C. 6 C. B. N. S. 437. But where upon the face of the application a question appears to be not answered at all, or to be imperfectly answered, and the insurers issue a policy without further inquiry, they waive the want or imperfection in the answer, and render the omission to answer more fully immaterial. Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498 [27:800]; Hall v. People's M. F. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 185; Lorillard Ins. Co. v. McCulloch, 21 Ohio St. 176; American Ins. Co. v. Mahone, 56 Miss. 180; Carson v. Jersey City Ins. Co. 14 Vroom, 300; 15 Vroom, 210; Lebanon M. Ins. Co. v. Kepler, 106 Pa. 28.

The distinction between an answer apparently complete, but in fact incomplete and therefore untrue, and an answer manifestly incomplete, and as such accepted by the insurers, may be illustrated by two cases of fire insurance, which are governed by the same rules in this respect as cases of life insurance. If one applying for insurance upon a building against fire is asked whether the property is incumbered, and for what amount, and in his answer discloses one mortgage, when in fact there are two, the policy issued thereon is avoided. Towne v. Fitchburg Ins. Co. 7 Allen, 51. But if to the same question he merely answers that the property is incumbered, without stating the amount of incumbrances, the issue of the policy without further inquiry is a waiver of the omission to state the amount. Nichols v. Fayette M. F. Ins. Co. 1 Allen, 63.

In the contract before us, the answers in the application are nowhere called warranties, or made part of the contract. In the policy those answers and the concluding paragraph of the application are referred to only as "the declarations or statements upon the faith of which this policy is issued;" and in the concluding paragraph of the application the answers are declared to be "fair and true answers to the foregoing questions," and to "form the basis of the contract for insurance." They must therefore be considered, not as warranties which are [191] part of the contract, but as representations collateral to the contract, and on which it is based.

The 28th printed question in the application consists of four successive interrogatories, as follows: "Has any application been made to this or any other company for assurance on the life of the party? If so, with what result? What amounts are now assured on the life of the party, and in what companies? If already assured in this company, state the No. of policy." The only answer written opposite this question is "$10,000, Equitable Life Assurance Society."

The question being printed in very small type, the answer is written in a single line midway of the opposite space, evidently in order to prevent the ends of the letters from extending above or below that space; and its position with regard to that space, and to the several interrogatories combined in the question, does not appear to us to have any bearing upon the construction and effect of the answer.

But the four interrogatories grouped together in one question, and all relating to the subject of other insurance, would naturally be understood as all tending to one object: the ascertaining of the amount of such insurance. The answer in its form is responsive, not to the first and second interrogatories, but to the third interrogatory only, and fully and truly answers that interrogatory by stating the existing amount of prior insurance and in what company, and thus renders the fourth interrogatory irrelevant. If the insurers, after being thus truly and fully informed of the amount and the place of prior insurance, considered it material to know whether any unsuccessful applications had been made for additional insurance, they should either have repeated the first two interrogatories, or have put further questions. The legal effect of issuing a policy upon the answer as it stood was to waive their right of requiring further answers as to the particulars mentioned in the 28th question, to determine that it was immaterial, for the purposes of their contract, whether any unsuccessful applications had been made, and to estop them to set up the omission to disclose such applications as a [192] ground for avoiding the policy. The insurers, having thus conclusively elected to treat that omission as immaterial, could not afterwards make it material by proving that it was intentional.

The case of London Assurance v. Mansel, L. R. 11 Ch. D. 363, on which the insurers relied at the argument, did not arise on a question including several interrogatories as to whether another application had been made, and with what result, and the amount of existing insurance, and in what company. But the application or proposal contained two separate questions: the first, whether a proposal had been made at any other office, and, if so, where; the second, whether it was accepted at the ordinary premium, or at an increased premium, or declined; and contained no third question or interrogatory as to the amount of existing insurance, and in what company. The single answer to both questions was, "Insured now in two offices for £16,000 at ordinary rates. Policies effected last year." There being no specific interrogatory as to the amount of existing insurance, that answer could apply only to the question whether a proposal had been made, or to the question whether it had been accepted, and at what rates, or declined; and as applied to either of those questions it was in fact, but not upon its face, incomplete and therefore untrue. As applied to the first question, it disclosed only some and not all of the proposals which had in fact been made; and as applied to the second question, it disclosed only the proposals which had been accepted, and not those which had been declined, though the question distinctly embraced both. That case is thus clearly distinguished in its facts from the case at bar. So much of the remarks of Sir George Jessel, M. R., in delivering judgment, as implies that an insurance company is not bound to look with the greatest attention at the answers of an applicant to the great number of questions framed by the company or its agents, and that the intentional omission of the insured to answer a question put to him is a concealment which will avoid a policy issued without further inquiry, can hardly be reconciled with the uniform current of American decisions.

For these reasons, our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that there was no error, of [193] which the Company had a right to complain, either in the refusals to rule, or in the rulings made.

Another defense relied on at the trial was that after the issue of the policy Charles E. Raddin became, as to habits of using spirituous liquors, so far different from the condition he was represented to be in at the time of the application, as to make the risk more than ordinarily hazardous, and thus to render the policy null and void.

The bill of exceptions, after showing that in support of this defense the defendant introduced evidence which it is now unnecessary to state, because the exception to its admission was abandoned at the argument, contains this statement: "In rebuttal of the foregoing defense of change of habits on the part of the assured after the issuing of the policy, the plaintiff not only denied the fact, but offered evidence tending to show that the defendant was informed of such change in habits prior to its receipt of the last premium, and that it gave no notice to Sewell Raddin of its intention to cancel the policy. Evidence to the contrary was introduced by the defendant; and the questions of change of habits, knowledge thereof by the Company, notice to Sewell Raddin, receipt of premium after knowledge, and waiver, were all submitted to the jury."

The whole charge to the jury is made part of the bill of exceptions, in accordance with a practice which this court for more than half a century has emphatically condemned, and has by repeated decisions, as well as by express rule, constantly endeavored to suppress. As long ago as 1822, Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the whole court, said: "The charge is spread in extenso upon the record, a practice which is unnecessary and inconvenient, and may give rise to minute criticisms and observations upon points incidentally introduced, for purposes of argument or illustration, and by no means essential to the merits of the case." Evans v. Eaton, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 356, 426, 427 [5: 472, 489, 490]. Opinions to the same effect have been delivered in many later cases. Carver v. Jackson, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 1, 80, 81 [7: 761, 789]; Ex parte Crane, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 190 [8: 92]; Conard v. Pacific Ins. Co. 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 262, 280 [8: 392, 398]; Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 390 [8: 709, 723]; Gregg v. Sayre, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 244, 251 [8: 932, 935]; Stimpson v. Westchester R. R. Co. 44 U. S. 3 How. 553 [11: 722]; Zeller v. Eckert, 45 U. S. 4 How. 289, 297 [11: 979, 982]; U. S. v. Rindskopf, 105 U. S. 418 [26: 1131]. And in 1832 this court adopted a rule, which, with slight verbal changes, has ever since remained in force, by which it was ordered, not only that the judges of the circuit and district courts should not allow any bill of exceptions containing the charge of the court at large to the jury in trials at common law, upon any ground of exception to the whole of such charge; but also "that the party excepting be required to state distinctly the several matters of law in such charge to which he excepts; and that such matters of law, and those only be inserted in the bill of exceptions, and allowed by the court." Rule 38 of 1832, 6 Pet. iv. and *1 How. xxxiv; Rule 4 of 1858 and 1884, 21 How. vi, and 108 U. S. 574.

The disregard of this rule has caused the principal embarrassment in dealing with the question now under consideration.

The substance of the instructions to the jury on this part of the case was as follows: The judge directed the jury that if they should find that the assured was addicted to the habitual use of spirituous liquors at the date of the policy, or his habits afterwards changed in this respect so as to make the risk more than ordinarily hazardous, they would consider whether there had been a waiver on the part of the Insurance Company. The judge then told the jury that the plaintiff not only claimed that any misrepresentation as to the habits of the assured, or failure to inform the Company of a change in those habits, had been waived by the Company by accepting payment of a premium on or about April 25, 1881, after it had knowledge of the habits of the assured, or of the change in those habits; but further claimed that mere silence of the Company, after knowledge of such change in habits, was a waiver of the violation of the provision of the policy. And the judge did charge the jury upon both the supposed grounds of waiver, instructing them that if the defendant had knowledge of the change in the habits of the assured before receiving the premium of April 25, 1881, the acceptance of that premium would be a waiver, which would estop the Company to set up that the policy was forfeited for a breach of that provision; and further instructing them that if the Company, having knowledge of the change in the habits of the assured, did not give notice to the plaintiff of that change, and he was prejudiced in any way by the failure of the Company to give such a notice, and by reason of this silence of the Company did any act, or omitted to do any act, which prejudiced him, there was a like waiver and estoppel on the part of the Company.

The bill of exceptions, after setting out the charge of the court, proceeds as follows: "To so much of the foregoing instructions as related to notice and waiver the defendant excepted, and asked the court to instruct the jury: 1. That no notice of the cancellation of the policy or termination of the risk was necessary, if the jury find the fact to be that the habits of the assured had so far changed from the condition represented to be in as to make the risk more than ordinarily hazardous. 2. That even if any notice were necessary at all under any circumstances until the Company had completed its investigations, if the Company acted in good faith and with reasonable dispatch, they were not bound to give the notice; also that the receipt of the last premium, April 25, 1881, pending such investigations, would not amount to a waiver, especially if a much larger sum was tendered back when full knowledge was had by the Company. The court refused these requests, and the defendant excepted thereto."

But the bill of exceptions does not state what the investigations and the tender were which are mentioned in the second request for instructions, or at what time or for what purpose either was made; nor does it show that any evidence had been introduced of prejudice to the plaintiff in consequence of the defendant's silence, or any other evidence upon the question of waiver, except that already mentioned; namely, that "The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that the defendant was informed of such change in habits prior to its receipt of the last premium, and that it gave no notice to Sewell Raddin of its intention to cancel the policy," and that "evidence to the contrary was introduced by the defendant."

It does not therefore appear that the instructions requested, or the instructions given, except so far as they related to the effect of accepting payment of the last premium with previous knowledge of the habits of the assured, had any application to the case on trial. Except as just mentioned, the bill of exceptions is in the same condition as that of which Mr. Justice Miller, delivering a former judgment of this court, said: "There is in no part of this bill of exceptions any statement of the evidence. There is no statement that any evidence was offered, or that any was objected to. With the exception of the reference to it in the charge of the court, there is nothing to show what was proved, or what any of the evidence tended to prove. The prayers for instruction, therefore, may have been hypothetical and wholly unwarranted by any testimony before the jury." Worthington v. Mason, 101 U. S. 149, 151 [25: 848, 849].

It follows that the only question upon the instructions of the court to the jury, which is open to the defendant on this bill of exceptions is whether, if insurers accept payment of a premium after they know that there has been a breach of a condition of the policy, their acceptance of the premium is a waiver of the right to avoid the policy for that breach. Upon principle and authority, there can be no doubt that it is. To hold otherwise would be to maintain that the contract of insurance requires good faith of the assured only, and not of the insurers, and to permit insurers, knowing all the facts, to continue to receive new benefits from the contract while they decline to bear its burdens. Insurance Co. v. Wolff, 95 U. S. 326 [24:387]; Wing v. Harvey, 5 D. M. & G. 265; Frost v. Saratoga Mut. Ins. Co. 5 Denio, 154; Bevin v. Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co. 23 Conn. 244; Insurance Co. v. Stockbower, 26 Pa. 199; Viele v. Germania Ins. Co. 26 Iowa, 9; Hodsdon v. Guardian L. Ins. Co. 97 Mass. 144.

The only objection remaining to be considered is that of variance between the declaration and the evidence, which is thus stated in the bill of exceptions: "After the plaintiff had rested, the defendant asked the court to rule that there was a variance between the declaration and the proof, inasmuch as the declaration stated the consideration of the contract to be the payment of the sum of $152.10 and of an annual premium of $304.20, while the policy showed the consideration to be the representations made in the application as well as payment of the aforesaid sums of money, and that an amendment to the declaration was necessary; but this the court declined to rule, to which the defendant excepted."

But the "consideration," in the legal sense of the word, of a contract is the quid pro quo, that which the party to whom a promise is made does or agrees to do in exchange for the promise. In a contract of insurance, the promise of the insurer is to pay a certain amount of money upon certain conditions; and the consideration on the part of the assured is his payment of the whole premium at the inception of the contract, or his payment of part then and his agreement to pay the rest at certain periods while it continues in force. In the present case, at least, the application is collateral to the contract, and contains no promise or agreement of the assured. The statements in the application are only representations upon which the promise of the insurer is based, and conditions limiting the obligation which he assumes. If they are false, there is a misrepresentation, or a breach of condition, which prevents the obligation of the insurer from ever attaching, or brings it to an end; but there is no breach of any contract or promise on the part of the assured, for he has made none. In short, the statements in this application limit the liability of the insurer, but they create no liability on the part of the assured. The expression at the beginning of the policy, that the insurance is made "in consideration of the representations made in the application for this policy," and of certain sums paid and to be paid for premiums, does not make those representations part of the consideration, in the technical sense, or render it necessary or proper to plead them as such.

Judgment affirmed.

Action on appeal bond—compromise and payment amounting to accord and satisfaction—parol evidence, inadmissible to vary written instruments—pleading—motion to quash execution—res judicata.

In an action on an appeal bond it is held: that the right of the defendants to appeal from a decree against them, and their declaration of intention to do so, created such a dispute in respect to their liability as made it a proper subject of compromise; that the payment by them of certain sums agreed upon as a compromise of their liability amounted to an accord and satisfaction, and discharged their liability on the bond; that parol evidence to prove another condition of the contract is inadmissible; and that an accord and satisfaction may be pleaded in bar of such an action.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. O. B. Sansum, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Richard H. Browne, Charles E. Schmidt and Charles B. Singleton, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [199]

In a maritime cause of collision arising on the waters of the Mississippi River, the owners of the steamboat Sabine filed their libel in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, against the steamboat Richmond, to recover damages for the loss alleged to have been occasioned by the fault of the latter. The owners and claimants of The Richmond, being the plaintiffs in error in this cause, defended against the libel filed by the owners of The Sabine, and also filed a cross libel, alleging damage to The Richmond in the collision caused by the fault of The Sabine, and claiming damages therefor. A decree was rendered in this cause June 5, 1873, against the steamboat Sabine and her owners, Sarah C. Shirley, R. F. Fuller, and America B. Selby, and Nathaniel C. Selby, her husband, together with Alfred Moulton, Charles Cavaroc, Jules

Tuyes, and Achille Chiapella, the four last named being sureties for the owners of The Sabine in a bond for the sum of $8,000, conditioned to pay any damages adjudged in favor of the owners of The Richmond as cross libelants in the suit, which the libelants had been required by the court to give. The amount of the decree against the owners of The Sabine, as principals was $9,750 damages, besides costs, and against each of the four named sureties the sum of $2,000; that being the amount limited in the obligation as the several liability of each. From this decree all the parties appealed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. For the purpose of perfecting the appeal, Fuller, Moulton, Cavaroc, Tuyes, and Chiapella executed and filed an appeal bond in the sum of $20,000, the condition of which was that if they should prosecute their appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs, and satisfy whatever judgment might be rendered against them if they failed to make their appeal good, the obligation should be void; and on this bond J. W. Hinks and Pierre S. Wiltz, two of the defendants in error, were sureties each in the sum of $5,000. The cause was heard on this appeal in the circuit court on the 11th of March, 1876, when a decree was rendered in the cause, dismissing the original libel, maintaining the cross libel, and condemning the original libelants, the owners of the steamboat Sabine, together with their sureties in the original bond of $8,000, viz., Moulton, Cavaroc, Tuyes, and Chiapella, to pay to the owners of the steamboat Richmond as damages the sum $7,892.60, with costs. The decree of the circuit court as against Moulton, Cavaroc, Tuyes, and Chiapella, sureties as aforesaid, was several as against each in the sum of $2,000, that being the amount for which [200] they respectively bound themselves. From this decree of the circuit court the owners of the steamboat Sabine, the original libelants, together with the Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company, the Mechanics and Traders Insurance Company, the Factors and Traders Insurance Company, the New Orleans Mutual Insurance Company, the Sun Mutual Insurance Company, the New Orleans Insurance Association, the Crescent Mutual Insurance Company, and the Commercial Insurance Company, all which insurance companies were libelants and intervenors in certain other similar causes consolidated with that of the original libel of the owners of The Sabine against The Richmond, joined in an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the several decrees rendered in the consolidated causes, including that in which the present defendants in error were parties. The bond given for the prosecution of that appeal to the supreme court was in the sum of $500, and did not operate as a supersedeas. The defendants in error in this cause were not parties to this appeal. The appeal from the decree of the circuit court was heard at the October Term, 1880, of the supreme court, when it was ordered and decreed that the decree of the circuit court appealed from should be and the same was affirmed. Subsequently an execution was issued on the decree of the circuit court, running against Moulton, Cavaroc, Tuyes, and Chiapella, for the sum of $7,892.60 with interest at 5 per cent per annum from March 11, 1876, and costs. Motions were made on May 3, 1881, on behalf of Moulton and Tuyes, defendants in that execution, to quash the same on the ground that the said decree, as against each of the said sureties, had been satisfied and discharged. These motions came on to be heard June 16, 1881, on consideration whereof they were allowed, and the writ of fieri facias quashed, and the marshal ordered to desist from any further proceedings thereunder.

The plaintiffs in error thereafter, on the 7th of March, 1882, being the owners of the steamboat Richmond, or their representatives, commenced this action against the defendants in error as parties to the appeal bond given for the prosecution of the appeal from the original [201] decree of the district court to the circuit court. The defendants rely upon two defenses: 1, that the matters in controversy were finally adjudged in their favor by the circuit court on the motion to quash the execution issued against them on its decree, so as to constitute an estoppel upon the principle of res judicata; 2, that the decrees of the circuit court against them respectively were discharged by payments made and accepted in full satisfaction thereof, by way of compromise, prior to the appeal taken by the other parties to the Supreme Court of the United States. The cause came on to be heard before the circuit court on May 29, 1883, when the parties, having duly waived the intervention of a jury, submitted the cause to the court; on consideration whereof the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. The object of the present writ of error is to reverse that judgment.

It appears from the bill of exceptions taken on the trial that the plaintiffs below, to maintain the issues on their part, put in as evidence in said cause the appeal bond, decree and final judgment, and the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, as the same are described and referred to in the plaintiffs' petition, and also the amount of costs taxed in the cause, amounting to the sum of $1,593.45, and rested their case. Thereupon the defendants, to maintain the issues on their part, put in evidence, among other matters, the following:

1. The decree rendered by the district court against the owners of The Sabine in favor of the cross libelants, the owners of The Richmond, showing the amount decreed against the sureties on the bond of $8,000 to be the sum of $2,000 each.

2. The decree of the circuit court in the same cause in the amount of $7,892.60 in solido against the owners of the steamer Sabine, and against the sureties on the original bond for $8,000 in the sum of $2,000 each.

3. The petition and allowance of the appeal from that decree to the Supreme Court of the United States, together with the appeal bond for the prosecution thereof.

4. The record of the proceedings in the circuit court on the motion to quash the execution, together with the judgment of the court allowing said motion and quashing the said execution. [202]

5. Four written papers signed by Kennard, Howe & Prentiss, attorneys of record for the owners of the steamer Richmond in the proceedings in admiralty, showing payments made by the parties respectively in satisfaction of the decree of the circuit court against them, which papers are as follows:

"U. S. Circuit Court.

Co. vs. St'r Sabine & others (consolidated); said bond, signed for $2,000 by Alf. It was then proved by John Kennard, a member of the firm of Kennard, Howe & Prentiss, that he signed the papers by the firm name of Kennard, Howe & Prentiss, who were the attorneys for the steamer Richmond; that he received the sums of money in the said papers severally mentioned, and that he executed the said papers under plenary authority from the plaintiffs to make the compromise. The plaintiffs then offered to prove by the same witness that the proctors for the owners of the steamer Sabine opened a negotiation with him to compromise said case, and offered to pay the sum of $5,000 for a com- [204] promise of the litigation then pending between the parties, and threatened an appeal from the decree and judgment of the circuit court, which had been rendered in favor of the owners of the steamer Richmond, unless said money should be accepted and said compromise effected; and that for the purpose of ending said litigation he accepted said money and compromised said case; that it was expressly agreed by the parties to that cause that said litigation was then ended, and that no appeal should be taken from the said decree and judgment of the circuit court. To this offer and evidence the defendants objected, on the ground that the papers in evidence constituted a contract in writing between the parties, and that no parol evidence impeaching them could be received. The court sustained the objection, and refused to hear the evidence; to which ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

It is not important to determine what effect, if any, should be given to the proceedings and order of the circuit court on the motion of the defendants Tuyes and Moulton to quash the execution issued on the decree against them. It does not appear from the record of these proceedings on what ground the judgment of the court was placed; and in its terms it is not final, as it merely quashes the particular writ of execution then in the marshal's hands, and directs him to take no further proceedings thereunder. If it had been based upon a finding of a payment of the decree, or of an accord and satisfaction equivalent to payment, and had directed satisfaction of the decree to be entered of record, as it clearly had power to do in such a proceeding, the judgment would have been conclusive as a defense to the bond in suit, notwithstanding the summary character of the proceeding. U. S. v. McLemore, 45 U. S. 4 How. 286 [11: 977]; Perkins v. Fourniquet, 55 U. S. 14 How. 328 [14: 441]. But the introduction of the record of these proceedings as evidence did not prejudice the plaintiffs in error; for the other evidence in the cause, and which no doubt is the same on which the circuit court acted in that proceeding, shows an accord and satisfaction equivalent to a payment of the decree, and, in equity, to a satisfaction and discharge. It is so expressed in each of the papers executed at the time, which, although they are in one sense receipts acknowledging the payment of money, are also written evidence of an executed agreement by which the money was received in full payment and settlement of the decree and of the bond given for its payment now sued on. It is shown that the attorneys for the owners of The Richmond, [205] who signed those receipts, were fully authorized to do so. The contract in each case is with the individual defendant for a satisfaction of the decree rendered against him severally. The payment and receipt of the money in pursuance of the agreement amounted to a release of errors, so that there was a valuable consideration to sustain the contract whereby a less sum than the amount due by the decree was received in full payment.

The offer on the part of the plaintiffs in error to prove by parol another condition of the contract; viz., that the other defendants, the owners of the steamboat Sabine, and the intervenors and other parties, the several insurance companies who had become parties to the appeal, should not take and perfect an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, was rightly rejected, because such parol evidence necessarily varied and contradicted the written agreement of the parties. The papers in evidence established a complete accord and satisfaction fully performed, in pursuance of an agreement to extinguish the liability of the defendants by reason of the original decree, and so to satisfy the obligation of the bond on which they are sued. The right of the defendants to appeal from the decree, and the fact that they had declared their intention to do so, created such a dispute in respect to their liability as made it a proper subject of compromise. A compromise was made and fully performed on their part; they paid the money, which was received in payment of the decree, and took no appeal. It is not now open to the plaintiffs in error to treat this payment merely as a credit on account and hold the defendants to their original liability. U. S. v. Child, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 232 [20: 360]; Oglesby v. Attrill, 105 U. S. 605 [26: 1186].

The technical difficulty, that there can be no satisfaction and discharge of a judgment or decree, except by matter of record (Mitchell v. Hawley, 4 Denio, 414, 47 Am. Dec. 260), cannot be interposed. At common law actual payment of a debt of record could not be pleaded in bar of an action for the recovery of the debt. This has been changed by statute both in England and in this country, and no reason can be assigned why an accord and satisfaction should not have the same effect. In the present [266] case the action is not on the decree, but on the appeal bond, and for the recovery of damages arising from the breach, as to which matters in pais, such as payment or accord and satisfaction, were always a good plea.

Judgment affirmed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 260-263.)

Duties on webbing made of India rubber, wool and cotton.

In the latter part of 1878 and early part of 1879 "webbing made of India rubber, wool and cotton," used for gores and gussets in Congress boots, was subject to a duty of only 35 per cent ad valorem under the second clause of section 2504 R. S., said webbing not falling within the first clause of said section.

[No. 112.]

Argued Dec. 22, 1886. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

The case appears in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [261]

The single question in this case is as to the duty payable in the latter part of 1878 and the early part of 1879 on "webbing made of India rubber, wool and cotton," and known as "wool elastic webbing," as distinguished from "union elastic webbing," made of rubber, silk and cotton, and "cotton elastic webbing," made of rubber and cotton. It is used for gores and gussets in the manufacture of Congress boots, and without the rubber would not be adapted to that use. In its manufacture it is not wrought by hand or braided by machinery, but is woven in a loom.

In the court below, three clauses of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes were brought under consideration, to wit:

First. Schedule L, "Wool and woolen goods" (Revised Statutes, page 475): "Webbings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, dress trimmings, head nets, buttons, or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, wrought by hand or braided by machinery, made of wool, worsted, or mohair, or of which wool, worsted, or mohair is a component material: 50 cents per pound, and in addition thereto, 50 per cent ad valorem."

Second. Schedule M, "Sundries" (Revised Statutes, page 477): "India rubber, articles composed of.—Braces, suspenders, webbing or other fabrics, composed wholly or in part of India rubber, not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent ad valorem."

Third. Schedule L, "Wool and woolen goods" (Revised Statutes, page 475): "Woolen cloths, woolen shawls, and all manufactures of wool of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, not herein otherwise provided [262] for: 50 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, 35 per cent ad valorem."

In this court, however, it was conceded by the solicitor-general, in his argument for the Collector, that, as the third clause does not specifically provide for webbing, and both the others do, that clause would not be relied on here. The precise question to be determined is, therefore, whether these goods are dutiable as "webbing * * * composed wholly or in part of India rubber," at 35 per cent ad valorem, or as "webbing * * * made of wool, * * * or of which wool * * * is a component material," at 50 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, 50 per cent ad valorem. The Collector exacted the larger duty, and this suit was brought to recover back the difference between that and the smaller one. The court below gave judgment against the Collector, and to reverse that judgment, this writ of error was sued out.

In the Tariff Act of August 30, 1842, chap. 270, § 5, subdivision tenth, 5 Stat. at L. 555, was this provision: "On India rubber oil-cloth, webbing, shoes, braces, or suspenders or other fabrics or manufactured articles composed wholly or in part of India rubber, 30 per centum ad valorem." In the Act of July 5, 1846, chap. 74, § 11, schedule C. 9 Stat. at L. 44, this was the language: "Braces, suspenders, webbing, or other fabrics composed wholly or in part of India rubber, not otherwise provided for." The same provision was made in the Act of March 2, 1861, chap. 68, § 22, 12 Stat. at L. 191, and in the Act of July 14, 1862, chap. 163, § 13, 12 Stat. at L. 566, which increased the duties on these articles 5 per centum ad valorem. In the last of these Acts, section 8, p. 552, was the following provision: "On manufactures of India rubber and silk, or of India rubber and silk and other materials, fifty per centum ad valorem." These provisions of the Acts of 1861 and 1862 were re-enacted in substantially the same language as part of the Revised Statutes. That in relation to manufactures of India rubber and silk, and India rubber and silk and other materials, is found in section 2504, immediately preceding the second of the clauses above referred to.

In 1873, while the Acts of 1861 and 1862 were in force, and before the enactment of the Revised Statutes, Davies & Co. imported into New [263] York "suspenders or braces manufactured of rubber, cotton and silk," and the Collector exacted a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem as upon a manufacture of India rubber and silk and other materials; but this court held in Arthur v. Davies, 96 U. S. 135 [24: 810], that they were only dutiable at the rate of 35 per centum ad valorem, as suspenders or braces composed wholly or in part of India rubber, and that they were not "otherwise provided for," as manufactures of India rubber and silk and other materials, because for thirty years before the importation in that case, "and in four different statutes, braces and suspenders, composed wholly or in part of India rubber, had been a subject of duty eo nomine." During the same year Faxon, Elms & Co. imported into Boston from Liverpool webbing which was a manufacture of India rubber, silk and cotton, known as "Union Gussett," "Union Web," or "Union Elastic Web," and used in the manufacture of the gores or gussets of Congress boots. In this case, also, the Collector exacted a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem, under section 8 of the Act of 1862, as on manufactures of India rubber, and silk and other materials; but this court held at its October Term, 1878, in Faxon v. Russell, not reported, on the authority of Arthur v. Davies, that the goods were only dutiable as webbing composed wholly or in part of India rubber.

These cases, with which we are entirely satisfied, are conclusive upon the questions here involved. Ever since 1842 "webbing" composed wholly or in part of India rubber has been a subject of duty eo nomine, and it is no more otherwise provided for, as webbing composed wholly or in part of wool, than it would be as a manufacture of India rubber and silk, or of India rubber and silk and other materials, if silk had been one of its component parts.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.
THE JUDGE OF THE MUHLENBURG COUNTY COURT, IN THE STATE OF KENTUCKY.

Mandamus to compel tax to pay judgment on coupons of railroad bonds—construction of Kentucky Statutes.

Under the Act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, of February 24, 1868, amending the charter of the Elizabethtown and Paducah Railroad Company, justices of the peace of a county do not constitute a necessary part of the county court, when levying a tax to pay a judgment recovered on coupons of bonds issued by such court, in payment of a subscription to the capital stock of said company. The duty of the court is ministerial and imperative, and in its discharge the county judge may act alone.

Argued Jan. 5, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Alexander Pope Humphrey, W. O. Dodd, J. L. Dodd, John Mason Brown and George M. Davie, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Thomas W. Brown, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

Merriwether, the plaintiff in error, obtained a judgment in the court below against the County of Muhlenburg, in the State of Kentucky, for the amount of certain unpaid coupons of bonds, issued by it in payment of a subscription to the capital stock of the Elizabethtown and Paducah Railroad Company. Execution having been returned "no property found to satisfy the same or any part thereof," and the county court of the county having refused to levy a tax sufficient to pay the judgment, Merriwether filed the petition in this case against the Judge of that court, praying for a mandamus compelling the levy and collection of such tax. The plaintiff bases his right to relief upon the ninth section of an Act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, approved February 24, 1868, amending the charter of the Elizabethtown and Paducah Railroad Company. That section provides:

"That in case any county, city, town, or election district shall subscribe to the capital stock of said Elizabethtown and Paducah Railroad Company, under the provisions of this Act, and issue bonds for the payment of such subscription, it shall be the duty of the county court of such county, the city council of such city, and the trustees of such town, to cause to be levied and collected a tax sufficient to pay the semi-annual interest on the bonds issued and the cost of collecting such tax, and paying the interest, on all the real estate and personal [355] property in said county, city, or town, subject to taxation under the revenue laws of the State, including the amounts owned by residents of such county, city, or town, or election districts, which ought to be given in under the equalization laws." Sess. Acts 1867-8, p. 622.

This proceeding having been instituted against the Judge of the county court alone, a demurrer to the petition, on the ground of defect of parties, raised the objection that, within the meaning of the foregoing statute, the justices of the peace of the county must be a part of the court when making a levy for the purpose asked by the plaintiff. The court below, being of opinion that the point was well taken, sustained the demurrer. An amended petition was filed stating, among other facts, that there were no justices of the peace of the county; that the justices elected from time to time, and who had qualified, resigned their positions in order that there might be no officers in existence who could, under the theory of the defendant, levy the required tax. A demurrer to the amended petition having been sustained, and the plaintiff having elected not to amend further, the action was dismissed.

The only question necessary to be considered is whether the justices of the peace of Muhlenburg County constitute a necessary part of the county court when levying a tax to pay plaintiff's judgment.

The Constitution of Kentucky, adopted in 1850, provided for the organization of a county court in each county, to consist of a presiding judge and two associate judges, any two of the three to constitute a quorum; with power in the General Assembly to abolish the office of associate judges whenever it was deemed expe-[356] dient, "In which event they may associate with said court any or all of the justices of the peace" elected in the several districts into which the county is divided. Const. art. IV. It is also declared in the same instrument that "The General Assembly may provide, by law, that the justices of the peace in each county shall sit at the court of claims and assist in laying the county levy and making appropriations." Id. § 37. The words "court of claims" are here employed to designate the county court when it sits for the purpose, among others, of ascertaining the claims against, and the expenses incurred by, the county, and of providing for their payment by appropriations out of the county levy; such levy being the annual tax imposed for county purposes, not upon property, but upon persons residing in the county, without reference to the value of their property. 1 Rev. Stat. Ky. 296, chap. 26. The county court is also described as "the county court of levy and disbursements" when reference is made to its duty "to erect and keep a sufficient county jail." Id. 329, chap. 27, art. 21, § 7.

The Revised Statutes provide that the county courts shall have jurisdiction to lay and superintend the collection and disbursement of the county levy; to erect, superintend, and repair all needful county buildings and structures; and "To superintend and control the fiscal affairs and property of the county, and to make provision for the maintenance of the poor." Id. 327, chap. 27, art. XIX. They also provide that "The office of associate judge of the county court is abolished," and that "a county court shall be held in each county at the seat of justice thereof by a presiding judge of the court, on the days prescribed by law," except that "at the court of claims * * * the justices of the peace of the county shall sit with the presiding judge and constitute the court;" and "justices of the peace shall only compose a part of the court when it is engaged in laying the county levy, and in appropriating money, and in transacting other financial business of the county." Id. 328, art. XXI, § 2.

The same provisions substantially are to be found in the General Statutes of the State, which went into effect in 1873. Gen. Stat. Ky. 269, chap. 27; Id. 304, chap. 28, arts. 15, 16, 17.

It is clear that the levying and collection of a tax to meet a county subscription to the stock of [357] a railroad company, is not a business connected with the laying of the county levy, or with appropriations of money out of such levy. But it is insisted that it is a matter relating to the "fiscal affairs" of the county, and is "financial business of the county," the control or management of which belongs, under the law, to the county court, composed of the presiding judge and the justices of the peace. On the other hand, the plaintiff in error contends, this case is taken out of the operation of the general statute by the fact that the special statute, under which the county made the subscription and issued the bonds in question, imposes upon the county court, held by the presiding judge, the absolute duty of levying the necessary tax.

Upon this point there seems to be a settled course of decision in the highest court of Kentucky; and upon such a subject as the organization or composition of a tribunal established by the fundamental law of the State, those decisions are, at least, entitled to great weight. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 34 [27: 359, 365]; Claiborne Co. v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 410 [28: 470, 474]; Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425 [ante, 178].

The first case in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky upon this question is Bowling Green & Madisonville R. R. Co. v. Warren County, 10 Bush, 711, decided in 1875. That was a proceeding to compel the county court to execute and deliver bonds in payment of a subscription to the stock of the railroad company—a subscription sustained by a majority of the legal voters at an election held under the order of the county court, composed of the presiding judge alone. The defense was that the county court held by that officer, the justices being absent, was without authority to call the election there in question. The court speaking by Pryor, J., after observing that, as a general rule, when reference is made to a county court, or the action of a county court, it is understood as a court presided over by the county judge alone, said:

"A county court, held by the county judge or by the judge in conjunction with the justices, has no power to impose such taxation as this on the people of the county, or to submit the question of taxation to the popular vote, with- [358] out some special legislative enactment; and in the absence of any such original jurisdiction belonging to either mode of organization, it remains to be determined whether the legislative intent, to be gathered from the provisions of appellant's charter, and particularly the sixteenth section, was to empower the county judge alone to exercise this right, or to require that the justices of the county should be associated with him. If the direction of the Legislature had been imperative on the county court to enter the order submitting the question of subscription to the people, there would be little difficulty in determining this question; for if the county court had been deprived of all discretion and compelled to obey a mandatory Act, it would be immaterial whether the county court, composed of the justices, or the county judge, made the order, as either or both must obey.

"In this case the Legislature seems to have departed from the usual course of legislation with reference to such charters, and instead of exercising its own judgment as to the interests of the people in this particular locality, or of permitting them primarily to do so, required that the county court, preliminary to a vote on the question by the people, should first, in its discretion, determine the propriety of such legislative action. This action on the part of the county court was certainly not judicial. The appellant had no right or claim on the people to make the subscription, or upon the county court to order the vote. The company was empowered by this Act to make a request only of the county court, that it might in its discretion accede to or refuse. * * * It was a matter of vital importance to the people of the County of Warren, as well as the other counties to whom such a proposition might have been made by appellant, that they should fully understand the nature of the burden they were about assuming; and the Legislature in its wisdom saw proper to give them the benefit of the judgment of those who represented the various localities and interests in each county, in order that they might determine whether the benefits to be derived from the construction of this railway would be an equivalent for the large expenditure to be made."

[359] So the mandamus was refused, upon the ground that the special statute intended that the question of submitting a subscription to the vote of the electors should be determined, in the first instance, by the county court, composed of the judge and justices.

The same point again arose in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in Logan County v. Caldwell, 1880, and in Cook v. Lyon County, 1884. Neither of these cases is reported in the printed volume of decisions, but a copy of the opinion in each has been submitted to us. The case of Logan County v. Caldwell involved the validity of a subscription to the capital stock of the Owensville and Russellville R. R. Co., and of the bonds issued in payment thereof—the subscription having been voted at a popular election called by the county court held by the judge alone. The court, speaking by Chief Justice Cofer, reaffirmed the rule announced in Bowling Green & Madisonville R. R. Co. v. Warren County, observing that it proceeded upon the idea that, as the justices of the peace are by law part of the county court in laying the levy, in making appropriations of money, and generally when the financial interests of the county are involved, it ought to be presumed, when a discretion is given by law to the county court in respect to a matter relating to the financial affairs of the county, that the Legislature intended by the phrase, "county court," that tribunal to which it had committed the management of the general financial interests of the county. Adhering to this rule, the court sustained the subscription and bonds of Logan County upon the ground that an Act, amendatory of the charter of the company, and which was in force when the election was held, imperatively required the county court to make the subscription and issue the bonds, in accordance with the vote of the majority; and hence, as held in the former case, it was "immaterial whether a court composed of the justices or held by the presiding judge alone made the order, as either must obey."

In Cook v. Lyon County the question was as to the validity of certain bonds and coupons issued in conformity with a popular vote at an election called by the county court, held by the presiding judge alone, upon the question of a [360] subscription to the stock of the Elizabethtown and Paducah Railroad Company, under the very Act now before us. The court said:

"It is urged that the bonds and coupons are not valid, because the county judge, in ordering the election to take the vote as to whether the county should subscribe stock to said road, and in making the subscription and issuing the bonds therefor, acted alone and without associating the justices of the county with him. The Act in question provides that all this shall be done by the 'county court,' and contains no language from which it can be even inferred that the Legislature intended that it should be done by the county levy or fiscal court of the county; and, although there is some reason in the claim that when the term 'county court' is used as to fiscal matters it refers to the fiscal court, yet, as a general rule, when reference is made to a county court, or the action of a county court, it means a court presided over by the county judge alone, and should be held to so mean when used in connection with fiscal matters if it relates to mere ministerial duties. Moreover, in this instance the direction of the Legislature to the county court to do these ministerial acts was imperative; and it is, therefore, immaterial whether it was done by the county judge alone or by him and the justices, even admitting (as we do not) that a bona fide holder of the bonds can be affected by such matters."

Taking these decisions as the basis upon which to rest our judgment in this case, it only remains to inquire whether the provisions of the Act of February 24, 1868, are mandatory in their character, or only invested the county court with a discretion in respect to the material matters involved in the subscription by Muhlenburg County. When the railroad company requests the county court of any county, through or adjacent to which it is proposed to construct the road, to subscribe, either absolutely or conditionally, a specified amount to its stock, the Act provides that "the county court shall forthwith order an election to be held," etc. The sections authorizing subscriptions by precincts, cities or towns are equally imperative. Secs. 5 and 6. When a county * * * subscribes under the provisions of the Act, "it shall be the duty [361] of the county court * * * to issue the bonds of such county," etc., to be signed by the "county judge and countersigned by the clerk." Sec. 7. In case of a subscription by an election district in any county, "it shall be the duty of the county court of such county to issue the bonds of such district or districts in payment thereof," etc. Sec. 8. We have already referred to the ninth section, which provides that, upon a subscription by any county, "it shall be the duty of the county court of such county * * * to cause to be levied and collected a tax sufficient to pay the semi-annual interest on the bonds issued and the cost of collecting such tax and paying the interest, on all real estate and personal property in said county," etc. On levying a tax as provided in the Act, to pay the interest on bonds issued by a county, "it shall be the duty of the county court * * * to appoint three resident taxpayers * * * who shall be styled the board of commissioners of the sinking fund of such county." Sec. 10. If dividends upon the stock subscribed prove to be insufficient to enable the county to pay its bonds at maturity, new bonds may be issued; but if the county deems that course inexpedient, "it shall be the duty of the county court * * * to cause a tax to be levied and collected on all property in such county * * * subject to taxation," etc. And so of all the remaining sections of the company's charter.

It would be difficult, we think, to frame an Act more mandatory in its character than that of February 24, 1868. None of its provisions leave room for the exercise of discretion by the county court, in respect to any matter upon which it is required to act. The learned court below announced that, except for the fourth section of this Act, it would decide—following the decisions in Bowling Green & Madisonville R. Co. and Logan County v. Caldwell—that the "county court" in the company's charter meant a court held by the presiding judge alone. That section provides: "4. That the person acting as sheriff at the several precincts shall return to the clerk of the county court within (three) days after the day of such election the [362] poll books of their respective precincts, and on the next day thereafter the county judge and county clerk shall count the vote; and if it shall appear that the majority of those voting voted in favor of the subscription of stock as proposed, the county judge shall order the vote to be entered on the record, and the subscriptions to be made by the clerk on behalf of the county on the terms specified in the order submitting the question to a vote."

We are unable to concur in the suggestion that the use of the words "county judge," in the fourth section of the Act, in connection with the direction that the vote be entered on the record (that is, upon the records of the county court) is inconsistent with the idea that "county court," as used in the company's charter, meant merely the county court, held by the judge thereof. As the counting must have been by individuals, not by a court, the requirement that the county clerk and county judge should perform that duty, and that the latter should cause the result to be entered on the records of the court, does not, we think, show an intention to invest the county court with any discretion whatever in ordering the election, or in issuing the bonds, or in levying taxes to pay the bonds and the interest thereon. In the absence of that discretion, it is the duty of the county court, held by the presiding judge alone, to levy the required tax. Such was the decision in Cook v. Lyon County, to which the attention of the court below does not appear to have been called.

The counsel for the defendant in error refer to section 2, article XVII, chapter 28 of the General Statutes, 306, in force since December 1, 1873, which provides that "If, under the provisions of any law hereafter enacted, it is required of the county court to submit to the qualified voters of the county, or to the qualified voters of any local community therein, the proposition to take stock in any or to levy any tax other than for common-school purposes; or, if, under any law hereafter enacted, it is required that the county court shall decide upon the issue of any bonds of the county, or of any district or local community therein, to any railroad or other company, it shall be the duty of the county judge to cause all the justices of the peace of such county to be summoned to attend at the term of the court at which any such action is proposed to be taken, [363] who shall be associated with the county judge and constitute the county court for the occasion."

It is sufficient to say that, as that provision, by its terms, only applies to laws "hereafter enacted," that is, enacted after the General Statutes went into operation, it cannot affect the present case, which depends upon the construction to be given to an Act passed in 1868.

As the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the original petition, the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule that demurrer, and for such other proceedings as may be consistent with this opinion. Reversed.

SAME v. UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 264-266.)

Duties—"wrought scrap iron"—punchings and clippings of boiler plates and ends of boiler rods and beams, dutiable as—"actual use."

1. The duty on "scrap iron" is now laid without reference to whether it is new or old; and all waste or refuse iron is scrap iron if it has been in actual use, and is only fit for remanufacture.

2. Punchings and clippings of wrought iron boiler plates, resulting from the manufacture of boilers from such plates, and ends of bridge rods and beams of wrought iron, have been "in actual use" within the meaning of the statute, and are dutiable as "wrought scrap iron."

Argued Jan. 18, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William S. Hall and L. S. Dabney, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

These cases involve substantially the same questions, and may be considered together. One is a suit by Naylor & Co., importers, against Beard, the Collector of Customs in Boston, to recover back duties alleged to have been illegally exacted; and the other is a suit by the United States against the same importers, to recover additional duties assessed on the liquidation of an entry after the delivery of the goods upon payment of estimated duties.

[265] The facts are these: in October, 1879, Naylor & Co. imported into the Port of Boston from England 170 tons of wrought scrap iron, consisting "of the punchings and clippings of wrought iron boiler plates and wrought sheet iron, left after the process of the manufacture of the boiler plates into boilers was completed, and of the ends of bridge rods and beams of wrought iron, cut off to bring the rods and beams to the required length, and to remove imperfections." When the entry was made at the custom house the duties were estimated upon the whole at the rate of $8 per ton. On the payment of this estimate the iron was delivered to the importers. Afterwards, 263,332 pounds were classified by the customs officers as "new wrought scrap iron," and an additional duty of $1,611.92 charged thereon. For the recovery of this amount the suit in favor of the United States was brought.

In November, 1879, the same parties imported from England 200 tons of wrought scrap iron, consisting entirely of punchings and clippings, such as are described above. Upon this entry 280,995 pounds were classified as "old wrought scrap iron," and charged with duty at the rate of $8 per ton, and 138,400 pounds as "new wrought scrap iron," and charged at the rate of one cent a pound. The importers paid the duties assessed under protest as to the last item, and then sued to recover back $889.70, the difference between the duties at $8 per ton and the amount actually paid.

It was agreed that the punchings, clippings, and ends were all waste iron and incapable of being further used, and that they were only fit for remanufacture. The only actual use to which they had been subjected was in the making of boilers from the plates, out of which they had been cut in the process of manufacture, and in the building of bridges of which the rods and beams that had been cut to adapt them to their places formed a part. The importer claimed that all were dutiable as "wrought scrap iron," under schedule E of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, p. 466; while the Collector claimed that the part classified as "new wrought scrap iron" was subject to a duty of one cent a pound, as "iron less finished than iron in bars and more advanced than pig iron," because it had not been in "actual use."

[266] The court below gave judgment in each of the suits against the importers, to reverse which these writs of error were brought.

The provisions of the Tariff Act on which the cases depend are the following clauses in schedule E of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes:

1. (p. 467.) "But all iron in slabs, blooms, loops, or other forms, less finished than iron in bars, and more advanced than pig iron, except castings, shall be rated as iron in bars, and pay a duty accordingly," i. e., one cent per pound.

2. (p. 469.) "Cast scrap iron of every description: six dollars per ton.

"Wrought scrap iron of every description: eight dollars per ton. But nothing shall be deemed scrap iron except waste or refuse iron that has been in actual use, and is fit only to be remanufactured."

This particular form of provision as to scrap iron, both cast and wrought, appeared for the first time in the Act of July 14, 1870, chap. 255, § 21, 16 Stat. at L. 264, from which it was carried into the Revised Statutes. The earlier statutes were as follows:

1. An Act of July 14, 1832, chap. 227, § 2, clause 18, 4 Stat. at L. 588: "That all scrap and old iron shall pay a duty of twelve dollars and fifty cents per ton; that nothing shall be deemed old iron that has not been in actual use and fit only to be remanufactured; and all pieces of iron, except old, of more than six inches in length, or of sufficient length to be made into spikes and bolts shall be rated as bar, bolt, rod, or hoop iron, as the case may be, and pay duty accordingly."

2. An Act of August 30, 1842, chap. 270, § 4, clause 8, 5 Stat. at L. 552, which is substantially the same as the Act of 1832, excepting only that the duty is reduced to $10 per ton.

3. An Act of July 30, 1846, chap. 74, § 11, schedule 6, 9 Stat. at L. 45, which places among articles subject to a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, "iron in bars, blooms, bolts, loops, pigs, rods, slabs, or other form not otherwise provided for; castings of iron; old or scrap iron."

4. An Act of March 2, 1861, chap. 68, § 7, clause 3, 12 Stat. at L. 181: "On old scrap iron, six dollars per ton; Provided, That nothing shall be deemed old iron that has not been in [267] actual use and fit only to be remanufactured."

5. An Act of June 30, 1864, chap. 171, § 8, 13 Stat. at L. 205, which is in the exact language of the Act of 1861, except that the duty is raised from $6 to $8 per ton.

It thus appears that in 1870 the form of the statutes on this subject was materially changed, and that now the duty is laid upon "scrap iron," without any reference to whether it is new or old, and that all waste or refuse iron is scrap iron, if it has been in actual use, and is only fit for remanufacture.

That the iron now under consideration was waste iron is conceded; and in our opinion it had been "in actual use" within the meaning of that term as employed in the statute. At one time it formed part of boiler plates used in the manufacture of boilers, or of rods or beams used in building bridges. In order to fit the plates, rods or beams to the places they were to occupy in the structures of which they were to form a part, these pieces were cut off as useless, and thrown away, or, in the language of the trade, "into the scrap heap." They had become, by the use to which they were put, "scrap iron," in the popular sense of that term, and nothing else. It is true the cuttings and clippings had never themselves been used in the boilers or in the bridges, but they had been used in making those structures, and thus had accomplished the purpose for which they were originally manufactured. The plates, rods and beams of which they were once parts had been used, and these were the waste resulting from that use. They are not old in the sense of having been worn by use, but they are scrap, and no longer capable of any use until remanufactured, because in their use they have been rendered worthless for any purpose except to remanufacture. In the popular sense, as manufactured articles, they have been used up—made worthless by use; and this use has been actual, not colorable only. The plates, rods and beams were made to be used in a particular way. They have been so used, and these cuttings and clippings are the waste of that use. Consequently they are, in our opinion, "wrought scrap iron," and dutiable as such.

[268] The judgment in each of the cases is reversed, and the causes remanded, with instructions to enter judgment upon the agreed facts in favor of the importers in the suit against the Collector and against the United States in the suit against the importers.

[271] ALBERT GRANT, Appt.,
v.
PHŒNIX MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

SAME ET AL.
v.
SAME.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 271–273.)

Foreclosure of mortgage—order requiring receiver of rents to pay costs in this court—counsel fees.

On appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage this court orders a receiver for the collection of the rents of the mortgaged premises during the pendency of the suit, to pay to the clerk the estimated balance of his fees and for the printer for the printing the record.

[Nos. 165, 1201.]

Submitted Jan. 17, 1887. Decided Jan. 31, 1887.

APPEALS from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

On motion for the payment of costs and counsel fees out of the moneys in the hands of the receiver.

No. 165, the principal cause, is a foreclosure proceeding in which a receiver was appointed by the court below to collect the rents of the mortgaged premises pending the suit.

The other appeal is a collateral proceeding arising from the refusal of the tenant of part of said mortgaged premises to pay rent to said receiver, the appeal being from an order of the court below requiring him to make such payment.

The appellant, Grant, seeks by the present motion an order requiring the receiver to pay over to him from the funds in his hands the sum of $5,500 for the payment of costs and counsel fees.

Mr. H. W. Blair, for appellant, in support of motion.

Messrs. W. F. Mattingly and M. F. Morris, for appellee, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin [272] ion of the court:

We find that the cost of printing the record in No. 165 has been $1,827 00 and that the estimated clerk's fees in the same case are..... 900 00

In all..... $2,227 00
Of this the appellant has paid:
1. To the printer..... $552
2. To the clerk..... 400 952 00

Leaving a balance of..... $1,275 00

which the appellant represents himself as unable to pay; and the printer will not allow the requisite number of the printed copies to be delivered for use at the hearing until his claim is satisfied. The money in the hands of the receiver has been collected from the rents of the mortgaged property during the pendency of the suit. We therefore direct that there be paid by the receiver to the clerk of this court the sum of $1,275, to be by him used in payment of the amount now due for printing the record, and the amount of his own taxable fees in the case, not already paid by the appellant. A copy of this order may be certified to the court [273] below so that it may be carried into effect by an appropriate order of that court upon the receiver.

The motion papers now on file do not show that the matters involved in the appeal in No. 1201 are of a character to make it proper to direct that the clerk's costs and the expense of printing the record in that case be paid by the receiver. Except as to the payment of clerk's fees and printer's charges in No. 165 as above, the motions are overruled.

In the Matter of LORENZO SNOW, Petitioner, Appt. [274]

*Criminal law—cohabitation, a continuing offense—separate indictments, convictions and sentences—jurisdiction—habeas corpus—appeal.*

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 274–287.)

1. A continuing offense, such as that of cohabiting with more than one woman in the sense of section 3 of the Act of March 22, 1882, can be committed but once, for the purposes of indictment or prosecution, prior to the time the prosecution is instituted.

2. A grand jury cannot divide a continuous offense, arising under said Act of 1882, into arbitrary parts, call each part a separate offense, and find separate indictments therefor.

3. In the case presented there were three separate convictions on three separate indictments, charging the accused with unlawful cohabitation with the same seven women. Said indictments were found by the same grand jury, at the same time, and on the same testimony of the same witnesses, covering a continuous period of thirty-five months.

Held: that the court was without jurisdiction to inflict a punishment in respect of more than one of said convictions; that, the want of jurisdiction appearing on the face of the judgment, the objection may be taken on habeas corpus; and that under section 1909 R. S., an appeal lies to this court from the order and judgment of the District Court of Utah, refusing to issue said writ.

Ex parte Bigelow, Bk. 28, distinguished.

[No. 1282.]

Argued Jan. 20, 21, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District Court, Salt Lake County, Territory of Utah. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George Ticknor Curtis and Franklin S. Richards, for appellant:

When a prisoner is held under a judgment of a court made without authority of law, the proper tribunal will, upon habeas corpus, look into the record so far as to ascertain that fact, and if it is found to be so, will discharge the prisoner.

Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163 (21:872); Ex parte Milligan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 2, 131 (18: 281, 299); Tweed v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, and cases there cited; Lamphere's Case, 27 N. W. (Mich.) 882; Church, Habeas Corpus, §§ 348, 362, 363.

In all courts having the power to issue writs of habeas corpus to inquire into a cause of commitment and imprisonment, a refusal to issue the writ is of the same legal effect and the same error as if the writ had been issued, and upon its return, the petitioner had been remanded, when the petition shows a legal cause for a discharge from custody.

Ex parte Milligan, supra.

The cohabitation having been continuous, covering every day of the entire time charged in the three indictments, from January 1, 1883, to December 1, 1885, and having been with the same women and at the same place, was one continuous indivisible transaction, and could constitute but one offense. The principle involved has been applied in numerous adjudicated cases which are analogous to this.

1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 931, 9th ed.; Reg. v. Firth, L. R. 1 C. C. 172; Reg. v. Bleasdale, 2 Carr. & K. 765; Orepps v. Durden, 2 Cowp. 640; U. S. v. M'Cormick, 4 Cranch, C. C. 104; State v. Lindley, 14 Ind. 430; State v. Nutt, 28 Vt. 598; Mayor v. Ordrenan, 12 Johns. 122; Sturgis v. Spofford, 45 N. Y. 446; Fisher v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 644; State v. Comrs. 2 Murph. 371; State v. Eggleshi, 41 Iowa, 574.

In the case of Commonwealth v. Connors, 116 Mass. 35, relied on by the prosecutor in the trial court, and in the court below, it is held that, as the indictments covered two distinct periods of time, and as the "evidence that would have been competent on the one indictment would not have been competent on the other, and the same evidence could not convict in both cases," both indictments might stand. This rule of law—that "Where the offense consists of a series of acts which, taken together, constitute a criminal practice or occupation, time enters into the essence of the offense; and hence, it must be alleged with certainty, and evidence confined to acts done within the time charged—" does not prevail elsewhere than in Massachusetts. In Utah the evidence need not be confined to the period named in the indictment.

U. S. v. Cannon, 7 Pac. Rep. 879.

The rule there permitted the prosecution to introduce, on each trial, all the evidence of a continuous cohabitation during the entire time charged in the three indictments. This extreme injustice could not possibly have happened under the Massachusetts rule.

Commonwealth v. Robinson, 126 Mass. 261.

Mr. William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the United States:

It is not pretended that the court that tried these cases had no jurisdiction of the offense of cohabiting with more than one woman.

The whole contention is that the judgments in the second and third cases were void because the indictments in those cases charged the same identical offense as was charged in the first case.

But if the court had jurisdiction over the offense, it had also jurisdiction to decide the question of the identity of the offenses charged in the three cases which were raised in the plea of autrefois convict in the second and third cases.

Jurisdiction of an offense necessarily carries with it the power to try and determine every matter that may be urged in bar of an indictment charging such offense. There can be no room for doubt or hesitation as to the soundness of this proposition, which has been repeatedly recognized by this court in several cases which are absolutely conclusive of the case at bar.

Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U. S. 328 (28:1005); Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18 (23:787); Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 193, 202 (7:650, 653); Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651, 653 (28:274); Ex parte Crouch, 112 U. S. 178 (28:690); Ex parte Royall, Id. 181 (28:690); Ex parte Gordon, 104 U. S. 516 (26:814); Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167 (29:601).

In this last cited case the attempt was to make the writ of prohibition do the office of a writ of error, as in the other cited cases it had been to make the writ of habeas corpus perform that function.

The case at bar is but a repetition of these abortive efforts to induce this court on habeas corpus to look into the validity of judgments of other courts of competent jurisdiction, which are only voidable and reviewable on writ of error, if voidable and reviewable at all.

The appellant made the endeavor to bring all three of his cases before this court by writ of error, but failed.

Snow v. U. S. 118 U. S. 346 (ante, 207).

His present attempt is to do per indirectum what he could not do per directum. This the law will not allow.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [275]

Section 3 of the Act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, chap. 47, 22 Stat. at L. 31, provides as follows: "Sec. 3. That if any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than three hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court." [276]

The grand jury of the United States for November Term, 1885, in the District Court of the

First Judicial District in and for the Territory of Utah, on the 5th of December, 1885, presented and filed in that court, in open court, three several indictments, in the name of the United States, against Lorenzo Snow, each of them found December 2, 1885, designated as No. 741, No. 742, and No. 743. Each of them was founded on the foregoing statute; and they were alike in all respects, except that each covered a different period of time. No. 741 alleged that Snow, on the 1st of January, 1883, "at the County of Box Elder, in the said district, Territory aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and on divers other days and times thereafter, and continuously between said first day of January, A. D. 1883, and the thirty-first day of December, A. D. 1883, did then and there unlawfully live and cohabit with more than one woman; to wit, with Adeline Snow, Sarah Snow, Harriet Snow, Eleanor Snow, Mary H. Snow, Phœbe W. Snow, and Minnie Jensen Snow; and during all the period aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, he, the said Lorenzo Snow, did unlawfully claim, live, and cohabit with all of said women as his wives." No. 742 alleged that Snow, on the first of January, 1885, "and on divers other days and times thereafter, and continuously between said first day of January, A. D. 1885, and the first day of December, A. D. 1885, did then and there unlawfully live and cohabit with more than one woman; to wit, with" the seven persons above named, "and during all the period aforesaid" "did unlawfully claim, live, and cohabit with all of said women as his wives." No. 743 alleged that Snow, on the 1st of January, 1884, 'and on divers other days and times thereafter, and continuously between said first day of January, A. D. 1884, and the thirty-first day of December, A. D. 1884, did then and there unlawfully live and cohabit with more than one woman; to wit, with" the seven persons above named, "and during all the period aforesaid" [277] "did unlawfully claim, live, and cohabit with all of said women as his wives."

At the time of filing each indictment it was properly indorsed "a true bill, etc., and with the names of the witnesses." The same sixteen witnesses were examined before the grand jury, "on one oath and one examination as to the alleged offense during the entire time mentioned in all of said three indictments, and" they were found "upon the testimony of witnesses given on an examination covering the whole time specified in said three indictments." On the 11th of December, 1885, the defendant was arraigned on each of the three indictments, and interposed a demurrer to each, which being overruled, he pleaded not guilty to each.

Indictment No. 742 was first tried, covering the period from and including January 1, 1885, to December 1, 1885. On the 31st of December, 1885, a verdict of guilty was rendered, and the court fixed the 16th of January, 1886, as the time for passing sentence.

Indictment No. 743 was next tried, covering the period from and including January 1, 1884, to December 31, 1884. The defendant orally put in an additional plea in bar, setting up his prior conviction on indictment No. 742; and that the offense charged in all of the indictments was one continuous offense and the same offense, and not divisible. On an oral demurrer to this plea, the demurrer was sustained. On the trial by the jury, a verdict of guilty was rendered on the 5th of January, 1886, and the court fixed the 16th of January, 1886, as the time for passing sentence.

Indictment No. 741 was next tried, covering the period from and including January 1, 1883, to December 31, 1883. The defendant orally put in an additional plea in bar, setting up his prior convictions on indictments Nos. 742 and 743; and that the offense charged in all of the indictments was one continuous offense, and the same offense, and not divisible. On an oral demurrer to this plea, the demurrer was sustained. On the trial by the jury, a verdict of guilty was rendered on the 5th of January, 1886, and the court fixed the 16th of January, 1886, as the time for passing sentence.

The record of the court states that on the last-named day the following proceedings took place, in open court: [278]

"(Title of Court and Cause.)

"The defendant and his counsel, F. S. Richards and C. C. Richards, Esq'rs (of counsel), came into court. The defendant was duly informed of the nature of the indictments found against him on the 5th day of December, 1885, by the grand jury of this court, for the crime of unlawful cohabitation, committed as stated in said indictments, and during the time, as follows, viz: Indictment No. 741, between the first day of January, A. D. 1883, and the thirty-first day of December, A. D. 1883; indictment No. 742, between the first day of January, A. D. 1885, and the first day of December, A. D. 1885; indictment No. 743, between the first day of January, A. D. 1884, and the thirty-first day of December, A. D. 1884; of his arraignment and plea of not guilty as charged in said three indictments, on the sixteenth day of December, A. D. 1885; of his trial and the verdicts of the juries; indictment No. 742, 'Guilty as charged in the indictment,' on December 31, 1885; indictment No. 743, 'Guilty as charged in the indictment,' on January 5, 1886; indictment No. 741, 'Guilty as charged in the indictment,' on January 5, 1886.

"The said defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which he replied that he had none; and no sufficient cause being shown or appearing to the court, thereupon the court renders its judgment, that whereas, said Lorenzo Snow having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of unlawful cohabitation:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that said Lorenzo Snow be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the Territory of Utah for a period of six months, and that he do forfeit and pay to the United States a fine of three hundred dollars and the costs of this prosecution, and that he do stand committed into the custody of the U. S. Marshal for said Territory until such fine and costs be paid in full. (As to indictment No. 741.)

"And it [is further ordered, adjudged and [279] decreed, that at the expiration of the sentence and judgment rendered on said indictment No. 741, said Lorenzo Snow be imprisoned in the penitentiary of Utah Territory for a period of six months, and that he do forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of three hundred dollars and the costs of this prosecution, and that he do stand committed into the custody of the U. S. marshal for said Territory until such fine and costs be paid in full. (As to indictment No. 742.)

"And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that at the expiration of the sentence and judgment, as last above rendered, on said indictment No. 742, said Lorenzo Snow be imprisoned in the penitentiary of Utah Territory for a period of six months, and that he do forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of three hundred dollars and the costs of this prosecution, and that he do stand committed into the custody of the U. S. marshal for said Territory until such fine and costs be paid in full. (As to indictment No. 743.)

"The said defendant Lorenzo Snow, is remanded into the custody of the United States Marshal for Utah Territory, to be by him delivered into the custody of the warden or other proper officer in charge of said penitentiary; and said warden or other proper officer of said penitentiary is hereby commanded to receive of and from the said United States Marshal, him, the said Lorenzo Snow, convicted and sentenced as aforesaid, and him, the said Lorenzo Snow, keep and imprison in said penitentiary for the periods as in this judgment ordered and specified.

ORLANDO W. POWERS, Judge."

On the 22d of October, 1886, the defendant filed in the District Court of the Third Judicial District of the Territory of Utah a petition setting forth that he is a prisoner confined in the penitentiary of the Territory of Utah, "by virtue of the warrant, judgment and proceedings of record, including three indictments against your petitioner, his arraignment thereon, and pleas thereto, respectively, as well as demurrers to such pleas, decisions thereof and [280] verdicts of the jury, being the record of said matters in the District Court of the First Judicial District of the Territory of Utah," copies of all which papers, sixteen in number, were annexed to the petition; that, under said judgment, and in execution thereof, he had been imprisoned in said penitentiary for more than six months; to wit, continuously since the 12th day of March, 1886, and had paid $300 in satisfaction of the fine adjudged against him, and "all the costs awarded and assessed against him on said prosecution;" that his imprisonment is illegal in that "the court had no jurisdiction to pass judgment" against him "upon more than one of the indictments or records referred to in its said judgment; for the reason that the offense therein set out is the same as that contained and set out in each of the other said indictments and records, and the maximum punishment which the court had authority to impose was six months' imprisonment and a fine of three hundred dollars;" and "that by his said imprisonment your petitioner is being punished twice for one and the same offense." The prayer is for a writ of habeas corpus, to the end that the petitioner may be discharged from custody.

On a hearing on the petition the following order was made by the court on the 23d of October, 1886:

"The petition of Lorenzo Snow for a writ of habeas corpus having been presented to the court, with the exhibits attached as a part thereof, and the court, having fully considered the application and petition and the exhibits attached, finds that the facts alleged and shown by the petition and exhibits are insufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ; and the court being of the opinion, from the allegations and facts stated in the petition and exhibits, that, if the writ be granted and a hearing given, the petitioner could not be discharged from custody, it is ordered and adjudged by the court that the said application for a writ of habeas corpus be, and the same is hereby, refused; to which ruling and refusal applicant, by his counsel, excepts."

From this order and judgment the petitioner has appealed to this court.

There can be no doubt that the action of the district court, as set forth in its order and judg- [281] ment refusing to issue the writ, was, so far as an appeal is concerned, equivalent to a refusal to discharge the petitioner on a hearing on the return to a writ; and that, under section 1909 of the Revised Statutes, an appeal lies to this court from that order and judgment.

It is contended for the United States that, as the court which tried the indictments had jurisdiction over the offenses charged in them, it had jurisdiction to determine the questions raised by the demurrers to the oral pleas in bar in the cases secondly and thirdly tried; that it tried those questions; that those questions are the same which are raised in the present proceeding; that they cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus, by any court; and that they could only be re-examined here on a writ of error, if one were authorized. For these propositions the case of Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U. S. 328 [28: 1005], is cited. But, for the reasons hereafter stated, we are of opinion that the decision in that case does not apply to the present one.

The offense of cohabiting with more than one woman, in the sense of the section of the statute on which the indictments were founded, may be committed by a man by living in the same house with two women whom he had theretofore acknowledged as his wives, and eating at their respective tables, and holding them out to the world by his language or conduct, or both, as his wives, though he may not occupy the same bed or sleep in the same room with them, or either of them, or have sexual intercourse with either of them. The offense of cohabitation, in the sense of this statute, is committed if there is a living or dwelling together as husband and wife. It is inherently a continuous offense, having duration, and not an offense consisting of an isolated act. That it was intended in that sense in these indictments is shown by the fact that in each the charge laid is that the defendant did on the day named and "thereafter and continuously," for the time specified, "live and cohabit with more than one woman; to wit, with" the seven women named, and "during all the period aforesaid" "did unlawfully claim, live and cohabit with all of said women as his wives." Thus, in each indict- [282] ment, the offense is laid as a continuing one, and a single one, for all the time covered by the indictment; and taking the three indictments together, there is charged a continuing offense for the entire time covered by all three of the indictments. There was but a single offense committed prior to the time the indictments were found. This appears on the face of the judgment. It refers to the indictments as found "for the crime of unlawful cohabitation committed" "during the time" stated, divided into three periods, according to each indictment. For so much of the offense as covered each of these periods the defendant is, according to the judgment, to be imprisoned for six months and to pay a fine of $300. The division of the two years and eleven months is wholly arbitrary. On the same principle there might have been an indictment covering each of the thirty-five months, with imprisonment for seventeen years and a half and fines amounting to $10,500, or even an indictment covering every week, with imprisonment for seventy-four years and fines amounting to $44,400; and so on, ad infinitum, for smaller periods of time. It is to prevent such an application of penal laws, that the rule has obtained that a continuing offense of the character of the one in this case can be committed but once, for the purposes of indictment or prosecution, prior to the time the prosecution is instituted. Here each indictment charged unlawful cohabitation with the same seven women; all the indictments were found at the same time, by the same grand jury, and on the testimony of the same witnesses, covering a continuous period of thirty-five months; and it was the mere will of the grand jury which divided the time among three indictments, and stopped short of dividing it among thirty-five, or one hundred and fifty-two, or even more. It was quite in consonance with this action that the prosecuting officer tried the indictments in the inverse order of the time to which each related, that for 1885 first, that for 1884 next, and that for 1883 last. Hence the defendant could not, on any trial plead or show that he had before been tried on an indictment in respect to a period of time antedating that laid in the indictment on trial. Then, after the verdicts, there [283] was not a separate judgment in each case; but only one judgment in form was rendered for all the cases. The judgment says, on its face, that the proper officer of the penitentiary is to imprison the defendant therein "for the periods as in this judgment ordered and specified," that is, for three successive periods of six months each, the first period to apply to the indictment thirdly tried; the second period to apply to the indictment first tried, and to begin when the sentence and judgment on the indictment thirdly tried should expire; and the third period to apply to the indictment secondly tried, and to begin when the sentence and judgment on the indictment first tried should expire.

No case is cited where what has been done in the present case has been held to be lawful. But the uniform current of authority is to the contrary, both in England and in the United States.

A leading case on the subject in England is Crepps v. Durden, 2 Cowp. 640. In that case the statute, 29 Car. II, c.7, provided "That no tradesman or other person shall do or exercise any worldly labor, business, or work of their ordinary calling on the Lord's Day, works of necessity and charity only excepted." A penalty of five shillings was affixed to each offense, and it was made cognizable by a justice of the peace. Crepps, a baker, was convicted before Durden, a justice, by four separate convictions, "of selling small hot loaves of bread, the same not being any work of charity, on the same day, being Sunday," in violation of that statute. Durden issued four warrants, one on each conviction, to officers who, under them, levied four penalties, of five shillings each, on the goods of Crepps. The latter sued Durden and the others, in trespass, in the King's Bench, in 1777, and had a verdict before Lord Mansfield, for three sums of five shillings each, subject to the opinion of the court. The first question raised was whether, in the action of trespass, and before the convictions were quashed, their legality could be objected to; and, next, whether the levy under the last three warrants could be justified. It was contended for the plaintiff that the last three convictions were in excess of the jurisdiction of [284] the justice, because the offense created by the statute was the exercising of a calling on the Lord's Day, and if the plaintiff had continued baking from morning till night, it would still be but one offense; that the four convictions were for one and the same offense; and that an action would lie against the justice and the officers. On the other side it was urged that, as the justice had general jurisdiction of the offense in question, the convictions must be quashed, or reversed on appeal, before they could be questioned. At a subsequent day, the unanimous opinion of the court was delivered by Lord Mansfield. He first considered the question whether the legality of the convictions could be objected to before they were quashed. As to this he said: "Here are three convictions of a baker, for exercising his trade on one and the same day, he having been before convicted for exercising his ordinary calling on the identical day. If the Act of Parliament gives authority to levy but one penalty, there is an end of the question; for there is no penalty at common law. On the construction of the Act of Parliament the offense is 'exercising his ordinary trade upon the Lord's Day;' and that without any fractions of a day, hours or minutes. It is but one entire offense, whether longer or shorter in point of duration; so, whether it consists of one, or of a number of particular acts. The penalty incurred for this offense is five shillings. There is no idea conveyed by the Act itself that, if a tailor sews on the Lord's Day, every stitch he takes is a separate offense; or, if a shoemaker or carpenter work for different customers at different times on the same Sunday, that those are so many separate and distinct offenses. There can be but one entire offense on one and the same day. And this is a much stronger case than that which has been alluded to, of killing more hares than one on the same day. Killing a single hare is an offense; but the killing ten more on the same day will not multiply the offense, or the penalty imposed by the statute for killing one. Here, repeated offenses are not the object which the Legislature had in view in making the statute; but singly, to punish a man for exercising his ordinary trade and calling on a Sunday. Upon this construction, the justice had no jurisdiction whatever in respect of the three last convictions. How, then, can there be a doubt [285] but that the plaintiff might take this objection at the trial?" As to justifying the levy under the last three warrants, Lord Mansfield said: "But what could the justification have been in this case, if any had been attempted to be set up? It could only have been this: That because the plaintiff had been convicted of one offense on that day, therefore the justice had convicted him in three other offenses for the same act. By law that is no justification. It is illegal on the face of it; and, therefore, as was very rightly admitted by the counsel for the defendant, in the argument, if put upon the record by way of plea, would have been bad, and on demurrer must have been so adjudged. Most clearly, then, it was open to the plaintiff, upon the general issue, to take advantage of it at the trial. The question does not turn upon niceties; upon a computation how many hours distant the several bakings happened; or upon the fact of which conviction was prior in point of time; or that for uncertainty in that respect they should all four be held bad. But it goes upon the ground that the offense itself can be committed only once in the same day."

In the case at bar the statute provides that if any male person shall thereafter cohabit with more than one woman, he shall, on conviction, be punished thus and so. The judgment in the case, taken in connection with the other proceedings in the record and the statute, shows, within the principle of Creppe v. Durden, that there was but one entire offense, whether longer or shorter in point of duration, between the earliest day laid in any indictment and the latest day laid in any. There can be but one offense between such earliest day and the end of the continuous time embraced by all of the indictments. Not only had the court which tried them no jurisdiction to inflict a punishment in respect of more than one of the convictions, but, as the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the judgment, the objection may be taken on habeas corpus, when the sentence on more than one of the convictions is sought to be enforced. If such an objection could be taken in Creppe v. Durden, in a collateral action for damages, it can be taken on a habeas corpus [286] to release the party from imprisonment under the illegal judgment. These considerations distinguish the case from that of Ex parte Bigelow, ubi supra, and bring it within the principle of such cases as Ex parte Milligan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 2, 131 [18:281, 299]; Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163, 178 [21:872, 879]; and Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S., 417 [29:89].

A distinction is laid down in adjudged cases and in text writers between an offense continuous in its character, like the one at bar, and a case where the statute is aimed at an offense that can be committed uno ictu. The subject is discussed in 1 Wharton's Criminal Law, 9th ed. sections 27, 931, and the cases on the subject are cited.

The principle which governs the present case has been recognized and approved in many cases in the United States: Washburn v. McInroy, (1810) 7 Johns. 134; Mayor v. Ordrenan, (1815) 12 Johns. 122; Tiffany v. Driggs, (1816) 13 Johns. 253; State v. Comrs. (1818) 2 Murph. 371; U. S. v. M'Cormick (1830), 4 Cranch, C. C. 104; State v. Nutt (1856), 28 Vt. 598; State v. Lindley (1860), 14 Ind. 430; Sturgis v. Spofford (1871), 45 N. Y. 446; Fisher v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. (1871) 46 N. Y. 644; State v. Eggleshi (1875), 41 Iowa, 574; U. S. v. N. Y. Guaranty & Indemnity Co. (1875) 8 Ben. 269; U. S. v. Erie R. Co. (1877) 9 Ben. 67, 68.

The case of Commonwealth v. Connors, 116 Mass. 85, gives no support to the view that a grand jury may divide a single continuous offense, running through a past period of time, into such parts as it may please, and call each part a separate offense. On the contrary, in Commonwealth v. Robinson, 126 Mass. 259, it is said that the offense of keeping a tenement for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors on a day named, and on divers other days and times between that day and a subsequent day, is but one offense, even though the tenement is kept during every hour of the time between those two days, such offense being continuous in its character.

On the whole case we are unanimously of opinion that the order and judgment of the District Court for the Third Judicial District of Utah Territory must be reversed and the case be remanded to that court, with a direction to grant [287] the writ of habeas corpus prayed for, and to take such proceedings thereon as may be in conformity with law and not inconsistent with the opinion of this court.

Ejectment—defective verdict.

In an action of ejectment a verdict for the plaintiff which does not state the quantity of the estate or describe the land will not sustain a judgment in his favor.

[No. 100.]

Submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida. Reversed.

The case appears in the opinion.

Messrs. C. W. Jones and Wm. A. Blount, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. A. Perry, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

A Statute of Florida, approved February 22, 1881, contains the following provisions:

"Sec. 4. The verdict in actions of ejectment shall, when for the plaintiff, state the quantity of the estate of the plaintiff, and describe the land by its metes and bounds, by the number of the lot or other certain description.

"Sec. 5. The judgment awarding possession shall, in like manner, state the quantity of the estate, and give description of the land recovered."

This was an action of ejectment, and the verdict, which was for the plaintiff, did not state the quantity of the estate or describe the land. This is assigned for error, among others, and Perry, the defendant in error, in the brief which has been filed in his behalf, confesses that the judgment in his favor is thereby vitiated. Without considering any of the other errors assigned, therefore, we reverse the judgment on this ground alone and remand the cause for a new trial.

Reversed.

UNITED STATES, Plff.,
v.
STEPHEN A. NORTHWAY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 327–336.)

Criminal law—embezzlement, misapplication and abstraction of funds of national banking association—indictment under section 5209 R. S.—sufficiency of various counts—certificate of division in opinion.

1. Upon a certificate of division in opinion between the judges of the circuit court, this court declines to answer the question whether either of several counts in an indictment charges an offense under the laws of the United States, because too vague and general.

2. An allegation in the indictment charging the defendant with committing the acts therein charged against him, as "president and agent" of a national bank, is neither too uncertain nor contradictory.

3. A willful and criminal misapplication of the funds of a national banking association, as defined by section 5209 Revised Statutes, may be made by an officer or agent thereof without having previously received them into his manual possession. There is a distinction between said offense and embezzlement. In the former it is unnecessary to charge possession in the indictment; while in the latter, a charge of possession is required in describing the offense.

4. In an indictment charging the president of a national banking association with aiding and abetting the cashier in the misapplication of its funds, it is unnecessary to charge him with knowledge of the official character of the cashier.

5. To constitute the offense of abstracting the funds of a national banking association, within the meaning of said section, it is necessary that the funds of the association should be abstracted without its knowledge and consent, with the intent to injure or defraud it or some other company or person, or to deceive some officer thereof, or an agent appointed to examine its affairs.

6. The offense of abstracting the funds of such an association is not necessarily equivalent to the offense of larceny. The word "abstract," as used in the statute, has but one meaning, being that which is attached to it in its ordinary and popular use; and it is to be accepted with that meaning in framing an indictment.

7. The allegation in the indictment in question, that the defendant "was then and there president and agent of a certain national banking association * * * theretofore duly organized and established * * * under the laws of the United States," sufficiently states that said association was organized under the National Banking Act and to carry on business under the laws of the United States.

Argued Jan. 4, 5, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

The facts and case appear in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States.

Messrs. A. J. Marvin, J. B. Burrows and W. W. Boyington, for defendant.

[328]

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 23d of April, 1885, the grand jury for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Ohio returned an indictment, apparently founded upon section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, against Stephen A. Northway, as president and agent of the Second National Bank of Jefferson, a national banking association. On July 18, 1885, the record was, on motion of the district attorney, remitted to the circuit court. There are fifty-nine counts in the indictment; all of these were quashed except counts 2, 12, 15, 16, 28, 30, and 46, to each of which the defendant interposed a general demurrer. This demurrer came on for hearing before the circuit court, composed of the circuit judge and the district judge for that district, who certify to us that on the hearing they were divided and opposed in opinion on the following questions.

"1. Whether either of said counts charges defendant with an offense under the laws of the United States.

"2. Whether the charging of the defendant with committing the acts therein charged against him as 'president and agent' did not vitiate said counts of said indictment.

"3. Whether, under section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it was necessary in the indictment to charge that the moneys and funds alleged to have been embezzled and misapplied, or either, had been previously entrusted to the defendant.

"4. Whether it is necessary, in charging said defendant with aiding and abetting Sylvester T. Fuller, cashier of said bank, as in counts sixteen, twenty-eight, and forty-six, with the misapplication of the funds of said bank, to charge, that the defendant then and there knew that said Fuller was such cashier.

"5. Whether said second count sufficiently describes and identifies the crime of abstracting the funds of the bank created by the Act of Congress. [329]

"6. Whether the indictment sufficiently states that the Second National Bank of Jefferson was organized under the National Banking Act, or to carry on the business of banking under a law of the United States."

Section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, under which this indictment appears to have been drawn, is as follows:

"Sec. 5209. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds or credits of the association; or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten."

We proceed to dispose of the several questions certified to us in their order:

1. The question whether either of said counts charges said defendant with an offense under the laws of the United States, which is the first one certified, we decline to answer, for the reason that it is too vague and general, within the Act of Congress authorizing certificates of this character and the repeated decisions of this court.

2. We are of opinion that charging the defendant with committing the acts therein charged against him as "president and agent" did not vitiate the counts of the indictment in which that description is contained. The only grounds on which the contrary conclusion
[330] could be predicated are that the allegation is either too uncertain or is contradictory. The allegation is not uncertain, as it might have been if it had been "president or agent." In that case it might have been urged that as the offense was charged to have been committed by the defendant either as president or agent, it was uncertain in which of these capacities he was charged. For, although it might be said that a president is ex officio agent of the association, there may be many agents who are not presidents. Here the description is that he was "president and agent," and committed the offense charged in some capacity described by both terms. Neither is the description contradictory, because he may be both president and agent. There is no repugnance in the two characters. Even on the supposition that the statute means to make a distinction between the two offices of president and agent, there is nothing in the nature of either to prevent them both being held at the same time by one person; and the acts charged may in contemplation of law have been committed by him in both capacities.

A fortiori may this be the case, if every president of such an association is to be held by virtue of his office to be also, within the meaning of the Act, an agent of the association. In that case, the use of the words "and agent" would be mere surplusage in the indictment. Being already included within the meaning of the word "president," it does not add anything to the description to introduce the words "and agent." This question is therefore answered in the negative.

3. The twelfth count of the indictment charges that the defendant, with proper allegations of time and place, "was then and there president and agent of a certain national banking association; to wit, 'The Second National Bank of Jefferson,' theretofore duly organized and established, and then existing and doing business, in the Village of Jefferson and County of Ashtabula, in the division and district aforesaid, under the laws of the United States; and the said Stephen A. Northway, as such president and agent, then and there had and received in and into his possession certain of the [331] moneys and funds of said banking association of the amount and value of twelve thousand dollars; to wit, * * * then and there being the property of said banking association, * * * and then and there being in the possession of said Stephen A. Northway, as such president and agent aforesaid, he, the said Stephen A. Northway, then and there * * * wrongfully, unlawfully, and with intent to injure and defraud said banking association, did embezzle and convert to his, said Stephen A. Northway's own use," etc.

The fifteenth count is for wrongfully, unlawfully and willfully misapplying certain described funds of the bank, with intent to injure the association, and without the knowledge and consent thereof, by paying and causing to be paid to certain persons, out of the moneys, funds and credits then and there belonging to the property of the association, a large sum of money in the purchase by him, the said Northway, for the use, benefit and advantage of himself, of a large number of shares of the capital stock of certain stock companies. It is not alleged in this count that the moneys and funds so alleged to have been misapplied had previously come into the possession of the defendant by virtue of his office and character of president and agent.

In respect to the counts for embezzlement, it is quite clear that the allegation is sufficient, as it distinctly alleges that the moneys and funds charged to have been embezzled were at the time in the possession of the defendant as president and agent. This necessarily means that they had come into his possession in his official character, so that he held them in trust for the use and benefit of the association. In respect to those funds, the charge against him is that he embezzled them by converting them to his own use. This we think fully and exactly describes the offense of embezzlement under the Act, by an officer or agent of the association.

With respect to the fifteenth count, and other similar counts charging a willful misapplication of the funds of the bank, this allegation is omitted; that is, it is not alleged that the moneys and funds charged to have been misapplied had previously come into the possession of the defendant. Neither do we think this to be necessary to a description of the offense. A willful and criminal misapplication of the [332] funds of the association may be made by an officer or agent of the bank without having previously received them into his manual possession. In the case of The United States v. Britton, 107 U. S. 655, 669 [27: 520, 525], the offense of willfully misapplying the funds of a banking association, as defined by the statute, was considered with reference to the facts in that case. It was there held that a willful and criminal misapplication of the funds, as defined by section 5209, did not include every case of an unlawful application of funds, inasmuch as in the very statute itself there were other instances of unlawful misapplication evidently not embraced within the intention of section 5209. For that reason it was held, in that case, that it was necessary to specify the particulars of the application, so as to distinguish that charged in the indictment as willful and criminal from those others contemplated by the statute, which were unlawful but not criminal; and it was held to be of the essence of the criminality of the misapplication that there should be a conversion of the funds to the use of the defendant, or of some person other than the association, with intent to injure and defraud the association, or some other body corporate or natural person. Now, if in addition it be necessary to the commission of the offense of willfully misapplying the funds of the bank that they should have come previously into the possession of the defendant in his official capacity, so that he could be said to have been intrusted with their possession, all distinction between the offenses of willfully misapplying the funds and of embezzlement would disappear. But it is evidently the intention of the statute not to use the words "embezzle" and "willfully misapply" as synonymous. In order to misapply the funds of the bank it is not necessary that the officer charged should be in actual possession of them by virtue of a trust committed to him. He may abstract them from the other funds of the bank unlawfully, and afterwards criminally misapply them; or by virtue of his official relation to the bank he may have such control, direction and power of management as to direct an application of the funds in such a manner and under such circumstances as to constitute the offense of willful misapplication. And when it is charged, as in the counts of this indict-[333] ment, that he did willfully misapply certain funds belonging to the association, by causing them to be paid out to his own use and benefit in unauthorized and unlawful purchases, without the knowledge and consent of the association, and with the intent to injure it, it necessarily implies that the acts charged were done by him in his official capacity, and by virtue of power, control and management which he was enabled to exert by virtue of his official relation. This, we think, completes the offense intended by the statute: of a willful misapplication of the moneys and funds of a national banking association. We therefore answer the third question in the negative.

4. The fourth question is whether it is necessary, in charging the defendant with aiding and abetting Sylvester T. Fuller, the cashier of the bank, with the misapplication of its funds, to charge that the defendant then and there knew that said Fuller was such cashier. We answer this question in the negative. The counts in question charge Fuller with having made the misapplication of the funds of the bank as cashier. They further allege that the defendant, being president and agent of the association, willfully, knowingly, and unlawfully, and with intent to injure said banking association, before the misdemeanor was committed, "did aid, abet, incite, counsel and procure the said Sylvester T. Fuller, he, the said Fuller, then and there being cashier and agent as aforesaid, so as aforesaid to wrongfully, unlawfully, and willfully misapply," etc. We do not think it is necessary, in an indictment for this offense, to charge any scienter more distinctly. The acts charged against Fuller could only be committed by him by virtue of his official relation to the bank; the acts charged against the defendant likewise could only be committed by him in his official capacity. Both are alleged to be officers of the same corporation. The knowledge that each had of the official relation of the other is necessarily implied in the co-existence of this official relation on the part of both towards the same corporation. It is as cashier that Fuller was aided and abetted by the defendant in the commission of his offense. This allegation necessarily imputes knowledge of his official character.

5. The second count of the indictment is for [334]
the offense of abstracting the moneys and funds of the association. In substance it charges that the defendant was president and agent of the Second National Bank of Jefferson, theretofore duly organized and established, and then existing and doing business, under the laws of the United States; and that the defendant, being president and agent as aforesaid, did then and there "willfully and unlawfully, and with intent to injure the said national banking association, and without the knowledge and consent thereof, abstract and convert to his, the said Stephen A. Northway's, own use certain moneys and funds of the property of said association, of the amount and value," etc. We see no reason to doubt the sufficiency of this description of the offense. It is true that the word "abstract," as used in this statute, is not a word of settled technical meaning like the word "embezzle" as used in statutes defining the offense of embezzlement, and the words "steal, take and carry away," as used to define the offense of larceny at common law. It is a word, however, of simple, popular meaning, without ambiguity It means to take or withdraw from; so that to abstract the funds of the bank, or a portion of them, is to take and withdraw from the possession and control of the bank the moneys and funds alleged to be so abstracted. This, of course, does not embrace every element of that which under this section of the statute is made the offense of criminally abstracting the funds of the bank. To constitute that offense, within the meaning of the Act, it is necessary that the moneys and funds should be abstracted from the bank without its knowledge and consent, with the intent to injure or defraud it or some other company or person, or to deceive some officer of the association, or an agent appointed to examine its affairs. All these elements are contained in the description of the offense in the count in question; the count is, therefore, sufficient within the decisions of this court upon similar statutes. U. S. v. Mills, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 138 [8: 636]; U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360 [24: 819]; U. S. v. Carll, 105 U. S. 611 [26: 1135]; U. S. v. Britton, supra.

Unlike the word "misapply" as used in the [335] same section, the word "abstract" is not ambiguous, because it does not appear from other parts of the statute that there are two or more kinds of abstracting, both unlawful, but only one described as a criminal offense. The word "abstract," as used in the statute, therefore, has but one meaning, being that which is attached to it in its ordinary and popular use. It is to be accepted with that meaning in framing an indictment under the section, which is not required, in order to be sufficient, to contain more than those allegations which are necessary, when added to the allegation of abstracting, to complete the description of the offense intended by the statute. This the count in question sufficiently does.

It is contended, however, on behalf of the defendant, that the offense of "abstracting" the moneys and funds of the bank under this section of the statute is exactly equivalent to the offense of larceny, and that it can only be technically and appropriately described by the words used to describe the offense of larceny;

so that the charge should have been "did abstract, take, and carry away." The answer to this point, it seems to us, is twofold. If, as is contended, an analysis of the section of the statute demonstrates that the legislative intent was simply to describe the offense of larceny by an officer or agent of the bank of its funds, then there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in using the word "abstract" in the indictment, as used in the statute, fully to describe the offense charged; for, according to the argument, it can mean nothing else, and the Legislature, by substituting the word "abstract" for the words which are required technically to describe the offense of larceny, have justified the use of the same word in the indictment. But, in the next place, we do not admit the proposition that the offense of "abstracting" the funds of the bank under this section is necessarily equivalent to the offense of larceny. The offense of larceny is not complete without the animus furandi, the intent to deprive the owner of his property; but under section 5209 an officer of the bank may be guilty of "abstracting" the funds and money and credits of the bank without that particular intent. The statute may be satisfied with an intent to injure or defraud some other [336] company, body politic or corporate, or individual person, than the banking association whose property is abstracted, or merely to deceive some other officer of the association, or an agent appointed to examine its affairs. This intent may exist in a case of abstracting without that intent which is necessary to constitute the offense of stealing. We answer the fifth question, therefore, in the affirmative.

6. The sixth question is whether the indictment sufficiently states that the Second National Bank of Jefferson was organized under the National Banking Act, or to carry on the business of banking under the laws of the United States. The language of the indictment is that the defendant "was then and there president and agent of a certain national banking association; to wit, 'The Second National Bank of Jefferson,' theretofore duly organized and established and then existing and doing business at the Village of Jefferson and County of Ashtabula, in the division and district aforesaid, under the laws of the United States."

We do not understand the necessity of this question; the allegation seems to be perfectly explicit. The defendant is charged by virtue of his office as president and agent of a national banking association; to wit, the Second National Bank of Jefferson, which, it is further alleged, had been theretofore duly organized and established and was then existing and doing business under the laws of the United States. This can mean only that it was organized and established as a banking association under the Act of Congress authorizing the organization and establishment of national banks, and that it was in existence and doing business at the time of the alleged offense as such national banking association, because it could not be organized and established and existing and doing business under the laws of the United States in any other capacity. This question is accordingly answered in the affirmative. These answers will be accordingly certified to the Circuit Court.

Marine Corps.

1. The Marine Corps is a military body primarily belonging to the Navy, and under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, but liable to be ordered to service in connection with the Army.

2. The Act of March 3, 1883, providing for a credit for the actual time of service in the Army or Navy, includes services rendered by a member of the Marine Corps.

[No. 1026.]

Submitted Jan. 3, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 21 Ct. Cl. 20. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and E. P. Dewees, Assistant Attorney, for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [250]
the court:

The plaintiff brought her suit as administratrix of the estate of George Dunn, her husband, who died on the 29th of September, 1884, to recover the difference between what was paid her and what she claimed should have been paid on account of his service as gunner in the Navy from the 11th day of April, 1878, until the 10th day of December, 1883. The court of claims gave her a judgment for $2,238.10. This judgment was rendered upon the following finding of facts:

"1. George Dunn, the claimant's intestate, was appointed a gunner in the Navy, April 11, 1871, and served as such until January 1, 1883. He was subsequently retired, and has since died.

"2. Prior to his appointment in the Navy, he had served in the Marine Corps. He entered this corps first, June 10, 1843, in the eleventh year of his age as a boy, bound for ten years and twenty-two days, to learn music, and June 22, 1844, was rated as a fifer; discharged September 8, 1848.

"Re-enlisted September 9, 1848, for four years; discharged June 8, 1849, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, as a minor.

"Re-enlisted August 10, 1849, for four years, as a fifer; discharged June 9, 1853.

"On the same day, to wit, June 9, 1853, he re-enlisted for four years, as a fifer; discharged April 1, 1854, under a surgeon's certificate.

"Re-enlisted August 31, 1854, for four years, as a fifer; discharged February 24, 1857, under a surgeon's certificate.

"Re-enlisted May 19, 1857, for four years, as a fifer; discharged September 1, 1862, under a surgeon's certificate.

"The time of actual service from his first enlistment, June 10, 1843, to his last discharge September 1, 1862, amounts to sixteen years five months and twenty-six days.

"3. Between the dates of his first enlistment [251] and September 8, 1853, he served on board United States vessels of war, under the command of navy officers, for five years and two months.

"Where and under what command the remainder of his service was rendered does not appear.

"Conclusion of Law.

"Upon the foregoing findings of facts the court decides as conclusion of law:

"That the sixteen years five months and twenty-six days of service, shown in finding 2 to have been rendered by claimant's intestate as an enlisted man in the Marine Corps, should be credited to him in calculating longevity pay under the Act of March 3, 1883. 22 Stat. at L. 473.

"By so crediting this service the claimant is entitled to recover the sum of $2,288.10."

The controversy arises upon the construction to be given to the following clause in the Act making appropriation for the naval service, passed March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 473. Section 1 of that statute makes provision for the payment of the officers of the Navy, of which George Dunn, the plaintiff's intestate, was one at that time. After reciting the officers, clerks, and other persons, including naval cadets, whose compensation is embraced in the aggregate sum of $300,000, the section uses this language: "And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay, held by such officer since last entering the service."

The plaintiff asserted that in adjusting her claim for her husband's service with the accounting officers of the department she was entitled to the benefit of this provision on account of the service found to have been rendered by him in the second subdivision of the facts as found by the court. These accounting officers refused to make this allowance because, [252] as they said, the services thus rendered were in in the Marine Corps and not in the Army or Navy.

It must be conceded that the Marine Corps, a military body in the regular service of the United States, occupies something of an anomalous position, and is often spoken of in statutes which enumerate "the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps," or "the Army and the Marine Corps," or "the Navy and the Marine Corps," in a manner calculated and intended to point out that it is not identical with either the Army or the Navy. And this argument is the one very much pressed to show that service in the Marine Corps is not service in the Army or in the Navy. On the other hand, the services rendered by that corps are always of a military character, and are rendered as part of the duties to be performed by either the Army or the Navy. If there are services prescribed for that corps by the Statutes of the United States, or the regulations of either the Army or the Navy, which are not performed in immediate connection with the Army or the Navy, and under the control of the heads of the Army or Navy, either civil or military, we have not been made aware of it. The military establishment of this country is divided by the general laws of the United States into the Army and the Navy, and over each of these one of the great heads of departments, called secretaries, is appointed to preside, to manage and to administer its affairs. The administrative functions of the Executive are mostly under the President, distributed and allotted among the seven great departments, at the head of each of which is a minister for that department. Such is the theory of the distribution of executive administration established by the Statutes of the United States.

The Marine Corps is a military body, designed to perform military services; and while they are not necessarily performed on board ships, their active service in time of war is chiefly in the Navy, and accompanying or aiding naval expeditions. In time of peace they are located in navy yards mainly, although occasionally they may be used in forts and arsenals belonging more immediately to the Army. The Statutes of the United States, in prescribing the duties which they may be required to perform, have not been very clear in [253] any expression which goes to show how far these services are to be rendered under the control of the officers of the Navy or of the Army. It is clear that they may be ordered to service in either branch; but we are of opinion that, taking all these statutes and the practice of the Government together, they are a military body, primarily belonging to the Navy, and under the control of the head of the naval department, with liability to be ordered to service in connection with the Army, and in that case under the command of army officers.

Section 1599 of the Revised Statutes of the United States enacts that no person under twenty or over twenty-five years of age shall be appointed from civil life as a commissioned officer of the Marine Corps until his qualifications for such service have been examined and approved under the directions of the Secretary of the Navy; and section 1600, immediately following, provides that all marine officers shall be credited with the length of time that they have been employed as officers or enlisted men in the volunteer service of the United States. Sections 1613, 1614, 1615 and 1616 very clearly place the non-commissioned officers, musicians, or privates of the Marine Corps under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, with reference to their performance in the Capitol grounds, or the President's grounds, and with reference to their rate of pay and their rations. Section 1621 declares that the Marine Corps shall at all times be subject to the laws and regulations established for the government of the Navy, except when detached for service with the Army by order of the President, and when so detached, shall be subject to the rules and articles of war prescribed for the government of the Army. Section 1623, which relates to the retirement of officers with rank and pay, enacts that, in the case of an officer of the Marine Corps, the retiring board shall be selected by the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President. Two fifths of the board shall be selected from the medical corps of the Navy, and the remainder from the officers of the Marine Corps.

It seems to us that these provisions of the Revised Statutes, bringing together the enactments of Congress on the subject of the Marine [254] Corps, show that the primary position of that body in the military service is that of a part of the Navy, and its chief control is placed under the Secretary of the Navy, there being exceptions, when it may, by order of the President, or some one having proper authority, be placed more immediately, for temporary duty, with the Army, and under the command of the superior army officers.

This view of the subject was taken by this court in the case of Wilkes v. Dinsman, 48 U. S. 7 How. 89 [12: 618]. Dinsman was a private in the Marine Corps under Commodore Wilkes in the exploring expedition, and his term of service having expired he entered into a contract for re-enlistment to serve until the return of the vessel. The Act which authorized his re-enlistment applied to seamen and to service of anybody enlisted for the Navy. Dinsman was subjected to severe discipline by the orders of Commodore Wilkes, for which he brought this suit in the nature of an action of trespass, and alleged that after the expiration of his service he was not lawfully re-enlisted, as he was not a seaman when enlisted for the Navy, by reason of his being in the Marine Corps. The court examined into this question and held that he belonged at that time to the Navy, saying, among other things: "Though marines are not, in some senses, 'seamen,' and their duties are in some respects different, yet they are, while employed on board public vessels, persons in the naval service, persons subject to the orders of naval officers, persons under the government of the Naval Code as to punishment, and persons amenable to the Navy Department. Their very name of 'marines' indicates the place and nature of their duties generally. And beside the analogies of their duties in other countries, their first creation here to serve on board ships expressly declared them to be a part 'of the crews of each of said ships.' Act of March 27, 1794, 1 Stat. at L. 350, § 4. Their pay was also to be fixed in the same way as that of the seamen (§ 6, p. 351). So it was again by the Act of April 27, 1798, 1 Stat. at L. 552. And they have ever since been associated with the Navy, except when specially detailed by the President for service in the Army. * * * Thus paid, thus serving, and [255] thus governed like and with the Navy, it is certainly no forced construction to consider them as embraced in the spirit of the Act of 1837 by the description of persons 'enlisted for the Navy.'"

And referring to the Act of June 30, 1834, the provision of which is found in section 1621 of the Revised Statutes, "that the said corps shall at all times be subject to and under the laws and regulations which are or may hereafter be established for the better government of the Navy," the opinion says that this strengthens the conclusion of the court, and that that corps thus in some respects became still more closely identified with the Navy.

Whatever view may be taken it cannot be considered as a distinct military organization, independent of the departments of the Army and Navy and under the supervision and control of neither of them, having no superior outside of its own officers, except the President. Such a position is at war with the whole policy of the distribution of power among the executive departments as we have already shown; and while it may be true that it is not so exclusively a part of the Navy as ships and navy yards are, yet its general supervision and control remain with the Navy Department.

We think that the Act of 1883, under which this suit is brought, providing for a credit for the actual time of service in the Army or Navy, or both, is comprehensive enough to include the services of George Dunn, recited in the second finding of the court, as they must have been rendered either in the one or the other—either in the Army or the Navy—and if rendered in either, or part in one and part in the other, they still entitle the claimant to receive compensation on the basis of services coming within the statute.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

THE STEAM TUG L. P. DAYTON, Her Tackle, etc., H. McKAY TWOMBLY, Claimant; THE STEAM TUG JAMES BOWEN, Her Tackle, etc., DANIEL SHEA, Claimant; AND THE FLOAT OR SCOW Called "NO. 4," HUGH J. JEWETT, Receiver, etc., Claimant.

(See S. C. "The L. P. Dayton," Reporter's ed. 337-353.)

Collision between two tugs—libel against both to recover damages for injury to tow—burden of proof—no presumption against either tug—a tug not a common carrier—pleading.

Upon a libel against two tugs, filed to recover damages resulting to a tow by reason of a collision between said tugs, it is held that the undisputed facts did not constitute a prima facie case against both tugs; that the burden of proof was upon the libelant to establish a case of negligence against each of the tugs separately and independently; that the tow was not in the position of a vessel at anchor, but was so far identified with its own tug as to be bound by the fault, if any, of the latter; that, as respects the other tug, the same burden of establishing the fault charged against it rests upon the libelant as the law would impose upon its own tug if she were the libelant; that, as between the tow and its tug, the contract of towage involves a responsibility for loss upon the tug only by reason of the want of ordinary care; that, upon the face of the pleadings, the question of where the fault lies is indeterminate, there being no presumption against either tug; that the burden of proof is not changed because the facts of the case and the causes of the collision are peculiarly within the knowledge of the respondents; and that one of the answers does not affirmatively show negligence and a violation of the rules of navigation.

Argued Jan. 21, 24, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reported below, 18 Blatchf. 411, 418. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case fully appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward D. McCarthy and Charles M. Da Costa, for appellant:

That both these tugs should have been condemned is a necessary legal deduction from the following admissions: that the collision was the result of want of ordinary care, or rather of gross negligence; that the respondents were actors, and that the libelant was a passive sufferer.

What the law presumes, to wit, that the actors had knowledge of all the facts in which they participated, each one of them here admits, by charging fault against the other.

The law also presumes that the libelant was ignorant of the facts leading up to the collision.

This presumption is always made in behalf of bailors against care takers; and it is on this presumption that carriers and depositaries are uniformly required to assume the burden of proof, at suit of their bailors.

A vessel tied as ours was is to be considered as cargo.

The Alabama and The Gamecock, 92 U. S. 697 (23: 764); The Johnson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 151 (19: 610); Sproul v. Hemingway, 14 Pick. 1; Sturgis v. Boyer, 65 U. S. 24 How. 110 (16: 591).

It can make no difference that in any case the fault has been committed by one person, or by many; by one vessel or by two. It is no reason why an innocent sufferer should not recover for his loss that it has been conferred upon him by two or more persons on whom the blame necessarily falls.

Neither is it any reason for dismissing his libel, that he cannot show whether one of the actors is more to blame than the other, or how much either is to blame; or, indeed, that one of them is not altogether blameless.

It is enough to say that there has been a wrong done, which should be redressed by those who, apparently, have contributed to it.

A perfect cause of action is made out in the admission of wrong on one side, and of helplessness on the other.

Admiralty courts have consistently apportioned the loss in all cases of insorutable fault.

The Scioto, 2 Ware, 360; The Nautilus, 1 Ware (2d ed.), 531; 1 Bell, Com. 627.

"A vessel in tow and without fault is to be regarded as sustaining the same relation to the collision which is sustained by the cargo.

The Alabama and The Gamecock, and The Johnson, supra.

For the purpose of this argument it is sufficient to treat The Dayton merely as a bailee for hire, responsible only for the exercise of ordinary care. Still she bore the peculiar relationship to our barge of custodian and care taker, a species of bailment which imposed all the obligations of a common carrier, who has declined to be liable for risks not arising from his own negligence.

Against common carriers with notice, the common law presumes that a loss is attributed to the fault of the bailee, unless he shows that it is due to some excepted risk.

Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. 12 How. 272 (13: 985); Canfield v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 93 N. Y. 532.

Against wharfingers and warehousemen, also held for ordinary diligence only, the weight of proof is with the bailee to show the absence of fault, if the thing bailed is lost, injured or destroyed in the ordinary course of business.

Platt v. Hibbard, 7 Cow. 500; Lichtenhein v. Boston & Prov. R. R. Co. 11 Cush. 72; Mackenzie v. Cox, 9 Car. & P. 632; Logan v. Mathews, 6 Barr, 417; Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts, 335.

Even mere mandataries, gratuitous bailees, have frequently been held to proof of diligence, where the subject of bailment has been lost or injured in their hands.

Beardsles v. Richardson,* 11 Wend. 26; Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 Ad. & El. 256; Story, Bailm. § 213.

Messrs. Joseph F. Mosher and James E. Carpenter, for appellee, claimant of The L. P. Dayton:

The onus is upon the libelant to show negligence as against The L. P. Dayton, either presumptively or by direct proof.

This would be true, even if the libelant based his claim on a towage contract made for a valuable consideration. The owner of a towboat performing towage service is not a common carrier, nor even a bailee of the tow; he is only bound to reasonable skill and care.

Transportation Line v. Hope, 95 U. S. 297 (24: 477); The Margaret, 94 U. S. 494 (24; 146); The Webb, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 406 (20: 774); Wells v. Steam Nav. Co. 2 N. Y. 204.

The burden is always upon him who alleges the breach of such a contract, to show that there has been negligence or unskillfulness, to his injury, in its performance.

The Webb, supra; The Brazos, 14 Blatchf. 446.

But the gist of the claim here, as well against The Dayton as against the other vessels, is negligence.

The tug is liable to the tow for a disaster of this kind, to the same extent as she would have been to a third and strange vessel injured by her negligence, and to no greater degree.

The Brooklyn, 2 Ben. 547; The Deer, 4 Ben. 352–355.

In order to prevail in a libel for damages resulting from alleged negligence, the libelant must do more than show or establish that his own vessel was free from blame. He must further show that the loss was occasioned by the fault of those in charge of the other vessel which he seeks to make responsible.

Indeed it is now held in England that the burden of proof is not on the claimant, even when he sets up matter strictly in justification, or by way of excuse, until a prima facie case of negligence is shown.

The Marpesia, L. R. 4 P. C. 212; The Abraham, 2 Asp. N. S. 34; The Benmore, L. R. 4 Adm. 182.

On the pleadings no negligence on the part of The L. P. Dayton is admitted or shown, and there is nothing to shift the burden of proof to that tug.

The mere fact that the collision occurred without fault of the libelant, while his boat was in charge of our tug, does not raise any presumption that this tug was in fault.

Mr. William D. Shipman, for claimants Shea and Jewett, Receiver.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Thomas McNally, filed his libel in a cause of collision, civil and maritime, against the steam tug L. P. Dayton, the steam tug James Bowen, and the float or scow called No. 4, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. The second article of the libel sets out the cause of action as follows:

"2. Heretofore; to wit, on the fourteenth day of February, 1879, the boat or barge Centennial, of the burden of about 300 tons, of which boat your libelant was master, was taken in tow by the steam tug L. P. Dayton at the pier foot of Fifty-Ninth Street, New York Harbor, [338] to be towed by the said tug to the Erie basin, near Atlantic docks, New York Harbor. She was taken at or about five and one-half o'clock in the afternoon of that day. She was loaded with a valuable cargo; to wit, six thousand four hundred and fifty bushels, or thereabouts, of red wheat. She was then staunch and seaworthy. When The L. P. Dayton left Fifty-Ninth Street pier she had in tow four boats or barges, of which the boat Centennial was one; these were placed two on the port side of the said tug and two on her starboard side. The Centennial was the inside starboard boat—that is, the one lashed to the starboard side of the tug Dayton. The Centennial was a boat one hundred and three feet in length, and when fastened to the tug, as aforesaid, her bow projected some twenty feet beyond the bow of the said steam tug. The evening was quite clear and starlit. The tug and tow being made up as aforesaid proceeded down the river, the tide being ebb, until about opposite Eagle pier, Hoboken, when the tug put into shore and there left one of the boats that had been fastened to her port side.

"After the port boat had been left at the Eagle pier as aforesaid, the tug, with the remaining three boats, resumed her course, proceeding down the river. When about opposite Pier 1, North River, and when about three hundred yards from the New York shore, the said boat Centennial was run into by the float or scow called Number Four, which was then in tow of the steam tug James Bowen, and received such injuries that she very soon thereafter sunk with her cargo. At the time of the collision darkness had set in, and your libelant is unable to speak of his own knowledge with entire accuracy of the movements of the vessels aforesaid. But he is informed and believes the truth to be as follows, that is to say:

"Before the collision aforesaid the steam tug James Bowen, having the float or scow Number Four lashed to her port side, was proceeding from some point on the East River to the Long Dock, Jersey City. She had rounded the Battery, and at the time of the collision was on a course opposite or nearly opposite the course then being taken by the tug L. P. Dayton, and [339] her tow. Through the carelessness of both of the persons in charge of The L. P. Dayton and of The James Bowen and the scow, the said tows were not kept clear of each other, though there was ample space of water in which to have done so, but were so negligently handled that the float or scow aforesaid bore right down on and struck full on her stem the boat Centennial, staving in her whole bow and causing her to sink in about ten minutes.

"Your libelant and his son were on board The Centennial at the time of the collision, but it was not possible for them to do anything to prevent the same. The Centennial was entirely under the control and subject to the direction of the tug boat L. P. Dayton, having neither propelling nor steering power of her own.

"Your libelant alleges that both the steam tugs aforesaid were in fault in the following respects:

"First. Neither tug boat observed the signals of the other, the observation of which might have and would have prevented danger.

"Second. Neither tug boat made use of the proper signals for avoiding a collision in time to avoid the same.

"Third. The tug boat Bowen did not reverse her movement, or did not do so in time to prevent a collision.

"Fourth. Neither tug boat was provided with a suitable and competent watch at and before the time of the collision.

"Fifth. The tug boat James Bowen improperly changed her course before the collision, having put her wheel to port and made an effort, apparently, to pass under the bows of The Dayton and her tow.

"But your libelant alleges, in general, negligence against both the said tugs, and requires them to make definite answer of the facts pertinent to the collision, which will clearly show either that both were equally to blame, or to blame in unequal degree, though neither entirely free from blame; but, for the reasons above mentioned, your libelant's boat, The Centennial, was in nowise to blame or responsible for the collision aforesaid."

And also alleged negligence against the steam tugs in addition, as follows:

"That on the night and at the time of the collision the tide was a strong ebb; that the tug [340]
Bowen and her tow were proceeding against the tide; and that it was negligence in her not to have kept more to the westward than she did, and thereby have avoided the tug Dayton and her tow, as might easily have been done had the proper care been used in observing The Dayton's lights and signals.

"And, further, that the said tug Bowen and her tow kept too near the New York shore in rounding the Battery and making up the North River.

"That the tug Bowen was also negligent in respect of not having a proper light set on her port side, or in permitting the same to be covered and obscured by certain cars or carriages at that time on the deck of the float, which was on her port side.

"That the tug Bowen was also negligent in not answering the signals of the tug Dayton when they were approaching each other.

"That the tug Dayton was at fault in proceeding at too great a speed, the tide being a strong ebb and the wind northwest.

"That the tug Dayton was likewise negligent in not having a proper light set on the extreme starboard and forward end of her tow.

"That the person in charge of the wheel of

The Dayton at the time of and before the collision was unfit for such duty, being a man of near and imperfect sight, and generally incompetent.

"That the tug Dayton, after twice blowing her whistle, did not keep on her course, but ported her wheel and went to starboard, showing her red light to The Bowen and the float before reversing and attempting to back.

"That neither The Dayton nor The Bowen had a watchman or lookout on her forward deck."

Hugh J. Jewett, Receiver of the Erie Railway Company, claimant of the float or scow called No. 4, filed his answer on her behalf, in response to the charges of the libel. It was admitted, however, that no cause of action ap-341] peared against the scow No. 4, both in the courts below and upon the argument in this court. It is, therefore, not necessary to consider the answer filed on its behalf.

Daniel Shea intervened as owner of the tug James Bowen, and answered the charges of the libel as follows:

"Third. That this respondent has no knowledge of the matters contained in the second article of said libel preceding the allegation in the said article contained, to the effect that the boat Centennial was run into by the float or scow Number Four, and he therefore neither admits nor denies the same, but leaves the libelant to make such proof thereof as he may be advised; that, so far as the allegations of the said article relate to the collision between the said boat Centennial and the float or scow called Number Four, which occurred on the 14th day of February, 1879, and the causes thereof, this respondent, upon information and belief, denies the said allegations of said article, and each and every of them, except so far as the same are hereinafter expressly admitted.

"And this respondent, upon information and belief, says that the facts in respect to said collision and the causes thereof are as hereinafter stated, and not otherwise, that is to say:

"On the evening of the 14th day of February, 1879, at about half past six o'clock, the said steam tug James Bowen, at Williamsburg, in the waters of the East River, took in tow the said float or scow Number Four, the said float or scow being lashed to the port side of said tug James Bowen, and the said tug James Bowen, with the said float or scow in tow as aforesaid, proceeded down the East River, bound for Long Dock, Jersey City; that the tide was ebb, the wind moderate from northwest; that the said tug James Bowen and the said float or scow were both staunch, properly manned and equipped; that the said tug was provided with a bright headlight on the forward end of her house, and with red and green lights on her port and starboard sides respectively, and with two white lights on the flagstaff aft, and that the said float was provided with a white headlight near the bow, all of said lights being properly placed and burning brightly; that the said tug James Bowen was provided with a
342] competent pilot and lookout, properly placed on the tug, and that a lookout was also stationed forward on the roof of the float or scow; that the said tug James Bowen, with the said float or scow in tow as aforesaid, proceeded down the East River to the Battery, and on rounding the Battery into the North River encountered considerable ice, and in consequence was running very slow; that after getting clear of the ice the said tug, with the said scow in tow as aforesaid, was headed for the Jersey City abattoir. At this time there was outside of the said float, and about one hundred feet distant from the port side thereof, the steam tug W. H. Vanderbilt, with two barges in tow astern on a hawser; that said tug W. H. Vanderbilt, with her said tow, was proceeding in the same direction and at a little faster rate of speed than The James Bowen; that after the said James Bowen, with the said scow or float in tow, had gotten into clear water and was heading as last aforesaid, a boat was discovered by her pilot coming down the river with a tow, which subsequently turned out to be The L. P. Dayton; that at the time the said approaching tug and tow were discovered the green light of the tug L. P. Dayton was visible, and she appeared to those in charge of and navigating the tug James Bowen, including the lookout on the float, to be going to the eastward, between the said James Bowen and the New York shore, which was then about three hundred yards distant. At a proper distance the pilot in charge of The James Bowen blew two blasts of his steam whistle, to which the approaching tug, L. P. Dayton, responded with two blasts of her whistle, and the pilot in charge of the said James Bowen thereupon put his wheel to starboard, heading as close to the westward as could safely be done without danger of colliding with the tug W. H. Vanderbilt or the barges in tow thereof, which were, as before stated, on the port side of the said float, heading in the same direction; that notwithstanding the signal which had been given by The James Bowen, and which had been answered by The L. P. Dayton, the pilot of the said L. P. Dayton, instead of keeping his course or putting his wheel to starboard so as to pass the said James Bowen on her starboard side, so changed his course as to shut out his green light and bring his red light in view of those navigating The [343]
James Bowen; that thereupon, it being evident that the said tug L. P. Dayton could not cross the bow of The James Bowen and of the said float in tow thereof without imminent danger of collision, the pilot in charge of The James Bowen immediately rang his bells to slow, stop, and back; that said signals were promptly answered by the engineer of The James Bowen, and that at the time of the collision the heading of The James Bowen and of the float in tow thereof was about stopped, and that those in charge of the said L. P. Dayton and the canal boats or barges in tow thereof so navigated the same that the bow of the canal boat or barge on the starboard side of The L. P. Dayton was brought into collision with the bow of the said float or scow Number Four with such force as to break the tow line from the said scow or float Number Four to The James Bowen, and to crush in the bow of the said barge or canal boat on the starboard side of The L. P. Dayton, and that, as this respondent is informed and believes, the said barge or canal boat was the barge or canal boat called The Centennial in the libel in this cause mentioned, and that in consequence of said collision the said barge or canal boat Centennial subsequently sank; that the place where the said collision occurred was about opposite Pier 1, North River, and from three hundred to three hundred and fifty yards from the head of said pier.

"And this respondent, upon information and belief, says that the said collision was in no way occasioned by any fault on the part of the said float or scow Number Four, or of the said tug James Bowen, or of those in charge thereof, but was occasioned by and due wholly to the fault of those navigating and in charge of the said tug L. P. Dayton and the said barges or canal boats in tow thereof in the following respects:

"1. That the pilot in charge of the tug L. P. Dayton and of the said canal boats in tow thereof, including the said Centennial, was not a competent person for the purpose, being a man of near and imperfect sight and generally incompetent.

[344] "2. That The L. P. Dayton, at the time of the said collision, while navigating the waters of the Hudson River and engaged in towing canal boats or barges, failed and omitted to have white lights placed in the extreme outside of the tow on either hand.

"3. That the pilot in charge of the said tug L. P. Dayton and the canal boats or barges in tow thereof, after having received and answered the signal of two blasts from the steam whistle of The James Bowen, instead of keeping to the eastward and passing the said James Bowen on her starboard side, improperly changed his course so as to cross the bows of the said James Bowen, thereby bringing the bow of the said canal boat Centennial into collision with the said float or scow Number Four.

"4. That the said tug L. P. Dayton, when danger of collision became imminent, did not in season reverse her engine, so as to prevent a collision.

"5. That the said tug boat L. P. Dayton was not provided with a suitable or competent lookout, properly stationed at and before the time of the collision.

"6. That the said tug L. P. Dayton was also negligent in proceeding at too great a rate of speed, the tide being ebb and the wind from the northwest.

"7. That the said tug L. P. Dayton, after twice blowing her whistle as aforesaid, did not keep on her course, but ported her wheel and went to starboard, showing her red light to The James Bowen and the said float before reversing and attempting to go back.

"And this respondent, upon information and belief, says that the said collision was in no way due to any fault on the part of the said scow or float Number Four, or of the said tug James Bowen; and upon information and belief he denies each and every allegation in the said libel and in the supplement filed thereto contained, charging or imputing any fault or negligence whatever to the said float, or those in charge thereof, or the said tug James Bowen, or those in charge thereof, and each and every allegation in the said libel contained respecting the said collision, except as hereinbefore expressly admitted."

[345] Arthur B. Twombly, as surviving partner of Whitney & Twombly, intervened as owner of the steam tug L. P. Dayton, and answered the libel as follows:

"Second. This respondent admits that on the 14th day of February, 1879, the boat Centennial, of the burden of about 300 tons, and of which the libelant was master, was taken in tow by the steam tug L. P. Dayton, at the pier foot of Fifty-Ninth Street, New York, to be towed to the Erie basin, at about half-past five o'clock P. M., and that she was loaded with a cargo of wheat, of the quantity of which he is not informed, nor is he informed whether the said boat was then staunch and seaworthy, but leaves the libelant to make such proof in reference thereto as he shall be advised.

"He admits that when The Dayton left Fifty-Ninth Street pier she had in tow four boats, two on each side, and that The Centennial was the inside starboard boat; that she was one hundred and three feet in length, and that her bow projected some twenty feet beyond the bow of the steam tug L. P. Dayton; that the evening was clear and starlit and the tide ebb, and that the tug landed one of the boats that had been on her port side at the Eagle pier, Hoboken, and that she thereafter pursued her course with the remaining three boats, and that when about opposite or a short distance above Pier No. 1, North River, and about three hundred yards from the piers on the New York shore, The Centennial was run into by the scow Number Four, which was then in tow of the steam tug James Bowen, and received such injuries that she sank with her cargo.

"And he admits that the said scow was lashed on the port side of The James Bowen and that said tug and scow were proceeding from a point in the East River to the Long Dock, Jersey City, and that at the time of the collision she was on a course opposite or nearly opposite the course then being taken by The L. P. Dayton and her tow.

"He denies that it was through any carelessness of the persons in charge of The L. P. Dayton that said tows were not kept clear of each other.

"He admits that The Centennial was under the control and subject to the direction of The [346] L. P. Dayton, having neither propelling nor steering power of her own.

"And as to the various allegations of fault on the part of The L. P. Dayton, he denies the same and each one of them.

"And as to the allegations in said libel in respect to the damages sustained by the libelant, he has no knowledge and leaves the libelant to his proof thereof.

"And he further avers that said tug L. P. Dayton was wholly without fault which caused or contributed to said collision, and the same was wholly caused by fault of those on board and in charge of the said tug James Bowen and said scow Number Four, as alleged in said libel.

"And he alleges that the tug L. P. Dayton was well and properly manned and had the requisite lights set and burning brightly according to law, and that the tow was in all respects properly made up; that the two tugs were approaching in such a way that the proper course was for each to pass on the starboard side of each other, and that the proper measures were taken by said tug L. P. Dayton to pass in that manner and the proper signals were blown, but that said tug James Bowen failed to give heed to said signals and to take proper measures to pass on the starboard hand of said tug L. P.

Dayton and the boats in her tow, but so negligently navigated as to bring the said scow against the said boat Centennial and also the boat on the port side of The L. P. Dayton."

The case was heard in the district court on the pleadings without testimony, and a decree was passed dismissing the libel. 10 Ben. 490. On appeal to the circuit court, the case was again submitted on the pleadings alone, when the same decree was rendered. 18 Blatchf. 411. The present appeal is from that decree, and presents the single question of law whether upon the pleadings, without testimony, there is error in that decree.

The ground on which the circuit court proceeded is that, as the libel alleges negligence and fault in various particulars as against the tug L. P. Dayton and the tug James Bowen, [349] which is denied in the several answers of the respective claimants, in opposition to which the libelant has proven no negligence or fault on the part of either, the libel must be dismissed, as the burden of proof lies upon the libelant to establish a case of negligence against one or the other, or both of the respondents, and that this burden of proof is not changed or shifted by reason of any allegations of fault contained in the answer of either respondent as against the other. On the other hand, it is contended on the part of the libelant that while it is true that each of the defendants denies the negligence charged against it, yet both the answers show that the loss must have been occasioned by the fault of one of the defendants; and that being so the law casts upon each defendant the burden of making good its allegations of fault against the other, in order to exonerate itself.

The proposition is stated by one of the counsel for the appellant, in his printed argument, as follows: "A vessel, without propelling or steering power, lashed to the side of a tug, is sunk as the result of a collision between such tug and another one. In a libel filed by the tow against both tugs to which answers are interposed, in neither of which is negligence causing or contributing to the collision attributed to the tow, and by which each tug seeks to exculpate itself and inculpate the other, a prima facie case of negligence arises, without the necessity of proving the specific acts of negligence by either or both tugs; and the decree to be entered in favor of the libelant, either against one tug alone, or against both, is dependent entirely upon the nature of the evidence which it is incumbent upon the tugs to produce in order to determine, as between themselves, the issues so made by them by their respective answers."

The propriety and soundness of this rule is supposed in argument to rest upon two general grounds: 1. It is contended that the tow which was injured by the collision is in the same category, as respects both tugs, as that of a vessel at anchor injured by a collision with a moving vessel, where the burden of proof is upon the latter to show that it was without fault, or that the disaster was the result of fault on the [350] part of the complaining party. 2. That where it appears, as in the present case, that the tow, being helpless as to its own navigation, was without fault on its part, and it is manifest, from the circumstances appearing on the pleadings, that the collision was caused either by the fault of one or the other of the tugs, or was the result of inevitable accident, the burden of proof rests upon each to establish such facts as excuse it. The argument is that such a disaster could only occur from fault of navigation, or from that vis major which is styled inevitable accident; that by the supposition the appellant is free from fault; that consequently it must be that either there was fault on the other side or inevitable accident, in either of which cases it is incumbent upon the respondent affirmatively to establish its excuse.

It is also contended for the appellant that if the truth of the general rule must be admitted, that he who seeks judicially to establish a claim based upon an alleged default of his adversary must affirmatively establish by proof the facts which justify his complaint; and that the burden of proof, as a principle of general jurisprudence, is assumed by the plaintiff, unless the cause of action is confessed or admitted judicially by the defendant; yet, it is also true, that if the defendant accompanies a general denial of the alleged cause of action with the admission of such facts as in law constitute his liability, the plaintiff's case is in fact admitted without other proof; and that, in this aspect, the libelant was entitled to a decree below on the basis of certain admissions of fact in each of the answers inconsistent with the general denials of fault.

In our opinion, the burden of proof was upon the appellant to establish a case of negligence against each of the tugs separately and independently. The rule which presumes fault in a case of collision against a vessel in motion in favor of one at anchor does not apply. In the present case, the tow which was injured was not at rest, as respects either of the tugs. As against The Bowen, the movement and navigation of the tow was under the control and management of The Dayton; and in a suit against The Bowen, the tow can have no other or greater rights, and no other or better standing in court, than would The Dayton have had in case the collision had been directly with her, because [351] the tow in such a suit is identified with its own tug, so far, at least, that she cannot escape the consequences if the collision was caused wholly or in part by the fault of that tug. The Civilta and The Restless, 103 U. S. 699 [26: 599]; Sturgis v. Boyer, 65 U. S. 24 How. 110 [16: 591]; The J. H. Gautier, 5 Ben. 469; The Cleadon, Lush. 158.

It follows, therefore, that as respects The Bowen, the same burden of establishing the fault charged against it rests upon the libelant in this case, as the law would impose upon The Dayton if she were the libelant prosecuting for damages on its own behalf, as to which there could be no question.

As between the tow and its tug, The Dayton, the contract of towage involves a responsibility for loss upon the tug only by reason of the want of ordinary care; for a tug is not a common carrier, and does not insure the safety of its tow. In some cases the facts of the collision, as admitted in the pleadings, might constitute a prima facie case of negligence, which would impose upon the tug the duty of explanation and exoneration; but no such presumption of fault arises in the present case. Here there was a collision between the tow of one tug and the tow of another, which may have been caused by a fault of navigation upon the part of one or both of the tugs. Each charges fault against the other. As the matter stands, it is indeterminate, being a mere matter of controversy to be adjudged between them upon proof of all the circumstances. In favor of the injured tow, the libelant in this case, there is no presumption of fault as against either nor against both jointly. There is no presumption against The Bowen for the reason we have already stated; and there is none against The Dayton, because on her behalf all the alleged negligence is denied, and the contrary allegations of the libel cannot be legally maintained merely by corresponding allegations in the answer of The Bowen. To hold otherwise would require that in every case, as between the tow and its tug, the latter should be required affirmatively to establish its defense against the presumption of its negligence. There is no ground in reason or authority for making such an exception to the general rule, which requires the plaintiff, in the first instance, to establish by proof the allega-[352] tions of its complaint. It does not tend to establish such an exception that it appears by the record that one or the other of the respondents must have been so in fault as to be liable for the consequences. It still remains that there is a controversy as to which of the two is guilty, and no decree can pass without affirming the liability of one or both. That affirmation must stand upon proof, unless it appears on the record which one of the two is at fault, or that both are.

Neither is it material that the facts of the case and the causes of the collision are peculiarly within the knowledge of the respondents. It is alleged in the present case, as one of the inconveniences of the libelant's situation, that it would be compelled, in order to establish the allegations of the libel, to resort to the testimony of those navigating the respective tugs, and thus call witnesses interested to exonerate the vessel to which they were attached. We are not aware, however, of any ground on which such an inconvenience can affect the rule of law which governs the rights of the parties. And perhaps it is counterbalanced by the corresponding interest on the part of each set of witnesses to fix the fault upon the opposing vessel.

It is further argued on the part of the appellant that it was entitled to a decree below, as against The Bowen, on the ground of admissions, in the answer filed on its behalf, affirmatively showing negligence and a violation of the rules of navigation tending to produce a collision. This aspect of the case was disposed of by the circuit court in the opinion of Mr. Justice Blatchford, which we adopt, as follows:

"It is urged for the libelants that the answer of The Bowen shows that she had The Dayton on her starboard side, with the courses of the two vessels crossing so as to involve risk of collision, and that, therefore, under Rule 19 of section 4233 of the revised Statutes, it was the duty of The Bowen to keep out of the way of The Dayton, and, as she did not, a prima facie case of negligence is thus made out against her by her answer. This is an error. The facts stated in the answer of The Bowen do not show that the courses of the two tugs were crossing when The Bowen discovered The Dayton. On the contrary, the green light of The Dayton [353] was then visible to The Bowen, and not her red light, and The Dayton appeared to be going between The Bowen and the New York shore, to the eastward, and in a direction which would cause her green light to still be visible to The Bowen, and her red light to be still invisible. This would insure safety and no collision; and to insure it still more The Bowen blew two whistles, and The Dayton answered with two whistles. After that The Bowen starboarded. Even if—before so starboarding, and while so starboarding—The Bowen is to be considered as having the Dayton on her starboard side, with the courses of the two vessels crossing (which is by no means clear on the averments in the answer of The Bowen), her answer shows that she took proper measures to keep out of the way of The Dayton; and that such measures were assented to at the time by The Dayton as proper, and that then The Dayton changed her course and went across the bow of The Bowen. Under these circumstances The Bowen slowed, stopped, and backed.

"The answer of The Bowen states substantially that there was imminent danger of collision if she kept on. There is nothing in all this to show negligence in The Bowen. When The Dayton so came suddenly across the bow of The Bowen, a case was not made within Rule 19, although in that position The Bowen had The Dayton on her starboard side, and their courses were crossing; and even if it were, the answer shows that The Bowen did all she could to keep out of the way of The Dayton.

"The libel, so far from alleging that it was a fault in the Bowen to slow, stop, and back, alleges, as a fault in her, that she did not reverse, or did not do so soon enough. The isolated fact of her slowing, stopping, and backing cannot be taken away from the connection in which it is found in the answer and separated from the circumstances under which the answer states it occurred, particularly as the libel states distinctly that it was a fault in her not to reverse." 18 Blatchf. 411, 418.

Decree affirmed.

v.

SAMUEL B. MARTIN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 366-375.)

Public lands—indemnity school lands in California—construction of the Act of March 1, 1877—classes of defective selections.

1. The Act of March 1, 1877, "relating to indemnity school selections in the State of California," ratified all lists of such selections before certified to that State by the United States, however defective or insufficient such certificates might have been, if the lands included in such lists did not fall within section 4 of the Act, and if they had not been preempted in good faith prior to the date of the certificate.

2. In the case presented, the land in question was selected by the agent of the State in 1862. The State, in 1863, issued a certificate of purchase to the defendant in error; in 1870, it was listed to the State by the United States Government, and in 1871 the State patented it to defendant in error. Said land was embraced in the exterior boundaries of a valid Mexican grant, but was not embraced within the surveys of said grant, or within the patent issued to the claimants. In 1876 plaintiffs in error entered as preemption settlers. In an action brought by defendant in error to recover possession, held: that the land was not open to preemption settlement when plaintiffs in error entered into possession; that, since the acceptance by the claimants under the Mexican grant of their patent, there has been no one who could dispute the title of the State or its grantees, except the United States; that it is immaterial that the state selection was bad when made, as it was good when presented, there being no intervening rights of third parties; and that, if the title of the defendant in error was defective because of the invalidity of the original selection, such defect was cured by the Act of March 1, 1877.

Submitted Jan. 24, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Mullany, for plaintiffs in error:

Defendant in error has no right or title to the land in controversy; his state patent is void, and he has, consequently, no right to the possession of the land.

While the land was held and claimed under the Mexican grant, the officers of the United States Land Department had no authority or jurisdiction to list it to the State, or dispose of it in any other way, in advance of the satisfaction of the claim of the Mexican grant under which it was held.

10 Stat. at L. 246; Van Reynegan v. Bolton, 95 U. S. 36 (24: 352); Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 92 U. S. 733 (23: 634); Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761 (23: 769); Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 552; Riley v. Heisch, 18 Cal. 198; Cornwall v. Culver, 16 Cal. 429.

The listing of lands to a State, by the United States land officer, which are not of the character that are subjected to be listed, "shall be perfectly null and void."

10 Stat. at L. 346.

The land not having been listed, the State took nothing by its patent to defendant in error.

Chant v. Reynolds, 49 Cal. 217; Churchill v. Anderson, 53 Cal. 212.

The location of the land by the agent of the State, and the issuance of the state certificate of purchase, took place before the land was surveyed, and were therefore void proceedings, even if it be assumed that the land was not held or claimed under the Mexican grant.

Chant v. Reynolds, 49 Cal. 214; Medley v. Robertson, 55 Cal. 396; Finney v. Berger, 50 Cal. 248.

A confirmation may make a defeasible estate good, but cannot work upon an estate that is void, or, more properly speaking, cannot confirm a title where there is no title to be confirmed.

Mr. E. D. Wheeler, for defendant in error:

The title of the defendant in error was perfected by operation of the Act of Congress of March 1, 1877.

The land in controversy was not open to preemption, because it was not unoccupied land, being at the time of the entry of plaintiffs in error in the possession of the defendant in error, holding under a state patent.

Davis v. Scott, 56 Cal. 165; McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 64; Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513 (24: 732); Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575 (24: 1130); Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251 (25: 626).

Even if the land was subject to preemption, the plaintiffs in error did not comply with the requirements of the statute upon the subject.

The defendant in error was entitled to a judgment in his favor on the ground of prior possession alone.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [367]

This was a suit brought by Samuel B. Martin, the defendant in error, on the 20th of March, 1878, in the District Court of Contra Costa County, California, against Martin Durand and Anthony Thompson, the plaintiffs in error, to recover the possession of the E. ½ sec. 18, T. 2 S., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo meridian. The facts found at the trial were in brief these:

The land in dispute was agricultural land, and it was located by the locating agent of California on the 20th of October, 1862, at the request and in the name of Martin, in lieu of the E. ½ sec. 16, T. 22 S., R. 6 E., of the same meridian. In making this selection, which was for indemnity school lands, the agent acted under color of the authority of section 7 of the Act of March 3, 1853, chap. 145, 10 Stat. at L. 247. This township twenty-two has never been surveyed by the United States, and the east half of section 16 is within the boundaries of a Mexican grant known as San Miguelito, confirmed to one Gonzales, the final survey of which was approved in 1859, and the lands afterwards patented to Gonzales or his assigns.

On the second of March, 1863, the State of California issued a certificate of purchase to Martin for the land in dispute. On the 8th of September, 1870, it was listed to the State by the United States Government, and, on the third of February, 1871, it was patented by the State to Martin under his certificate of purchase. The plat of the United States survey of township two, embracing the land, was filed in the United States land-office in San Francisco on the 10th of June, 1865.

On the 10th of April, 1839, the Mexican Government granted to José Noriega and Robert Livermore a tract of land known as Las Pocitas. The claim under this grant was confirmed on the 14th of February, 1854, by the land commissioners appointed under the Act of March 3, 1851, chap. 41, 9 Stat. at L. 631, and afterwards, on appeal, by this court, at December Term, 1860. [368] After the decision of the land commissioners, a deputy surveyor, under instructions from the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, made a survey which purported to show the boundaries of the claim confirmed, and this survey was approved by the surveyor-general May 7, 1864, but nothing further appears to have been done under it. In March, 1869, after the decree of confirmation by this court, the surveyor-general caused the claim so confirmed to be again surveyed and designated, and this survey was approved by him May 11, 1870, by the Commissioner of the United States General Land-Office March 1, 1871, and by the Secretary of the Interior June 6, 1871. On the 20th of August, 1872, the United States issued a patent to Noriega and Livermore, their heirs and assigns, for the land so surveyed and designated in March, 1869. The land now in dispute was embraced within the exterior boundaries of the grant adjudged to be valid by the decree of the board of land commissioners affirmed by this court, but was not embraced within the surveys of 1854 or 1869, or in the patent issued to Noriega and Livermore.

On the 16th of May, 1876, Thompson entered into the possession of the south half and Durand into the possession of the north half of the half section in dispute. When these entries were made Martin was in possession of the land, though it was not then, nor had it ever been, fully inclosed or fenced. Within a few days afterwards Martin notified Thompson that he claimed to own the land under a patent from the State of California, which he exhibited; but, notwithstanding this, both Thompson and Durand maintained actual and exclusive possession, and kept Martin out until this suit was brought. Each of the parties entered for the purpose of availing himself of the preemption laws of the United States, having the necessary personal qualifications therefor. They each made application at the proper land-office to perfect their respective claims, but the officers refused to permit them to do so. Upon this state of facts the Supreme Court of California affirmed a judgment of the district court in favor of Martin, and to reverse that decision this writ of error was brought.

[369] Upon the facts as found we have no hesitation in deciding that the title of Martin, under his patent from the State of California, was perfect when his suit was brought, and that the judgment in his favor was right. The land in dispute had not only been selected by the State as indemnity school lands, and certified or listed as such by the proper officer of the United States, when Durand and Thompson made their respective entries as preemption settlers, but it had been patented to Martin and he was in actual possession under color of that title. These are facts specially found by the court below, and the evidence on which this finding was made cannot be considered here. Such being the case, the land was not open to preemption settlement as against Martin when Durand and Thompson entered on his possession. Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U.S. 513 [24: 732]; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251, 256 [25: 626, 628]; Mouser v. Fletcher, 116 U.S. 381 [29: 598].

If the title of Martin was ever at all defective it was because, at the time of the selection, the land was within the boundaries of a claim under a Mexican grant, and therefore not then, in a strict legal sense, public land; but the United States has never objected to the title of the State because of this. On the contrary, after a survey had been made and approved by the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, which excluded the land from the grant, the proper officer of the United States listed it to the State under the Act of August 3, 1854, chap. 201, 10 Stat. at L. 346, now section 2449 of the Revised Statutes, as indemnity school lands which had been properly selected, and from that day to this, so far as the record shows, the United States has never disputed the title of the State or its grantee. This survey was made in 1869, the claim having been finally confirmed in 1860. As the survey was not made until more than ten months after the Act of July 23, 1866, chap. 219, 14 Stat. at L. 218, "To quiet land titles in California" had become operative, its approval by the surveyor-general had the effect, under the ruling of this court in Frasher v. O'Connor, 115 U. S. 102 [29: 311], of opening all lands within the exterior boundaries of the grant, but outside of those fixed by the survey, to selection or preemption entry as public lands, subject only to a defeat of title, if in the end the survey as [370] made should be set aside and the boundaries of the grant finally extended so as to include the selection or the entry. In the present case, however, the survey was accepted by the owners of the grant and a patent taken for the land within its boundaries, in full satisfaction of their original claim as confirmed by the commissioners and by this court. This was in 1872, and from that time certainly there has been no one, according to this record, who could dispute the title of the State or its grantee except the United States. The owners of the Mexican grant abandoned their claim to the excluded land when they accepted their patent, and no one could enter upon the land by the laws of the United States as a preemption settler, because Martin was in the actual possession under his claim of title. It is not contended that this title of Martin is even technically defective, unless it be for the reason that the selection was actually made when the land was not in law public land. But when the Commissioner of the General Land-Office in 1870 certified this with other land to the State as land which had been selected as indemnity lands, it was an existing selection at that date, and there were no intervening rights to prevent its operation as such. By accepting the certificate the State treated the selection as a valid selection existing at the time of the certificate, and the list thus certified operated under the Act of 1854 as a transfer of the title from the United States to the State which immediately inured to the benefit of Martin under his patent. It is true that the certificate of the commissioner to a list of lands which were not open to selection at the time they were selected, nor at the time they were certified, would not pass title out of the United States because he had no authority in law to make such a certificate. But the case is quite different when the State presents for certification as an existing selection one that was bad when made, but good when presented. Under such circumstances, if the rights of no third parties have intervened, there is nothing to prevent the commissioner from treating the selection as if made on the date of its presentation, and certifying accordingly. His certificate is of selections claimed by the State at the time of its date, and if the State had a [371] right to the title under the circumstances existing then, it was within his official authority to make the transfer. It is a matter of no moment that the selection was bad at the time it was made, if at the time of its presentation for title it was good, and there were no intervening rights to be injured by reason of its acceptance and ratification by the United States.

This would be sufficient to sustain the title of Martin if there were nothing more. But there is more. All must agree that, even if the title was defective because of the invalidity of the original selection, it was within the power of the United States to cure such a defect by a release to the State or its grantee of all their interest in the land remaining after the lists were certified by the Commissioner of the Land-Office, provided no other person had in the meantime acquired rights superior to those of Martin. This, we think, was done by the Act of March 1, 1877, chap. 81, 19 Stat. at L. 267, "relating to indemnity school selections in the State of California." That Act is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the title to the lands certified to the State of California, known as indemnity school selections, which lands were selected in lieu of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, lying within Mexican grants, of which grants the final survey had not been made at the date of such selections by said State, is hereby confirmed to said State in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, for which the selections were made.

"Sec. 2. That where indemnity school selections have been made and certified to said State, and said selections shall fail, by reason of the land in lieu of which they were taken not being included within such final survey of a Mexican grant, or are otherwise defective or invalid, the same are hereby confirmed, and the sixteenth or thirty-sixth section, in lieu of which the selection was made, shall, upon being excluded from such final survey, be disposed of as other public lands of the United States; Provided, That if there be no such sixteenth or thirty-sixth section and the land certified therefor shall be held by an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, such purchaser shall be allowed to prove such facts before the proper land-office, and shall be allowed to purchase the same at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, not to exceed three hundred and twenty acres for any one person; Provided, That if such person shall neglect or refuse, after knowledge of such facts, to furnish such proof and make payment for such land, it shall be subject to the general land laws of the United States. [372]

"Sec. 3. That the foregoing confirmation shall not extend to the lands settled upon by any actual settler claiming the right to enter, not exceeding the prescribed legal quantity under the homestead or preemption laws: Provided, That such settlement was made in good faith upon lands not occupied by the settlement or improvement of any other person, and prior to the date of certification of said lands to the State of California by the Department of the Interior; And provided further, That the claim of such settler shall be presented to the register and receiver of the district land-office, together with the proper proof of his settlement and residence, within twelve months after the passage of this Act, under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.

"Sec. 4. That this Act shall not apply to any mineral lands, nor to any lands in the City and County of San Francisco, nor to any incorporated city or town, nor to any tide, swamp or overflowed lands.

This statute was, in our opinion, a full and complete ratification by Congress, according to its terms, of the lists of indemnity school selections which had been before that time certified to the State of California by the United States as indemnity school selections, no matter how defective or insufficient such certificates might originally have been, if the lands included in the lists were not of the character of any of those mentioned in section 4, and if they had not been taken up in good faith by a homestead or preemption settler prior to the date of the certificate. The history of the times, which is exemplified by the facts of this case, shows that such must have been the intention of Congress. Almost from the beginning many of the titles under these indemnity selections had been in doubt because of the delay which attended the settlement of Mexican claims, and the records of this court contain a large number of cases in which claimants under the preemption and homestead laws of the United States have sought to establish their titles, as against purchasers from the State under indemnity selections who had been many years in possession, because of some real or supposed defect in the title of the State. This statute was passed twenty-three years after the original grant to the State of the right to select indemnity lands for lost school sections, and more than fourteen years after the lands now in dispute had been selected by the State under this grant and sold to Martin. Eight years before the statute the proper officer of the United States had made a certificate which, if authorized by law, transferred an absolute estate in fee simple to the State that inured at once to the benefit of Martin. This certificate had never been disputed by the United States, and no attempt had ever been made by anyone in authority to set it aside. This, as we know from our own records, is but one of many cases of a similar character, and read in the light of these facts the statute has to us no uncertain meaning. [373]

In its first section all such certificates are expressly confirmed where the only objection to their validity is that a selection was made before the Mexican grant within which the original school section was actually situated had been surveyed, and the survey finally approved. In this class of cases the State was entitled to its indemnity lands, and the United States in effect formally waived any and all irregularities in making the selections.

In the second section cases were provided for in which the selection failed: 1, because the school section in lieu of which indemnity was claimed and taken was not actually within the limits of a Mexican grant; and 2, because it was "otherwise defective or invalid." This language is certainly broad enough to include every defective certificate; and, in order that the United States might be protected from loss, it was provided that, if the sixteenth or thirty-sixth section, in lieu of which the selection

[374] was made, should be found outside the Mexican grant, the United States would accept that in lieu of the selected land, and confirm the selection. If, however, there was no such sixteenth or thirty-sixth section, and the land certified was held by an innocent purchaser from the State for a valuable consideration, such purchaser would be allowed to purchase the same from the United States at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres for any one person.

The statute relates only to such selections as had been certified to the State, and, taken as a whole, it meets the requirements of all the cases of defective selection which could be so certified. These are: 1, cases where the State was entitled to indemnity, but the selection was defective in form; 2, cases where the original school sections were actually in place, and the State was not entitled to indemnity on their account; and 3, cases where the State was not entitled to indemnity, because there never had been such a section sixteen or section thirty-six as was represented when the selection was made and the official certificate given. As to the first of these classes, the certificate was simply confirmed because the State was entitled to its indemnity, and nothing was needed to perfect the title but a waiver by the United States of all irregularities in the time and manner of the selections. As to the second, the selection was confirmed, and the United States took in lieu of the selected land that which the State would have been entitled to but for the indemnity it had claimed and got. In its effect this was an exchange of lands between the United States and the State. And as to the third, in lieu of confirmation, bona fide purchasers from the State were given the privilege of perfecting their titles by paying the United States for the land at a specified price. Under these circumstances, it was a matter of no moment to the United States whether the original selection was invalid for one cause or another. If the State was actually entitled to indemnity, it was got, and the United States only gave what it had agreed to give. If the State claimed and got [375] indemnity when it ought to have taken the original school sections, the United States took the school sections and relinquished their rights to the lands which had been selected in lieu. And if the State had claimed and sold land to which it had no right, and for which it could not give school land in return, an equitable provision was made for the protection of the purchaser by which he could keep the land, and the United States would get its value in money. In this way all defective titles, under the government certificates, would be made good without loss to the United States.

It may be, as was claimed in argument, that when the bill was originally prepared the framer had it in mind only to provide for selections made in lieu of school sections within Mexican grants before the final survey of the grants, and for selections made in lieu of sections not finally included within the survey of a grant; but to our minds it is clear that before the bill finally became a law Congress saw that, as ample provision had been made for the protection of the United States in all cases, it was best to include all certificates which were defective, no matter for what cause, and so the words "or are otherwise defective or invalid" were added in what seemed to be the most appropriate place to carry that purpose into effect. No selection was made good unless it had been certified, and not then unless the United States got an equivalent either in land or in money, or in carrying out their original school land grant. In this way the titles of all bona fide purchasers from the State were or could be perfected without loss to the United States, and that, we have no doubt, was the intention of Congress when the statute was enacted.

It is true that Durand and Thompson had entered on the land, and had excluded Martin from the possession, before the statute was passed; but that gave them no rights either under this statute or any other. As we have already shown, their entry was of no avail under the general preemption laws; and this statute saves the rights of no homestead or preemption settlers, except such as had entered on the lands in good faith prior to the date of their certification to the State.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.

ANTHONY THOMPSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 376, 377.)

Jurisdiction—action to recover crop against one holding adversely—federal question.

In an action against a preemption settler to recover a crop raised by him on lands held adversely against the plaintiff, a writ of error to a decision of a state court put entirely on the ground that the owner of land out of possession cannot recover, from one in possession holding adversely under claim of title, crops raised by him, does not present a federal question.

[No. 167.]

Submitted Jan. 24, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California. Reported below, 68 Cal. 618, and 45 Am. Rep. 668. Dismissed.

On motion to dismiss.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Mullany, for defendant in error, in support of motion.

No brief was filed on behalf of plaintiff in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Martin the defendant in error in Durand & Thompson v. Martin, just decided [ante, 675] to recover of Thompson, one of the plaintiffs in error, a crop of wheat raised by him during the year 1878 on the land described in that case, which he took from the possession of Martin in 1876, and occupied adversely thereafter. The court has found as a fact that Martin never had possession of the crop before the commencement of this suit, and that it was raised by Thompson with his own labor and at his own expense while he held exclusive possession of the land adversely to Martin and claiming title.

From this it is clear that the question of the title to the land was not necessarily involved in this case, and on looking into the opinion, which in California forms part of the record, we find that the decision was put entirely on the ground that the owner of land out of possession cannot recover, from one in possession holding adversely under claim of title, the crops raised by him in cultivating the soil.

[377] The remedy in such a case is by an appropriate action for the recovery of the possession of the land and damages for the detention. This does not present a federal question, and the motion to dismiss is granted.

DAVID H. JEROME AND CHARLES W. GRANT, EXRS. of SARAH E. LITTLE, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 319-326.)

Wills—attempt by executors to set aside bond and mortgage to meet a certain legacy—legatees, not found.

A written instrument, made by the executors of a will, setting aside an overdue bond and mortgage to be held by them in trust to meet a certain legacy, there being no evidence of the consent of the legatees, or any order of any court on the subject, is held not to have amounted to an irrevocable act transmuting the property. The written instrument was of no greater effect than would have been a mere mental reservation.

[No. 102.]

Argued Dec. 17, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George W. Miller and James O. Smith, Jr., for appellants:

The execution of the instrument in question is an ex parte act of only two of the three executors of this will. Until ratified by all the trustees it stands as an unaccepted offer to transfer the bond and mortgage, and they continue part of the general estate.

Admitting, arguendo, that the respondents had authority to invest $4,000 for the purpose of this trust, they have not done so. They have made no investment whatever. The execution of said instrument, without the order of the court, without notice to the beneficiaries, and without their knowledge or consent, was no investment of moneys. It was not even an assignment of the securities by executors to trustees, and can no more affect the rights of the appellants than if the papers had been placed in an envelope and marked "Sherman legacy." The respondents might as well have determined in their minds to hold the bond and mortgage for purposes of this trust, as was done in Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray, 114.

The essential elements of consent by the beneficiaries, in person or by a trustee legally representing them, is wholly wanting; and without this the act of the respondents was void and the estate continues liable.

Leitch v. Wells, 48 N. Y. 585; Norman v. Storer, 1 Blatchf. 598; King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76; Slack v. Wiggin, 1 Demarest, 568.

Messrs. J. H. McGowan and Benton Hanchett, for appellees:

It was the defendants' duty, as executors under the will, to make an investment of $4,000 and pay the interest accruing from such investment to Charlotte Sherman during her life, holding the securities in their hands until her death, and then pay the principal to the legatees in remainder.

Saunderson v. Stearns, 6 Mass. 37; Dorr v. Wainwright, 13 Pick. 328; Towne v. Amidown, 20 Pick. 535; Lansing v. Lansing, 45 Barb. 182; Drake v. Price, 5 N. Y. 430; Claggett v. Hardy, 8 N. H. 147; Haddon v. Hemingway, 39 Mich. 615; Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray, 114.

It was the duty of the defendants as such executors to separate the fund from the remainder of the estate and provide for this legacy within a reasonable time.

Fowler v. Colt, 25 N. J. Eq. 202.

The investment by real estate security was the proper mode of investment.

Ackerman v. Emott, 4 Barb. 626, 636, 645; King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76, 88, 97; 1 Perry, Trusts, §§ 458, 459; Wheeler v. Perry, 18 N. H. 307.

It was proper to permit the investment already made to remain, it being believed to be good, and being secured by real estate mortgage.

Hill, Trustees, p. *361; Perry, Trusts, §§ 465, 466.

Those securities are separated from the estate, and the proceedings of the complainants should be to compel the execution of that trust by turning over the securities, or for directing the defendants to collect the security and pay the proceeds, or otherwise to account for such specific trust.

Anderson v. Earle, 9 S. C. (N. S.) 460; Anderson v. Earle, 1 Am. Prob. Rep. 472; Hill, Trustees, 214.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [320]

In 1872, Sarah E. Little, then a resident of Perry, Wyoming County, New York, died at that place, leaving a last will and testament executed August 30, 1872, and a codicil thereto, executed September 9, 1872. The will, after giving sundry money legacies, proceeded as follows: "Fourth. I give and bequeath to Charlotte Sherman the interest of four thousand dollars during the term of her natural life, and at her decease the said sum of four thousand dollars shall be equally divided between Maria Cameron, Sarah E. Morse, and James Sherman, children of C. A. W. Sherman, or so many of them as shall then be living." By subsequent articles other money legacies were given, and then followed these articles: "Twenty-second. All bequests herein contained to persons residing in New York and that to Maria Cameron, I desire paid o and the remainder as fast as the money is avai-able." "Twenty-sixth. I hereby appoint Henry N. Page my executor for carrying out the provisions of this my last will and testament, so far as they relate to parties and property in this State (in New York), and Charles W. Grant, of East Saginaw, and D. H. Jerome, of Saginaw City, Michigan, my executors for everything, so far as they relate to parties and property in the State of Michigan and elsewhere; and my executors are hereby authorized and empowered to sell and convey [321] any real estate of which I may be possessed as they shall deem for the best interest of the legatees."

On the 24th of December, 1881, the present suit in equity was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, by Charles A. W. Sherman, as administrator of Charlotte Sherman, deceased; Maria Cameron, James Sherman and Sarah E. Morse, against David H. Jerome and Charles W. Grant. The bill sets out the foregoing provisions of Little's will and states these facts: Charles A. W. Sherman is the C. A. W. Sherman named in the will. Charlotte Sherman was his wife, and died in May, 1880, and he was appointed her administrator in December, 1881. In January, 1873, the will of Little was proved before the surrogate of Wyoming County, New York, and letters testamentary were issued to Page, named in it as executor. In March, 1873, letters testamentary on the will of Little were issued by the Probate Court for Saginaw County, Michigan, to Grant and Jerome. Page, in New York, and Grant and Jerome, in Michigan, entered upon their duties as executors. In New York, Little left property not exceeding a few hundred dollars in amount, which went into the hands of Paige, and was used in defraying funeral expenses, leaving nothing in his hands with which to pay the legacies. Little left a large real and personal estate in Saginaw County, Michigan, which came into the hands of Grant and Jerome, as executors; and they have now in their hands a greater amount of the estate than is sufficient to pay to the plaintiffs their legacies and to pay all the other legacies. Grant and Jerome paid to Charlotte Sherman the interest on the $4,000 down to April 1, 1876, but nothing more has been paid on the legacies to the plaintiffs. Maria Cameron, Sarah E. Morse, and James Sherman were living at the time of the death of Charlotte Sherman, and are still living. The bill prays for an accounting by the defendants, as executors, and for the payment to the plaintiffs of the amounts due to them for the legacies.

The answer admits that a part of the estate left by Little in Michigan came into the hands of Grant and a part into the hands of Jerome.
[322] It avers that, aside from the Coats bond and mortgage hereafter mentioned, Grant has none of the estate now in his hands, and Jerome has $9,621.75, including any fees, commissions or compensation for his services. Accounts of receipts and disbursements by each defendant, as executor, are annexed to the answer. It then sets forth that the defendants believed it to be their duty to set apart and invest, out of the estate, $4,000, the interest of which, as they should be able to collect it, should be paid to Charlotte Sherman during her lifetime, and the principal be retained by them in such investment, and, after her decease, be paid over to Maria Cameron, Sarah E. Morse, and James Sherman; that for that purpose, they took out of the estate and set apart a bond executed by one Coats to Little, in the penalty of $10,000, dated May 1, 1869, conditioned to pay $1,000 May 1, 1871, $1,000 May 1, 1872, and $8,000 May 1, 1873, with interest annually on all sums unpaid at 10 per cent, and a mortgage given to secure the bond, bearing the same date, executed by Coats to Little, mortgaging a parcel of land in East Saginaw, Saginaw County, Michigan, and recorded in the office of the register of deeds for Saginaw County; that, to set apart the bond and mortgage, they, on the 20th of October, 1874, executed and acknowledged the following instrument in writing, which was recorded in the office of said register of deeds on the same day:

"Whereas, by the last will and testament of Sarah E. Little, the interest of sum of four thousand dollars is bequeathed to Charlotte Sherman for her life, and upon her decease the said sum of four thousand dollars is to be divided between parties therein named;

And whereas, among the assets of the estate of said Sarah E. Little is a bond and mortgage made by Alice L. Coats to said Sarah E. Little, dated May 1, 1869, for the sum of five thousand dollars, on which there is now due four thousand dollars, and which mortgage is recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Saginaw County, Michigan, in liber O of mortgages, on pages 824 and 825:

Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, executors of the said will, do hereby set apart for [323]
the benefit of said Charlotte Sherman, and to be held by us in trust for the purpose of paying the said interest, and upon her decease for distribution among the persons named in said will, the said bond and mortgage.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this twentieth day of October, A. D. 1874.

David H. Jerome. [L. S.]
Charles W Grant. [L. S.]

Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—

State of Michigan, } ss.
County of Saginaw, }

On this 20th day of October, A. D., 1874, before me, a notary public in and for said county, personally came the above named David H. Jerome and Charles W. Grant, to me known to be the executors of the last will of Sarah E. Little, deceased, and acknowledged the foregoing instrument by them subscribed to be their free act and deed.

Benton Hanchett, Notary Public.;"

by means whereof they set apart the bond and mortgage, as an investment in their hands, to be held by them as executors under the will, in trust, from which to collect the interest on the sum of $4,000, represented by the bond and mortgage, as principal, and pay the same to Charlotte Sherman, and to collect and receive the principal, and pay the same, in pursuance of the direction of the will, to Maria Cameron, Sarah E. Morse, and James Sherman; that they made the investment properly, and in accordance with their duty; that their action was, in effect, the same, in all respects, as if they had taken the sum of $4,000 in money and purchased a security for that amount, or had loaned that sum on security for the purpose of obtaining interest and retaining the principal to meet the payment of the legacy; that the investment was made according to the best of [324] their judgment, and in good faith; that they then believed the security was ample, and that the bond and mortgage were a desirable security for providing for the legacy; that Coats was then believed by the defendants to be worth, in her own right, the sum of at least $75,000 over and above the real estate covered by the mortgage; that they then believed also that the real estate was a good and sufficient security by itself to secure the payment of the $4,000 and interest thereon; that the money secured by the bond and mortgage was not collected from Coats, because they believed the security, as it stood, was an entirely satisfactory and altogether desirable one, and an investment as good as they could make; that on such setting apart of the security, Charlotte Sherman was informed thereof, and thereafter Grant collected from Coats, on the bond and mortgage, four sums of $200 each, which he paid to her, he having, in January, 1874, paid to her $200, all on account of her legacy; that no other sums have since been collected by the defendants on the bond and mortgage, and there is due thereon $4,000 of principal, and interest from May 1, 1876; that when the interest ceased to be paid the defendants notified Charlotte Sherman thereof, and asked her advice and direction as to foreclosing the mortgage, and since her death they have requested the advice and direction of the plaintiffs in regard to collecting the bond and mortgage, and have advised them of the setting apart of the security; that the defendants have offered, and now offer, to transfer the bond and mortgage to the plaintiffs; that they have paid $182.43 for taxes on the mortgaged land, which were a lien on it, and which should be reimbursed to them; that since the investment, Charlotte Sherman and the plaintiffs have had no right to claim payment of any part of the legacy out of the estate of Little; and that the investment has remained the sole fund out of which the legacy should be paid. The answer then admits that the amount which came into the hands of the defendants from the estate of Little was sufficient, after paying all the debts of Little, to pay the legacy to the plaintiffs, and all the other legacies payable before that legacy, according to the directions of the will, but such [325] amount and the estate was not sufficient to pay all the legacies, not including the residuary legacy. It then avers that, according to the provisions of the will, it was not their duty to pay over the $4,000 to Charlotte Sherman; and that the other legatees under the will always objected, after such investment had been made, to any other provision or payment being made out of the estate on account of that legacy.

It was stipulated by the parties that Charles A. W. Sherman was administrator of Charlotte Sherman, and that Page had not, at the time of the filing of the bill, or at any time, any funds in his hands belonging to the estate of Little, except as alleged in the bill.

The case was heard on bill and answer. A decree was made providing that the defendants, as executors, have in their hands and hold said bond and mortgage, in trust for the payment to the plaintiffs of the legacy specified in the fourth clause of the bill; that the plaintiffs are entitled to the payment of the proceeds of the bond and mortgage, after deducting therefrom the expenses of the collection thereof, and the amounts paid and to be paid by the defendants for taxes on the property covered by the mortgage, to preserve the lien thereof, and the costs of this suit; and that the defendants foreclose and collect the bond and mortgage, by proper legal proceedings, and out of the proceeds retain the necessary and reasonable costs and expenses of such foreclosure and collection, and the amounts so paid, and to be paid, by them for taxes, and their costs of this suit, and pay the balance of the proceeds to the plaintiffs in payment and discharge of the legacy. From this decree the plaintiffs have appealed.

The only question necessary or proper to be disposed of on this appeal, in view of the pleadings and of the terms of the decree below, is whether the special matter alleged in regard to the setting apart of the bond and mortgage is a defense to the suit.

At the time of the execution of the paper of October 20, 1874, the unpaid $4,000 secured by the bond and mortgage had been overdue more than seventeen months. There is no suggestion that any of the legatees named in the fourth article of the will consented to the set- [326] ting apart of the bond and mortgage, or that there was any order of any court on the subject. The fourth article gives directly to Charlotte Sherman the interest of $4,000 for life, and at her decease gives directly to such of the other three persons named as shall then be living, "the said sum of four thousand dollars," to be equally divided among them. Under these circumstances, the execution of the paper of October 20, 1874, by the defendants, setting apart the bond and mortgage to be held by them in trust, even though the paper was put on record, amounted to no more than if they had retained the bond and mortgage, without executing any such paper, and had merely made a mental resolution to consider the bond and mortgage as set apart for this legacy. There was no second party to the paper, no transfer in it, no contract, and the beneficiaries never assented to it, or ratified it, or waived their rights; and, in the absence of any such action by the beneficiaries, it was revocable at any time. Without deciding what course, if any, might lawfully have been taken by the defendants at the time in question, to effect the object they sought, we are of opinion that what they did was of no more avail to that end than the mere mental determination of the executor in Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray, 114. Even though the mental determination took the shape of a written declared purpose, it did not amount to the decisive and irrevocable act which must exist to have the effect to transmute the property.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to take such further proceedings therein as shall not be inconsistent with this opinion.

v.
CHARLES V. McADAMS, and THOMAS C. MOORE, Exrs. of JACOB HARMON, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 363-366.)

Negotiable paper—action on promissory note—unilateral agreement as a defense—what must appear.

In an action upon a promissory note, where the defendant relies on a verbal promise by the payee to release him from the payment of the principal on condition of the payment by him of a certain rate of interest during the life of the payee, it is incumbent upon him to show full performance of the condition.

[No. 1208.]

Submitted Jan. 10, 1887. Decided Feb. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The case and facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles H. Wood, and Robert Doyle, for plaintiffs in error:

An agreement to pay interest for a specified time after a note becomes due furnishes a sufficient consideration for the promise to extend time of payment. It is a further investment for a definite period for the creditor, and an extension of credit for the same time for the debtor. The legal effect of the agreement was to disable the former from enforcing the collection and the latter from paying for the period named.

Chute v. Pattee, 37 Me. 105; Fowler v. Brooks, 18 N. H. 240; Davis v. Lane, 10 N. H. 156; Wheat v. Kendall, 6 N. H. 508; Robinson v. Miller, 2 Bush (Ky.), 188; Stallings v. Johnson, 27 Ga. 564.

The facts offered to be proved show a binding contract, which the court should have enforced.

In the year 1879 the interest laws of Illinois were so changed as to make 8 per cent per annum the maximum rate of interest that could be contracted for.

Hurd, Gen. Stat. ed. 1885, chap. 74, p. 786.

The waiver of a legal right at the request of another person is a good consideration for a promise from him.

Farmer v. Stewart, 2 N. H. 101.

To constitute a consideration it is not necessary that a benefit should accrue to the promisor. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the promisee, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction.

Violett v. Patton, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 142 (3: 61).

A valuable consideration, however small or nominal, if given or stipulated in good faith, is, in the absence of fraud, sufficient to support an action on any parol contract.

Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U. S. 2 How. 427 (11: 326).

The agreement to pay interest in advance constitutes a sufficient consideration to support the contract.

Lime Rock Bank v. Mallett, 34 Me. 547; Grafton Bank v. Woodward, 5 N. H. 105; Crosby v. Wyatt, 10 N. H. 318; Abel v. Alexander, 45 Ind. 523; Redman v. Deputy, 26 Ind. 338; Flynn v. Mudd, 27 Ill. 323; U. S. v. Howell, and Harris v. Brooks, 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 4th. ed. 418, 425, notes and cases there cited.

Nor will the agreement to pay interest upon interest affect the validity of the consideration.

Montague v. Mitchell, 28 Ill. 481; Witmer v. Ellison, 72 Ill. 301; Myers v. First Nat. Bank, 78 Ill. 257; Harbert v. Dumont, 8 Ind. 346; White v. Whitney, 51 Ind. 124; Grafton Bank v. Woodward, 5 N. H. 106.

Mr. John P. Wilson, for defendants in error:

"Where an accord is relied upon it must be executed. Readiness to perform is not sufficient, nor is part performance sufficient. An accord is always to be entirely executed, and not executory in any part."

Simmons v. Clark, 56 Ill. 96, 101.

This is the law everywhere; and out of a vast number of cases which hold the general doctrine, we cite a few which are analogous in their facts to the cases at bar.

Simmons v. Hamilton, 56 Cal. 498; White v. Gray, 68 Me. 579; Hall v. Smith, 10 Ia. 45; Flack v. Garland, 8 Md. 188; Blackburn v. Ormsby, 41 Pa. 97; Cary v. Bancroft, 14 Pick. 315; Bagley v. Homan, 32 E. C. L. R. 419.

In the case at bar it was the performance of the alleged promise and not the promise itself which was to satisfy the notes. If the plaintiffs in error would pay interest so and so until the testator's death, then the notes should be canceled.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, on September 25, 1885, the plaintiffs being executors of Jacob Harmon, deceased, citizens of Indiana, and the [364] defendants citizens of Illinois. The action was founded on a promissory note signed by the defendants, dated March 1, 1875, payable one year after date to the order of Jacob Harmon, for $15,000, with interest at 10 per cent per annum from date until paid, with a proviso that if the note was collected by suit the judgment should include a reasonable fee for the plaintiffs' attorney. A copy of the note, with the indorsements thereon, was set out with the declaration, showing that the interest thereon had been paid to March 1, 1885. The plea was the general issue. The case was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs below, the judgment on which is brought into review by this writ of error.

From the bill of exceptions it appears that the following took place on the trial:

"Upon the said trial the defendants introduced proof tending to show that there was a verbal agreement between themselves and Jacob Harmon, the payee of the note, that if they would pay the interest regularly, at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, as called for by the note, until his death, they should be acquitted of the payment of the principal; in other words, that the money represented by the note was given to them upon condition that they should pay the interest thereon during the life of Jacob Harmon at the rate of 10 per cent per annum.

"The defendants also offered to prove that in the fore part of the year 1880, after the said note in suit had become due, they offered to pay Jacob Harmon the amount then due on said note, with interest, and proposed to do so, unless he would reduce the interest; whereupon, the said Jacob Harmon verbally agreed that if they would continue to pay him the interest upon the sum of money represented by said note during his life, and pay in November of each year the interest in advance for four months, or, if they failed to pay the interest in advance for four months, should pay interest upon the interest so unpaid, then the said defendants should be acquitted of and released from the payment of the principal sum of said note at the death of said Jacob Harmon, which the [365] court refused to be permitted to be proved, and the defendants then and there excepted.

"And the court being of opinion that the facts so offered in evidence by the defendants, and the said facts which the defendants offered to prove, would not make a sufficient defense at law, if proven in the said case, directed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff therein, and the verdict was taken accordingly; to all of which the defendants then and there duly excepted."

These rulings of the court are now assigned for error. In support of the assignments of error, the plaintiffs in error maintained this proposition; viz., that an agreement by the payor, after the note becomes due, to keep the money and pay interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent per annum till the death of the payee, constitutes a sufficient consideration for an agreement on the part of the payee that he will then consider the note canceled and paid, where the payor from the time of such agreement continues to pay such interest on the note until the death of the payee. This proposition should be considered in connection with the fact that in the year 1879, and therefore after the note in suit had become due, the interest laws of Illinois were so changed as to make 8 per cent per annum the maximum rate of interest that could be thereafter contracted for. Hurd, Gen. Stat. 1885, chap. 74, p. 736.

The agreement proved and that to prove which evidence was offered were both unilateral. The promise alleged was by the payee of the note, not in consideration of a promise on the part of the payor, but on condition that he perform what was to be done; viz., payment of the interest at the rate and in the mode agreed until the death of the payee. It became essential, therefore, to the defense, to establish the fact that this undertaking had been fully performed, by proof of the payment of the interest as agreed until the death of Jacob Harmon. This fact is assumed in the brief of the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, but it nowhere appears in the record. The bill of exceptions does not state when Jacob Harmon died; it does not appear elsewhere in the rec-[366] ord. All we can know from that is that he must have died before the institution of the suit, which was begun by his executors on September 25, 1885, but whether before or after March 1, 1885, we cannot infer, that being the date up to which interest was paid. If he died after that date, then the condition on which his promise could be enforced against his executors had not been fulfilled. On this point, therefore, the defense failed.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
NORMAN W. KITTSON, JAMES J. HILL, AND ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS & MANITOBA RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 303-318.)

Equity pleading—office of plea—distinction between plea and demurrer—plea as evidence—railroads—reorganization.

1. The proper office of a plea in equity is to present some distinct fact, which of itself creates a bar to the suit, or to the part to which the plea applies, and thus to avoid the necessity of making the discovery asked for, and the expense of going into the evidence at large.

2. At a hearing upon a plea, replication and proofs, no fact is in issue between the parties but the truth of the matter pleaded.

3. An objection to the equity of the plaintiff's claim, as stated in the bill, must be taken by demurrer and not by plea.

4. A plea which avoids the discovery prayed for is no evidence in the defendant's favor, even when it is under oath and negatives a material averment in the bill.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United [304] States for the District of Minnesota. Reported below, 4 McCrary, 188, and opinion published 14 Fed. Rep, 114. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a bill in equity by Jesse P. Farley against Norman W. Kittson, James J. Hill, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, which, as amended by leave of court, contained the following allegations:

That in 1876 the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill agreed together to acquire by purchase or contract, for their joint and equal benefit, all that could be obtained of the bonds of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company and the First Division of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, two corporations existing under the laws of Minnesota, and owning railroads in that State, those bonds being then outstanding and for sale at a large discount, and secured by mortgages upon the railroads; then in process of foreclosure; that the object of the agreement was to buy the railroads at the foreclosure sales, using the bonds in payment, and thereby to acquire the railroads; that it was also agreed that, in order to obtain from one Donald A. Smith and other capitalists the funds required for the enterprise, Kittson and Hill might use or give them an interest therein, but that all the interest not so used or given should be retained and held for the joint and equal benefit of the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill.

That it was further agreed between the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill that the details of the negotiations for procuring the necessary funds and for the purchase of the bonds should be principally conducted and managed by Kittson and Hill, and the persons so given an interest in the enterprise, and that the plaintiff "should furnish such facts, information and advice, and render such aid and assistance therein, from time to time, as should be required of him."

That the plaintiff "had knowledge, not possessed by any of the other parties, as to the whereabouts and situation of said bonds, the rated value thereof by the holders, the mode whereby and the channel through which the [305] same could be reached and procured; also in respect to the situation, amount, character and value of the lines of railroad and property mortgaged to secure said bonds, and in respect to the pending suits for the foreclosure of said mortgages; and that the services of the plaintiff in respect to all of said matters, and his co-operation, were indispensable to the success of said enterprise."

That thereupon Kittson procured funds from Smith and one George Stevens, and agreed to give them a share in the enterprise, the amount of which was unknown to the plaintiff, but was believed by him to be one half; and that the rest belonged to the plaintiff, Kittson and Hill in equal shares.

That, pursuant to the agreement between the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill, negotiations were opened in 1877 and carried on until 1879, resulting in the purchase of bonds amounting in the aggregate, at their face value and interest, to more than $25,000,000; and that the purchases of bonds were made by and in the name of Smith, Stevens, Kittson and Hill, but for the purpose of being used in the purchase of the railroads when offered for sale under foreclosure decrees, and under and in pursuance of the agreement between the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill.

That "Throughout said negotiations for the purchase of said bonds, and in the purchases thereof, the plaintiff was continuously called upon by the said Kittson and Hill for facts and information, advice and co-operation in respect thereto, and at their request furnished and rendered the same, pursuant to the aforesaid agreements and understandings between them; and that said negotiations were only successful through and by means of the advice and co-operation of the plaintiff, and the facts and information peculiarly within his knowledge as aforesaid, and imparted by him to the said Kittson and Hill, at their request, under said understandings and agreements."

That most of the purchases of bonds were made under an agreement with the holders that they should not be paid for till the railroads were sold under decrees of foreclosure, and that the sellers of the bonds should then have the option of being paid in cash, or of taking new [306] bonds issued by a company to be organized by the purchasers, and secured by mortgage upon the same property.

That nearly all the bonds were owned in Holland, and that one John S. Kennedy was agent of a large majority of the bondholders, with full authority to take such action in respect to them as he thought best, and was a trustee in all the mortgages, except one for $15,000,000 on the First Division of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad, and was the agent of the holders of more than $11,000,000 of the bonds secured by that mortgage; and that all the foreclosure suits had been commenced by his order, and were prosecuted under his general control and direction.

That the plaintiff "was appointed receiver of the property of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, and was made general manager of the lines of road of the First Division of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, under the trustees in said mortgages in possession thereof, upon the recommendation and at the instance and request of said Kennedy."

That after the agreement between the plaintiff and Kittson and Hill, and before the decrees of foreclosure, and before the purchase of any of the bonds, and while negotiations were pending for the purchase of the bonds represented by Kennedy, "The plaintiff informed the said Kennedy of his said interest and connection with the said Kittson and Hill in the project for the purchase of said bonds; and that the said Kennedy had full notice and knowledge that he was so connected therewith and interested therein, and fully approved and sanctioned the same;" that the negotiations for the purchase of the bonds were mainly had with Kennedy as agent of the bondholders, and the bonds purchased were placed in the hands of Kennedy and his partner, one Barnes, to be held until paid for as agreed, and were so held, and only delivered upon being so paid for; and that Kennedy strongly recommended the bondholders to sell their bonds upon the terms offered by Smith, Stevens, Kittson and Hill, as the best disposition of them that could be made.

That "To all inquiries made by said Kennedy, or any of the trustees in said mortgages, or [307] by any of the holders of any of the bonds secured thereby, or by anyone interested in the property under his charge as manager or receiver, he [the plaintiff] at all times gave full and true answers and information to the best and utmost of his knowledge and ability, and kept the said Kennedy fully informed of all facts, matters and things coming to his knowledge affecting said property, and in all things acted honestly and in good faith towards all persons interested in the property under his control as receiver and manager as aforesaid."

That the defendant Railway Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota in May, 1879, by Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens, for the purpose of taking, holding and managing the mortgaged railroads, for the use and benefit of the parties interested in the purchase of the bonds; and that those four persons were directors and officers of this Company and had control of it.

That in March and April, 1879, foreclosure decrees were entered in the pending suits, directing the sale by auction of the mortgaged railroads, and allowing outstanding bonds to be taken in payment for an amount equal to what they would be entitled to by way of dividends under those decrees; that in May and June, 1879, the railroads were sold accordingly, and, by direction and procurement of Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens, purchased by the defendant Railway Company, for the use and benefit of the parties interested in the purchase of the bonds as aforesaid, including the plaintiff, and all the bonds purchased were then used in payment; that the defendant Company paid nothing for the railroads, but took them without consideration, except the consideration furnished and provided by the plaintiff and Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens, which consideration, aside from the bonds, was furnished by Smith and Stevens as aforesaid; that property worth in all over $15,000,000 was thereby vested in the Company, for the use and benefit of the plaintiff and Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens, in proportion to their respective interests; and the Company had notice at the time of the purchase that the plaintiff was jointly interested with Kittson and Hill.

[308] That the defendant Company in June, 1879, issued and negotiated new bonds to the amount of $3,000,000, secured by mortgage of the railroads, and with these bonds paid for all the bonds purchased as aforesaid, and all other expenses of the enterprise; and had since, under the control and management of Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens, held and operated the railroads and made large net profits.

That the capital stock of this Company was $15,000,000, which represented the property acquired, and was part of the profits resulting from the enterprise; that other profits amounting to many hundred thousand dollars had also been divided between Kittson, Hill, Smith and Stevens; and that a large amount of stock had been distributed among them, of which Kittson and Hill received 57,646 shares, being part of that to which the plaintiff, Kittson and Hill were entitled under the arrangement with Smith and Stevens, but that the Company neglected and refused to deliver any of the stock to the plaintiff.

That Kittson and Hill never questioned, but always admitted, the plaintiff's right to share equally with them, until after the organization of the defendant Company in May, 1879, and then at first only suggested to him that his share ought not to be equal to theirs, because they had, as they claimed, been required to advance some money in carrying out the enterprise; but now the defendants, confederating to defraud the plaintiff, refused to account with him, or to deliver to him any stock, or to pay him any of the profits of the enterprise, and ignored and disregarded all his rights in the premises.

The bill prayed for a discovery, for an account, and that the plaintiff be adjudged to be entitled to an equal share with Kittson and Hill in the enterprise and its profits; and they be ordered to pay and turn over to him one third of the moneys, bonds and stocks received by them; and the Railway Company be ordered to issue to him his proportion of stock, and to recognize his rights in its stock and property as equal to those of Kittson and Hill; and for further relief.

To this bill the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company demurred for want of equity, and Kittson and Hill filed a plea.

The plea, after setting out with particularity [309] the various issues of bonds, secured by mortgages, by the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, and by the First Division of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, and the appointment of successive trustees under those mortgages; and alleging that, upon a bill filed in 1873 by Kennedy and others, on behalf of all the bondholders under a mortgage of $15,000,000 on the first of those railroads, Farley was appointed by the court, on August 1, 1873, receiver of that railroad, and accepted the trust, and took possession of and managed the road from that date until it was sold and delivered to the defendant Railway Company under a decree of foreclosure, as stated in the bill; that on October 9, 1876, Kennedy and two others, as trustees, under and pursuant to mortgages on the second of those railroads, took possession of it; and that from that date until it was delivered to the purchaser under a decree of foreclosure, those trustees held and operated it, and Farley was the general manager of it for them, and had full control of the management thereof; continued and concluded as follows:

"That the said plaintiff never at any time informed the said Kennedy, nor any of the holders of any of said mortgage bonds, of his interest in the project for purchasing said bonds, or of his interest in the project of acquiring by means of said bonds the said mortgaged property, which he alleges in his bill of complaint; nor did the said Kennedy, nor any of said bondholders, know, suspect or have any information or belief, at any time until after the confirmation of all said foreclosure sales, that the plaintiff ever claimed to have any such interest, or any interest in said projects, or either of them.

"And these defendants say that as receiver of said lines covered by said $15,000,000 mortgage the said plaintiff could not lawfully make the agreement with these defendants mentioned in the bill of complaint, or engage in the enterprise, therein mentioned, of purchasing the bonds of said $15,000,000 issue, or in the enterprise of purchasing the said mortgaged property; and that the making of such an agreement and the embarking in such an enterprise by him was a breach of trust on his part as such receiver, and a fraud on the holders of the bonds of said $15,000,000 issue, and [310] was a fraud upon this court, whose receiver he was.

"And that as general manager for the trustees in said mortgages of the lines of railroad of said First Division Company the said plaintiff occupied a position of trust and confidence toward his employers, the said trustees, and towards the holders of the bonds secured by said mortgages; and that by making the agreement and engaging and continuing in the enterprise of purchasing the said bonds and said mortgaged property mentioned in his said bill, the said Farley was guilty of a breach of trust towards and a fraud upon the said trustees and the said bondholders.

"And these defendants say that by reason of the said fiduciary positions occupied by the plaintiff, as aforesaid, he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to enforce as against these defendants any of the agreements mentioned in said bill or any rights claimed by him and growing out of said agreements.

"Therefore these defendants do plead all and singular the matters aforesaid in bar to the plaintiff's said bill, and pray the judgment of this honorable court whether they should be compelled to make any further answer to the said bill, and pray to be hence dismissed, with their reasonable costs and charges in this behalf most wrongfully sustained."

Annexed to the plea were a certificate of counsel, that it was in their opinion well founded in point of law; and an affidavit of the defendant Hill, that the plea was true in point of fact, and was not interposed for delay, and that the defendant Kittson was absent from the State and District of Minnesota.

The plaintiff filed a general replication to the plea, and on his motion the demurrer of the Railway Company and the plea of Kittson and Hill were set down for hearing. The demurrer of the Company was overruled, and on its application it was ordered that the plea of Kittson and Hill should stand as the joint and several plea of all the defendants.

The case was then heard upon the bill, plea, replication and proofs. The only evidence introduced was a stipulation in writing, of counsel, [311] that the averments of the plea, preceding those above quoted in full, were true; the bill on which the plaintiff was appointed receiver; an order passed by the court on that bill on May 31, 1878, reciting that Stevens, Smith, Kittson and Hill, under an agreement between them and the bondholders, dated March 18, 1878, were the equitable owners of $11,400,000 of the $15,000,000 issue of bonds, and authorizing Farley as receiver to finish the roads with money to be supplied by them; and the deposition of the plaintiff, the substance of which was, that before the completion of the purchase of the bonds he informed Kennedy by a letter (which could not be found) that Kittson and Hill had offered him an interest in it, in answer to which Kennedy, on February 25, 1878, wrote him a letter (which he produced), acknowledging the receipt of his letter, and saying: "We think it will pay you to take an interest with Kittson and Hill, and we are glad to hear that they have offered it to you;" but that the plaintiff did not disclose to Kennedy that he had already the same interest that Kittson and Hill had, because he had agreed with them that he would not make the fact public, for fear that the stockholders might hear of it and apply to the court to have him removed and another receiver appointed, to the detriment of the enterprise, and of the interests of the bondholders; and that he did not inform the court of his interest when the order of May 31, 1878, was made.

The circuit court, assuming it to be proved that the plaintiff informed Kennedy of his interest, yet held that the agreement of the plaintiff with Kittson and Hill was unlawful and void, and on that ground sustained the plea and dismissed the bill. 4 McCrary, 138.

The plaintiff appealed to this court.

Messrs. Henry D. Beam, George F. Edmunds and Edward D. Cooke, for appellant.

Messrs. George B. Young, William M. Evarts and H. R. Bigelow, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

A brief abstract of the pleadings will help to make clear what is presented for decision upon this record. [312]

The suit was brought by Farley to enforce an agreement by which he and the defendants Kittson and Hill agreed to purchase, for their joint and equal benefit, the bonds, secured by mortgages, of two railroads, of one of which he was receiver, by appointment of the court, and of the other of which he was the general manager, by appointment of the trustees named in the mortgages.

The bill alleged the making of the agreement; that its object was, by means of the bonds so purchased, to purchase the railroads at sales under decrees of foreclosure in suits then pending; that it was agreed that Kittson and Hill should conduct the negotiations for procuring the necessary funds and purchasing the bonds, and the plaintiff should furnish such facts, information and advice, and render such assistance, from time to time, as should be required of him; that the plaintiff had knowledge, not possessed by the other parties, as to who held the bonds and at what rate, and how they could be procured, and as to the nature and value of the railroads, and as to the pending suits for foreclosure, and his services and co-operation were indispensable to the success of the enterprise; that he performed the agreement on his part; that Kittson and Hill obtained the requisite funds from other persons, and purchased the bonds from the bondholders through one Kennedy, the authorized agent of the latter, and afterwards purchased the railroads at sales under decrees of foreclosure; that pending the negotiations for the purchase of the bonds, the plaintiff informed Kennedy of his interest and his connection with Kittson and Hill in the project to purchase them; that the plaintiff at all times, to the best of his knowledge and ability, gave full and true answers and information to all inquiries made by Kennedy, or by any of the trustees or bondholders, or by any person interested in the property under his charge as receiver and as manager, and kept Kennedy fully informed of all matters coming to his knowledge affecting the property, and in all things acted honestly and in good faith towards all persons interested in it; that Kittson and Hill had organized a new corporation, which [313] was joined as a defendant; and that the defendants had thereby obtained a great amount of property and of profits, and had refused to account to the plaintiff for his share. The bill prayed for a discovery, an account, and other relief.

The individual defendants filed a plea, which, on the motion of the defendant Corporation, was ordered to stand as its plea also, consisting of three parts:

First. A restatement in detail of some of the facts alleged generally in the bill.

Second. Averments that the plaintiff never informed Kennedy or any of the bondholders of his interest in the project for purchasing the bonds and thereby acquiring the mortgaged property, as alleged in the bill; and that neither Kennedy nor the bondholders knew, suspected, or had any information or belief that the plaintiff had or claimed to have any interest in the project until after the foreclosure sales.

Third. Averments that the making by the plaintiff of the agreement sued on, and his engaging in the enterprise of purchasing the bonds and thereby acquiring the railroads, were, as to that railroad of which he was receiver, unlawful, a breach of his trust as such receiver, and a fraud upon the bondholders and the court; and, as to the railroad of which he was general manager for the trustees under the mortgages, a breach of trust towards the trustees and the bondholders, and a fraud upon them; and that by reason of the fiduciary positions so occupied by him the plaintiff was not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to enforce the agreement or any rights growing out of it.

To this plea the plaintiff filed a general replication, and the hearing in the circuit court was upon the issue thus joined.

The pleader and the court below appear to have proceeded upon the theory that by a plea in equity a defendant may aver certain facts in addition to or contradiction of those alleged in the bill; and also not only, if he proves his averments, avail himself of objections in matter of law to the case stated in the bill, as modified by the facts proved; but even, if he fails to prove those facts, take any objection to the case stated in the bill, which would have been [314] open to him if he had demurred generally for want of equity.

But the proper office of a plea is not, like an answer, to meet all the allegations of the bill; nor like a demurrer, admitting those allegations, to deny the equity of the bill; but it is to present some distinct fact, which of itself creates a bar to the suit, or to the part to which the plea applies, and thus to avoid the necessity of making the discovery asked for, and the expense of going into the evidence at large. Mitf. Pl. 4th ed. 14, 219, 295; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 649, 652.

The plaintiff may either set down the plea for argument, or file a replication to it. If he sets down the plea for argument, he thereby admits the truth of all the facts stated in the plea, and merely denies their sufficiency in point of law to prevent his recovery. If, on the other hand, he replies to the plea, joining issue upon the facts averred in it, and so puts the defendant to the trouble and expense of proving his plea, he thereby, according to the English chancery practice, admits that if the particular facts stated in the plea are true, they are sufficient in law to bar his recovery; and if they are proved to be true, the bill must be dismissed, without reference to the equity arising from any other facts stated in the bill. Mitf. Pl. 302, 303; Story, Eq. Pl. § 697. That practice in this particular has been twice recognized by this court. Hughes v. Blake, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 453, 472 [5: 303, 308]; Rhode Island v. Mass. 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 210, 257 [10: 423, 445]. But the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, arose within its original jurisdiction in equity, for outlines of the practice in which the court has always looked to the practice of the court of chancery in England. Rule 7 of 1791, 1 Cranch, xvii, and 1 How. xxiv; *Rule 8 of 1858 and 1884, 21 How. v, and 106 U. S. 574. And the case of Hughes v. Blake, which began in the circuit court, was decided here in 1821, before this court, under the authority conferred upon it by Congress, had established the Rules of Practice in Equity in the Courts of the United States, one of which provides that "If upon an issue the facts stated in the plea be determined for the defendant, they shall avail him as far as in law and equity they ought to avail him." *Rule 19 in Equity, of 1822, 7 Wheat. xix; Rule 33 in Equity, of 1842, 1 How. li. The effect of [315] this rule of court when the issue of fact joined on a plea is determined in the defendant's favor need not, however, be considered in this case, because it is quite clear that at a hearing upon plea, replication and proofs, no fact is in issue between the parties but the truth of the matter pleaded.

In a case so heard, decided by this court in 1808, Chief Justice Marshall said: "In this case the merits of the claim cannot be examined. The only questions before this court are upon the sufficiency of the plea to bar the action, and the sufficiency of the testimony to support the plea as pleaded." Stead v. Course, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 403, 413 [2: 660, 663]. In a case before the House of Lords a year afterwards, Lord Redesdale "observed that a plea was a special answer to a bill, differing in this from an answer in the common form, as it demanded the judgment of the court, in the first instance, whether the special matter urged by it did not debar the plaintiff from his title to that answer which the bill required. If a plea were allowed, nothing remained in issue between the parties, so far as the plea extended, but the truth of the matter pleaded." "Upon a plea allowed, nothing is in issue between the parties but the matter pleaded, and the averments added to support the plea." "Upon argument of a plea, every fact stated in the bill, and not denied by answer in support of the plea, must be taken for true." Roche v. Morgell, 2 Sch. & Lef. 721, 725-727.

The distinction between a demurrer and a plea dates as far back as the time of Lord Bacon, by the 58th of whose Ordinances for the Administration of Justice in Chancery, "a demurrer is properly upon matter defective contained in the bill itself, and no foreign matter; but a plea is of foreign matter to discharge or stay the suit, as that the cause hath been formerly dismissed, or that the plaintiff is outlawed or excommunicated, or there is another bill depending for the same cause, or the like." Orders in Chancery, Beames' ed. 26. Lord Redesdale, in his Treatise on Pleadings, says: "A plea must aver facts to which the plaintiff may reply, and not, in the nature of a demurrer, rest on facts in the bill." Mitf. Pl. 297. And Mr. Jeremy, in a note to this passage, commenting [316] on the ordinance of Lord Bacon, observes: "The prominent distinction between a plea and a demurrer, here noticed, is strictly true, even of that description of plea which is termed negative, for it is the affirmative of the proposition which is stated in the bill;" in other words, a plea which avers that a certain fact is not as the bill affirms it to be sets up matter not contained in the bill. That an objection to the equity of the plaintiff's claim, as stated in the bill, must be taken by demurrer and not by plea is so well established that it has been constantly assumed and therefore seldom stated in judicial opinions; yet there are instances in which it has been explicitly recognized by other courts of chancery, as well as by this court. Billing v. Flight, 1 Madd. 230; Stoff v. Andrews, 2 Madd. 6; Varick v. Dodge, 9 Paige, 149; Phelps v. Garrow, 3 Edw. Ch. 139; Rhode Island v. Mass. 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 210, 258, 262 [10: 423, 446, 447]; National Bank v. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 76 [26: 693, 702].

It only remains to apply these elementary principles of equity pleading to the case before us.

The averments in the first part of the plea, restating in detail some of the facts alleged in the bill, were admitted by stipulation of counsel in writing to be true, and no controversy arose upon them.

The substance of the averments in the second part of the plea was that neither Kennedy nor the bondholders, whose agent and representative he was, had any notice or knowledge that the plaintiff had or claimed to have any interest in the project set forth in the bill, until after the sales of the railroads under decrees of foreclosure. The matter of fact thus averred was put in issue by the replication. The testimony of the plaintiff (in connection with Kennedy's letter to him), which was uncontradicted, and was the only evidence upon the matter pleaded, shows that Kennedy, before the completion of the sale and purchase of the bonds, knew that the plaintiff was to have an interest in the project, although he may not have known the extent of that interest, or that it had been already acquired. The want of any notice to Kennedy and the bondholders, averred in the plea, was thus disproved.
